Mr. COCKRELL. Its value depends, as the Senator from Delaware says, entirely and absolutely upon the probability of its being redeemed.

In 1868 the advocates of bimetallism pointed out and gave warning of the inevitable results of demonetizing silver by any leading nation then using it with free and unlimited coinage. Their warnings were unheeded and scorned by the gold advocates, who refused to see the pitfall before them and madly and blindly rushed toward the phantom light of the gold standard, just as they are doing to-day, perfectly infatuated, unmindful of reason, facts, and arguments.

I quote from the speech of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] of July 11, 1876, in the Senate. I have quoted it before. The Senator knows it is correct:

The enormous effect of the law in Germany and as a consequence the partial demonetization of silver coins I suppose is felt by every man, woman, and child who buys or sells anything. A struggle for the possession of gold at once arose between the great nations, because anybody could see that if $3,200,000,000 of silver coin were demonetized and $3,500,000,000 of gold coin made the sole standard it would enormously add to the value of gold, and the Bank of France, the Bank of England, and the Imperial Bank of Germany at once commenced grasping for gold in whatever form. Therefore, what we have observed recently is not so much a fall of silver as it is a rise of gold, the inevitable effect of a fear of the demonetization of silver.

I quote from the letter of Senator SHERMAN of July 15, 1878, in which he states truths diametrically opposite to what Secretary Carlisle asserted in 1895:

During the monetary conference in Paris, when silver in our country was excluded from circulation by being undervalued, I was strongly in favor of a single standard of gold. At that time the wisest among us did not anticipate the sudden fall of silver or the rise of gold that has occurred. This uncertainty of the relation between the two metals is one of the chief arguments in favor of a monometallic system, but other arguments showing the dangerous effect upon industry by dropping one of the precious metals from the standard of value outweigh in my mind all theoretical objections to the bimetallic system.

I now quote from Robert Giffen, a gold-standard advocate of England:

If events are the touchstones of prophecies, no prophecy was ever more certain than the increased dearness of gold. That the fall of prices to an extent so general as we are at present experiencing is to be referred to an increase in the purchasing power of gold is generally, and I might say almost universally, conceded.

I want now, for the benefit of my good friend from Massachusetts, to show how the English are benefited by the single gold standard. I quote from the London Statist, a gold-standard authority, I understand, a reliable statistical paper. It said in one of its recent issues:

The cash value of our imports in 1895 was £416,687,000, but at the 1890 level of prices the value would have been no less than £507,100,000. The benefit to this country, therefore, from the fall in prices of foreign and colonial produce in 1895 compared with 1890 thus amounted to the enormous sum of £90,400,000.

Four hundred and fifty million dollars of benefit by the decreased prices of commodities the English people had to buy between 1890 and 1895. But the paper goes on and says:

On the other hand, our exports in 1895 were of the cash value of only £226,169,000, whereas at the prices of 1890 the value would have been £267,600,000, thus entailing a loss of £41,500,000, due to the fall in prices. On balance, therefore, the fall in prices in 1895 compared with 1890 gave a profit to this country amounting to about £49,000,000.

About $250,000,000 they made by the decreased price in the commodities they had to buy. England thus in the last five years bagged $250,000,000 net of the substance of other nations (chiefly of the American people) because of the decline of prices during the past five years. It was able to do this, first, because it is a creditor country, and, second, because, while its exports were manufactures, the stuff it bought in other lands was chiefly raw material. The manufacturer can always in a measure protect himself from shrinkage, because if he must sell cheap he can also buy his raw material cheap. The loss falls heaviest upon the producer of primary substances, like the farmer, who begins the work of production and can not recoup his losses by moving back upon any other producer. England can not feed her people; but she has compelled us to give them food below the real value; she grows no cotton, but she has forced our planters to supply her mills with the staple at half price; she mines no silver, but she has bought for use in her Eastern trade American silver after driving down the price from $1.29 an ounce to 65 cents. How did she contrive thus to filch from our people their substance? By inducing us to adopt her gold standard and enlisting in behalf of the maintenance of that robber system the American press, the American bankers, and a great body of American citizens who do not perceive the true character of the conspiracy.

J. Thorold Rogers, an eminent English economic writer and gold advocate, in a lecture on the commercial and industrial history of England, said:

The fall of silver is entirely due to the cessation of silver minting and the abandonment of a silver standard, according to the law I laid down in an earlier part of this lecture, "that the dominant factor in any one of the precious metals which determines its value is its use as currency."

The editor of the Encyclopedia Britannica, ninth edition, in summing up the varied views on money, says:

The objection which denies the power of government to fix the relative values of gold and silver * * * may be set aside by the consideration that the use of the precious metals takes two forms, (a) their use as commodities; (b) their use as money. Since the state can influence the demand for these metals as money, and since, therefore, it can raise the value of either of them by this increased demand, it follows that within assignable limits it can fix the ratio between them, and that these limits are the ratio which would subsist between their values if gold were demonetized and that which would subsist if silver were demonetized.

I quote from Mr. Alfred de Rothschild, a delegate from England to the Brussels Conference in 1892, to show the effect of law upon the price of the metals. He said:

Gentlemen, I need hardly remind you that the stock of silver in the world is estimated at some thousands of millions, and if this conference were to break up without arriving at any definite result there would be a depreciation in the value of that commodity which it would be frightful to contemplate, and out of which a monetary panic would ensue the far-spreading effects of which it would be impossible to foretell.

I want it recorded in the annals of our country that one gold advocate has made one prediction that has been fulfilled, and the only one that has ever been fulfilled. He predicted in 1892 the crisis which was then approaching if that conference should adjourn without rehabilitating silver. It did adjourn without rehabilitating silver, and the results have followed just as he said.

I quote now from Secretary Carlisle's report to the House of Representatives of October 4, 1893, when he said:

As is well known, on June 26 the legislative councils of India enacted a bill closing their mints against the free coinage of silver. Upon this action becoming known there was great pressure to sell silver, and the market became completely disorganized, the price in London declining from 37 to 30½ pence and in New York from 84 to 62 cents per ounce.

Twenty-two cents per ounce fall caused by a law of India, and yet in 1895 this distinguished Secretary tells the country in his gold-standard campaign and crusade that a law establishing the ratio does not affect the value of the metal in the coin at home or abroad, because it is the metal that fixes the value of the coin, and not the coin that fixes the value of the metal. It is a poor cause which calls for such a miserable pretext of argument.

Certainly, then, the result of laws demonetizing silver has been a fall in the commercial value of silver and a rise in the purchasing power and commercial value of gold, and a fall in the debt-paying power—the selling price of all property, real and personal.

Had gold been demonetized instead of silver, it would have fallen in commercial value as silver has, and bimetallists would be most strongly urging the restoration of gold to its old place, and our gold advocates would be silver advocates, and calling gold the cheap, dishonest, unsound 50-cent money.

The gold advocates say that the commercial value of gold is equal to its coinage value. It is true that while the purchasing power doubled, its commercial and coin value remained about the same. Why? What gives gold bullion a commercial value about equal to its coinage value? There can be but one answer. It is law, and only law. England by her law in 1816 established the single standard of gold and opened her mints to its free and unlimited coinage at £3 17s. 10½d. per ounce, and by law in 1844 required the Bank of England to purchase all gold bullion offered at the fixed price of £3 17s. 9d., only 1½d. less than its coined value. The United States, Germany, France, and other countries have mints open to the free and unlimited coinage of gold at a fixed price. These laws endow gold bullion with the functions of money and maintain its commercial value at its coin value.

Secretary Carlisle ridiculed bimetallism and the double standard. He declared that it was a failure here and in France: that it was incomprehensible to his mind: and he asked how it was possible to have two different legal and authoritative measures of the same thing in use and at the same time. He forgets that Congress, by the Constitution, fixes the standard of weights and measures, and that we have exact pound weights made from iron, brass, lead, etc., and bushel and gallon and yard measures made from iron, tin, wood, brass, and other materials, and each weighs or measures the exact weight, quantity, or length indicated with as much precision as if all were made of gold.

As to the alleged failure of bimetallism, Secretary Carlisle says we had silver monometallism practically from 1792 to 1834, and practically gold monometallism from 1834 to 1873. These statements depend upon the past events. To the record of the past we appeal.

As to the alleged silver standard, 1792–1834, President Jefferson, on May 1, 1806, through his Secretary of State, advised the Mint Director that "the President directs that all silver to be coined at the mint shall be of small denominations, so that the value of the largest piece shall not exceed half a dollar," and assigned as a reason that the bank director had represented that silver dollars of our coinage were being exported—purchased for export.

No more silver dollars were coined to 1835, but many millions of dollars in halves, quarters, and dimes, full legal tenders in payment of all debts, were coined, and gold and silver coins of foreign mintage were legal tenders by our laws. Why, if we were on a silver standard, were our coined silver dollars exported? The mint record shows that in every year up to 1834, except the years 1816 and 1817, our mints coined gold aggregating over fifteen and a half millions of dollars. Why was gold coined? Certainly not for export, and certainly for domestic use.

As to the gold standard, 1834–1873, the mint records show the coinage of standard dollars in every year except 1858. Why coined? Certainly not for export, but for domestic use. Besides the dollar coinage, we coined many millions of silver half dollars, quarters, and dimes, full legal tenders in all payments, to 1853; and by our laws to 1857 silver dollars of foreign mintage were also a full legal tender and in circulation.

In both periods our mints were open to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver into full legal-tender money of final payment, and both were coined in every year except the three years I have named.

Sometimes we had more of one coin and then at other times more of the other coin.

Neither coin was depreciated nor at a premium, and the business neither of the country nor the people was affected.

So it was in bimetallic France, with her ratio of 15½ to 1. Her mints were open to the coinage of both gold and silver upon equal terms, and both were coined in every year from 1803 to 1874, except no gold in 1872 and 1873. During this period her mints coined $1,513,105,189 of gold and $948,511,859 of silver.

As here, so it was in France; neither coins at a premium or discount, and neither people nor business affected by the slight fluctuations which caused speculators and brokers to ship from one country to another. The coins were balances to each other and maintained a practically equal value.

During this period there were very great fluctuations in the world's product of silver and gold, much greater than has occurred since 1873, and yet they maintained a remarkably stable ratio at about 15½ to 1, and were only three times above 16 to 1—16.08 to 1 in 1808, 16.11 to 1 in 1812, and 16.25 to 1 in 1813—and never below 15 to 1. Thus the ratio remained substantially what it had been since 1687—about 15½ to 1.

According to the official records, bimetallism was not a failure either in the United States or France, but a decided and beneficial success in each country.

In still more conclusive proof of Secretary Carlisle's charge of the failure of bimetallism, I quote from the final report of the English royal gold and silver commission, organized in 1886, composed of twelve distinguished English statesmen, gold monometallists and bimetallists of the English stripe. I will state that this is a unanimous report, signed by all the members in 1888.

> Looking, then, to the vast changes which occurred prior to 1873 in the relative production of the two metals without any corresponding disturbance in their market value, it appears to us difficult to resist the conclusion that some influence was then at work tending to steady the price of silver and to keep the ratio which it bore to gold approximately stable. * * *
> Now, undoubtedly the date which forms the dividing line between an epoch of approximate fixity in the relative value of gold and silver and one of marked instability is the year when the bimetallic system, which had previously been in force in the Latin Union, ceased to be in full operation. And we are irresistibly led to the conclusion that the operation of that system, established as it was in countries the population and commerce of which were considerable, exerted a material influence upon the relative value of the two metals. So long as that system was in force, we think that, notwithstanding the changes in the production and use of the two metals, it kept the market price of silver approximately steady at the ratio fixed by law between them, namely, 15½ to 1. * * *
> Nor does it appear to us a priori unreasonable to suppose that the existence in the Latin Union of a bimetallic system with a ratio of 15½ to 1 between the two metals should have been capable of keeping the market price of silver steady at approximately that ratio.
> The view that it could only affect the market price to the extent to which there was a demand for it for currency purposes in the Latin Union, or to which it was actually taken to the mints of those countries, is, we think, fallacious.

I call particular attention to this:

> The fact that the owner of silver could in the last resort take it to those mints and have it converted into coin which would purchase commodities at the ratio of 15½ of silver to 1 of gold would, in our opinion, be likely to affect the price of silver in the market generally, whoever the purchaser and for whatever country it was destined. It would enable the seller to stand out for a price approximating to the legal ratio and would tend to keep the market steady at about that point.

With these mint records and the unanimous report of this commission just read before him or accessible to him, Secretary Carlisle, in his Covington speech—and I call attention to this profound argument—last summer or spring, said:

> The banking and other great financial institutions, which own and hold in their reserves much the greater part of this gold, would at once sell it at a large premium for silver, about two dollars for one, or they would exchange it for silver bullion in the market at the ratio of about 32 pounds of silver for each pound of gold, have the 32 pounds of silver coined into dollars at the expense of the people, and with this cheap money pay the demands of their depositors and other creditors.

I was surprised at a Secretary of the Treasury making such an assertion. When I read it in the press I was loath to believe that he had actually made such a statement until I read in the press parrot-like repetitions of substantially the same statement by other gold-standard advocates, particularly Hon. William D. Bynum, of Indiana, and others in the employ of the Sound Money League of New York, making patriotic speeches in behalf of the gold standard, and making such assertions as that.

The statement, when analyzed, is, to speak mildly, absurd and ridiculous. Every sane man must know there is no place in the world where even twenty-five millions of silver bullion, much less six hundred millions, could be purchased. Think of it! We have opened our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of the standard silver dollar, and Secretary Carlisle tells the people that the holders of this gold, after the mints are opened, will go out into the markets and buy up all the silver at 50 cents on the dollar, take it to the mints, have it coined, and then pay off their debts and obligations with it. Are all the people of the world idiots? Are they blind? Will they refuse to take their silver to the mints and have it coined, but, on the contrary, sell it to the gold bankers at half price? Think of such arguments as these to be resorted to for the purpose of bolstering up that ignis fatuus called the gold standard.

Whenever it was known that our mints would be opened at once to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 15½ or 15.988 or 16 to 1, that would make a fixed price for silver in this country and in the world, and in every part of it; and no holder of silver bullion would sell it for much less than that fixed price. Everybody knows that. The history of the past tells us so, and it is a strange spectacle for the Secretary of the Treasury by such argument to bolster up the standard to which he has become a recent convert, though I admit that recent converts have the right to become very zealous in the advocacy of their new ideas and new schemes. I do not, however, think they should resort to such arguments and such stuff as that.

The mint records and the unanimous report of the commission I have just read prove this as conclusively as anything to occur in the future can be proved by exactly similar occurrences in the past.

But our gold-advocate friends have another fear. "Oh," they say, "you are advocating the restoration of silver for the benefit of the mine owners." How they roll that as a sweet morsel under their tongues—restoration of silver is for the benefit of the mine owners. Why? The gold advocate says, "Because it will increase the price of bullion." Increase the price of bullion? Secretary Carlisle, your leader, tells you that the law establishing the ratios does not affect the value of the metal to be coined. It is the value of the metal in the coin, it is the metal that fixes the value of the coin, and yet you say if we restore silver the increased price of silver will benefit the mine owner. That is a ridiculously flimsy pretext. Let us stand up like men and advocate upon historical records and facts the policies we espouse.

Mr. President, the degradation of silver and the discrimination by laws against it prevent the rise in its commercial value. It is idle to expect silver, degraded and discriminated against as it has been, to rise in its commercial value.

Ever since the recoinage of silver dollars began in 1878 every President and Secretary of the Treasury has proscribed and discriminated against them. They have refused to treat or use them equally with gold in paying interest or principal of our coin bonds or even in redeeming greenback or Treasury notes, although every bond issued since July 14, 1870, has upon its face these words: "Redeemable in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870." Germany, although with a gold standard, has $105,000,000 of full legal-tender silver money, coined at the ratio of 15½ to 1, with 3 cents less silver than in our dollar. They use it equally with gold and do not call it a cheap, dishonest, 50-cent dollar. They pay it out equally with gold and honor it.

France has over $400,000,000 of silver money at the ratio of 15½ to 1, with 3 cents less silver than in our dollar. They use it equally with gold and never call it a cheap, 50-cent dollar. It is there used and honored equally with gold and as the equal of gold.

Now listen to this strange fact: From 1880 to December 31, 1895, gold and gold obligations were voluntarily exchanged at our mints for silver dollars and silver certificates to the extent of over $186,000,000. Here is a remarkable instance: Shortly before August 17, 1893, gold coin was presented to our Treasury officials and silver dollars asked in exchange and refused for the reason, as stated by Secretary Carlisle—

> That all the silver dollars in the Treasury at the time were required under the provisions of the laws relating to the currency to be held in the Treasury to cover the outstanding silver certificates and the Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890.

The Secretary refuses to give silver dollars in exchange for gold because he must hold the silver dollars to redeem the Treasury notes, and then when the Treasury notes are presented, he chooses to hold on to the silver dollars and to pay the notes in gold, not in the silver dollars that he has hoarded in the Treasury and refused to exchange for gold.

With equal propriety and assurance you might expect parents having two daughters to maintain them in equal standing, honor, and virtue when they recognize and treat the one only as honest and virtuous and refuse to recognize or treat the other as her equal or to introduce her into society, and merely give her lodging room and proclaim her to the world as dishonest, immoral, and lascivious.

The gold advocates say we have plenty of money, we need no more money. If so, then I ask why, in every financial panic, does the clearing house in New York issue its millions upon millions of clearing house certificates, as it did issue in 1893 $38,000,000, and only recently issued some? What more conclusive proof is there that there is an insufficiency of money than this one fact?

Secretary Carlisle and others proclaim that 90 to 95 per cent of the business of the world is done by checks and drafts and that we do not need any more money, that these answered the purpose of money. Upon what is this assertion based? Think of it a minute. It is based upon confidence. You take this man's check because you believe he has money in bank with which to pay it; you take another man's draft because you believe you will get the money on it when it is presented. It is based entirely upon confidence. If confidence is a sufficient foundation for a safe, stable financial system, let us do away with gold and silver and paper currency, and let everybody take everybody's check, go to the bank with it, and have it credited there. Let us have confidence—unlimited confidence. We need more irredeemable money of final payment and redemption. Our laws alone can authorize it. We must so authorize it by our laws before the people can even have a chance to earn and acquire it by industry and frugality. They need such money, authorized by the laws of our nation, for the transaction of their many billions of dollars of domestic home business, which is 95 per cent of all their transactions, domestic and foreign. Then they can easily provide for transacting the 5 per cent of foreign business.

It is silly to talk about a national financial system resting upon confidence. You have seen the effect of it year by year. The least little excitement, the least threat of war, makes the whole fabric of the world resting on the gold standard tremble and shake. It has been done repeatedly. I will not consume the time of the Senate in pointing it out.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me? I do not want to interrupt him if he objects, but right there on that point I should like to ask him a single question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. If it be true that about 95 per cent of the exchanges of the world is effected without the actual use of money, what difference would it make in that percentage if, according to the Senator's own theory, we had free coinage of silver?

Mr. COCKRELL. The free coinage of silver would form a wider and broader and deeper and more stable foundation for this structure to rest upon, and silver would be used and silver certificates would be used more extensively, instead of bank checks and drafts; the whole system would be more stable and certain, and the banks would have a greater reserve. Therefore there would be less danger of the destruction of confidence than there is now.

Mr. GRAY. I understand that, but I only want to ask the Senator—because this is a very interesting point—about how much difference in the percentage it would make, assuming that there is 95 per cent of the exchange of the world accomplished without the use of gold, which is recognized as the sole standard and measure of value—what difference in that respect would there be if we had silver? Would it more than double the amount of cash transactions?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is mere speculation. I have thought of the question very frequently, but I do not think any man can tell. Take the large cities. They have become accustomed to making their exchanges through the clearing house in this way, and they will never abandon that system unless some shock comes to induce them to change it; but it will be different with the masses of the people.

Mr. GRAY. I will not interrupt the Senator further, but he will see what I mean.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think I understand the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. What I mean is this, that even if it doubled the money of what we call final redemption, then there would be about 10 per cent of exchanges made by hard money, leaving 90 per cent of the exchanges to be effected by credit devices. Would that be sufficient to at all affect the result in regard to the finances of a nation or of the world?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it would immensely.

Mr. GRAY. Or would not the credit devices increase in proportion to this substratum of cash?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I do not think they would. There would be a greater volume of money; it would be scattered among the people; there would be more hoarding of it. It would be money of final payment and redemption, and in case of any emergency the Government would not have to bow the knee to England and beg the Rothschilds and Belmonts to come and stand guard over our Treasury. The people of the country would have money among themselves, and they would take our securities just as the people have done in France. When the French Government wanted money it would call upon the people, who would tender twice the amount that was asked for. So her securities are held there, and notwithstanding her indebtedness is one of the largest among the principal debtor nations of the world, she has never suffered such financial crises as other nations have suffered, and she has gone through the ordeal of the copper syndicate failure and the Panama Canal scandal, which would have paralyzed and broken down the gold-standard system of any other nation on this earth and driven it into complete panic and demoralization.

Mr. GRAY. Have they free coinage of silver in France?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, but they have had; and their system is based upon the bimetallic standard, and they honor silver instead of dishonoring and degrading it; they treat it as equal to gold, and it has the equal confidence of the people.

Mr. President, confidence is not a sufficient foundation for any financial system, and our gold advocates, in the guise of friends of silver, ever since 1877 have cried for an international agreement. Conferences were held in 1878, 1881, and 1892, and in the unconditional repeal act we were referred to an international agreement.

International agreement presupposes the power in two, three, or more commercial nations to maintain a fixed relative value between gold and silver. It is simply a question of power, and those who advocate international agreement admit, therefore, that three or more commercial nations have the power to maintain the ratio. Then it resolves itself simply into a question of power. We stand committed to bimetallism. The President and this Congress, and the gold advocates in this Congress, have every one of them voted for this unconditional repeal bill. That act, approved November 1, 1893, states emphatically:

> And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts.

In 1792, in our infancy, with very little over 4,000,000 population, we established our constitutional bimetallic system, the unlimited coinage of gold and silver upon equal terms into standard money of final redemption and payment. We did not then consult any nation; we did not advise with any nation; we did not ask the assistance of any nation; we felt ourselves, then simply occupying the fringe of the garment that covers the body of this great country to-day, the Atlantic Coast, and, only occupying this narrow strip of country, we felt our ability to establish our own financial system without asking the assistance of any other nation.

Every self-respecting, independent nation on this earth establishes its own financial system, and maintains it. We are the only nation, and I challenge a refutation of that statement, which has ever, since 1873, been trailing around among the nations of the world begging them to come and help us to establish a financial system. Oh, it is degrading and humiliating to the spirit of an American citizen to hear this plea, that we must have foreign alliances. What! a Democrat advocating foreign alliances in contravention of that cardinal principle proclaimed by the immortal Jefferson, "Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, and entangling alliances with none." That was our motto then; it was our motto so long as the Democratic party was in power, when we maintained the true bimetallic system.

We proclaim our Monroe doctrine to Great Britain, with an intimation of war, on the least appearance of encroachment on American soil, and then turn around and glorify our patriotism; and yet we meekly submit to the establishment of the British gold standard as our financial system, binding our toiling millions in eternal financial bondage to her, and we call that patriotism!

Have we the power as a nation to establish an independent financial system and maintain it? We had the power when we were only 4,000,000 strong. We then established that system, and we maintained it until it was overthrown in 1873 by the crime of that year. As a nation to-day we are the greatest on this earth in all the elements of power, greatness, wealth, and resources. We have 70,000,000 people, unequaled by any like number in any other nation on this earth, with resources untold and undeveloped, with a territory extending from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf, producing everything with which human wants can be satisfied, with gold and silver in greater quantities than almost any other nation, with a people united, patriotic, laboring together as one man, and probably increasing more rapidly than any other nation, with the exception of Russia, with an internal commerce greater than the world's entire foreign commerce.

I say, with this capacity and ability, we can by our law restore the standard silver dollar to the exact place it held in our coinage laws at the time of the passage of the act which has been fitly called the crime of 1873—the unlimited coinage of silver upon equal terms into money of full legal tender and final payment; and we can maintain it. We have a thousand resources to which we can resort to maintain our bimetallic system by legislation, and they are amply sufficient to enable us to maintain it. Every solitary objection against the restoration of the standard silver dollar is a prediction, a fear, a dread, an apprehension. I challenge you to show any real, substantial argument against the unlimited coinage of silver that is not based upon a prediction, an apprehension, a fear, or a dread. There is your only resort.

No, Mr. President; there is no danger in the restoration of our true, constitutional, Democratic bimetallic system. What is bimetallism? I answer in the language of Mr. Muhleman, deputy assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, in his late work, Monetary Systems of the World:

> By bimetallism simply defined is meant the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver into coins of full debt-paying power. Not the mere use of the double standard, but the actually opened mints on the terms above given.

I answer again in the language of the royal gold and silver commission of England in the report made in 1888:

> A bimetallic system of currency, to be completely effective, must, in the view of those who advocate it, include two essential features: (a) An open mint ready to coin any quantity of either gold or silver which may be brought to it; (b) the right on the part of a debtor to discharge his liabilities at his option in either of the two metals at a ratio fixed by law.

When we demand bimetallism, we simply ask to open our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of the two precious metals, gold and silver, into full legal-tender money of final payment and redemption at the ratio prescribed by Congress, each exactly equal to the other at the coined value stamped thereon, in the payment of all liabilities.

With our mints opened to silver equally with gold we create an unlimited demand for silver and establish the fixed price for silver not only in our own country, but also in the markets of the world, and restore the parity of the market or commercial and coining value of silver and the full legal tender of both coins of gold and silver as standard money of final payment of all obligations, with the right of the debtor to choose the coin of payment, and thus prevent undue appreciation or depreciation in the money of payment.

We believe, and by the historic record of the past ages we know, that there is no danger, no real danger in such restoration of bimetallism. It is idle to call our present system bimetallism. The system we have had since 1873 is not bimetallism. It is gold monometallism. It has been tried in the balances and found wanting. Lay aside your fears and your apprehensions, and let us try bimetallism once again. It can not make us any worse than we have been since you have been maintaining the gold standard, ever since 1893, by the use of over $262,000,000 of interest-bearing obligations.

But some of the sound-money advocates claim that they are in favor of bimetallism. What kind of bimetallism? The kind we have now. The kind that must end in gold; gold the only money of final payment, and all other money, silver as well as paper, redeemable in gold or limited in its legal-tender qualities to $10, $25, or $50; not a money of final payment and redemption, but a limited legal tender.

Every nation with the single gold standard is to-day suffering fearful financial depression, just as Secretary Carlisle predicted in 1878—low prices for products and high prices for gold. That is the condition in every gold nation to-day. On the contrary, in every silver-standard country silver has not depreciated and purchases just as much of domestic products to-day as it did in 1873.

There is no danger in restoring bimetallism. There is not gold and silver enough in the world to answer the purposes of money. I make that assertion boldly. I appeal to the records. It has never been produced in unlimited quantities, and it can not be produced at the will of man. Read your histories. See the wars of conquest and the slaughter and the rapine which have been carried on for the purpose of getting gold. Read of the lives and the fortunes that have been wasted and destroyed in seeking after gold. There never has been a nation on this earth that has ever had gold enough without silver for monetary purposes. You can not find a nation that has had more gold and silver than it could use for monetary purposes. If all the gold and silver combined produced in the world for four hundred years from 1493 to 1893 were in existence to-day it would give us only $14.48 per capita. Four hundred years' production would give the present population $14.48 per capita, and all in existence as money to-day, all that we can find to-day would give us only $6.34 per capita. To-day we have in the world over $2,500,000,000 of irredeemable paper money, irredeemable for the lack of gold and silver money with which to redeem it.

The struggle for gold continues. It goes from nation to nation, back and forth again. It has been flying like a shuttlecock between New York and London for the last two or three years, frequently not unloaded in London, not taken off the ships, but brought back here.

Bimetallism is no experiment. It has been tried and sustained, and it has been the world's unbroken system since Abraham tramped out of Uz of the Chaldees up to 1816, when Britain established the single gold standard. Gold monometallism is purely a British invention, the fruit of British avarice and greed. Outside of England it was practically unknown until about twenty-six years ago. Since then it has been experimented with, and the disastrous results have been correctly stated by Secretary Carlisle when he represented the yeomanry of Kentucky in the other House in 1878.

It is high time to cease predictions and give silver a fair chance. It can not make our conditions worse.

Gold and silver are the most suitable metals for use as money and a measure of value and have been used from time immemorial and are more stable in their values than any other two metals. They have never been produced in unlimited quantities, like iron, lead, copper, zinc, and most other metals. Hence no people have ever been flooded with gold and silver or either. Linked together as equals in money use for one hundred and eighty-five years prior to 1872, they maintained a most remarkably stable ratio during great changes in relative production, sometimes 75 per cent of silver to 25 per cent gold, and then 75 per cent gold to 25 per cent silver. Link them together again by our laws, as yokefellows and balances to each other, as we had them prior to 1873, the history of the world shows they will prove equal yokefellows. Year by year the coined money disappears in numberless ways, known and unknown. The annual production does not keep pace with the increase of population, commerce, and industry and the increasing demand for coined money.

There is no possible danger that we shall ever have too much irredeemable money of final payment and redemption, either of both gold and silver or of silver or gold. Infinite wisdom and power has so distributed these precious metals in the earth that all the people combined can not find them or either of them in unlimited quantities or in greater quantities than they can use for money. Search the world's record from the day when Adam and Eve were driven from the Garden of Eden, and you will not find a nation that has had more gold and silver, or either, than it could profitably use.

Then give us back our democratic bimetallic system by restoring by our laws the silver dollar to the old place it had in our laws prior to 1873.

We should either establish by our own laws our monetary system in our interest and for our own advantage, and then maintain it by the many effective and amply sufficient means we possess, just as every other independent, self-respecting nation does, or else we should surrender back to old England, whose power we have twice defied and triumphantly repulsed, our independence; confess our incapacity for self-government and place ourselves under her selfish and avaricious guardianship and protection; haul down "Old Glory," our star-spangled banner, the chosen emblem of the free and the brave, waving in honor, glory, and power over the greatest nation of people on earth; hoist in its stead the royal standard, and cry aloud, "Long live the Queen of Great Britain and Empress of India."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 13, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

STEAMER MATTEAWAN.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4698) to provide an American registry for the steamer Matteawan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Asturian Prince, owned by Charles W. Hogan, a citizen of the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States under the name of Matteawan.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the inspection of said vessel, steam boilers, steam pipes, and their appurtenances, and cause to be granted the usual certificate issued to steam vessels of the merchant marine without reference to the fact that said steam boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests in the inspection of said boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances shall be the same in all respects as to strength and safety as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the report on this bill was read some two or three weeks ago. The bill was objected to because it did not appear that the repairs on this vessel had been completed. The case comes under all the requirements of the statute, except that the vessel was not wrecked in American waters. She was wrecked in the West Indies. The repairs cost over $50,000, and the purchase price was $10,000. The repairs have been completed, as shown by affidavits before the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CITIZENSHIP OF MARINE ENGINEERS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3013) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine engineer service, and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4131. Vessels registered pursuant to law, and no others, except such as shall be duly qualified according to law for carrying on the coasting or fishing trade, shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, but no such vessel shall enjoy such benefits and privileges longer than it shall continue to be wholly owned by a citizen or citizens or a corporation of the United States and be commanded by a citizen of the United States. And all the officers of vessels of the United States shall in all cases be citizens of the United States. The word "officers" shall include the chief engineer and assistant engineers on vessels propelled wholly or in part by steam, and no person shall be qualified to become an officer of a merchant vessel of the United States who is not a native-born citizen or whose naturalization as a citizen shall not have been fully completed.

"All licenses issued to officers of steam vessels shall be graded in accordance with the laws governing the steam vessel inspection service, and no license for a higher grade shall be issued except upon written application by the holder of a license, which application shall not be granted unless the applicant shall have successfully passed an examination before a regularly authorized board of examiners as to his qualifications to be an officer of the advanced grade, nor until such applicant shall have served under his existing license at least twelve months prior to his application for advancement; and no license shall be suspended or revoked except upon charges duly preferred in writing, verified and acknowledged before an officer authorized to administer an oath, and sustained by the Supervising Inspector-General after an investigation of the charges, in which the accused shall be allowed counsel and may testify in his own behalf; and in no case shall the accused be deprived of his license until a charge of incompetency or unfitness against him shall be sustained by the Supervising Inspector-General.

"The examination of an applicant for a license of a higher grade shall take place within ten days after such time as the applicant may request.

"Every license issued shall be for a term of five years, but the holder of a license may have the same renewed for another five years at any time before its expiration: Provided, however, That any officer holding a license and who is engaged in a service which necessitates his continuous absence from the United States may make application in writing for one renewal and transmit the same to the board of local inspectors, with a statement of the applicant, verified before a consul or other officer of the United States authorized to administer an oath, setting forth the reasons for such application; and upon receiving the same the board of local inspectors that originally issued such license shall renew the same for one additional term of such license, and shall notify the applicant of such renewal.

"In time of war or other emergency any person who shall accept a license as engineer of a steam vessel shall be subject to temporary draft into the Navy of the United States to act as engineer under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Navy; and while serving in the naval service of the United States such person shall be entitled to receive the same pay and emoluments as an officer of the Navy of the same grade performing similar duties."

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries recommended the following amendments:

In line 12, page 1, after the words "United States," insert the words "or a corporation of any State thereof."

Strike out lines 7 and 8, page 2, and insert "citizen of the United States."

At the end of line 8, page 2, add:

"All the officers of vessels of the United States shall be citizens of the United States, except that in cases where, on a foreign voyage, or on a voyage from an Atlantic to a Pacific port of the United States, any such vessel is for any reason deprived of the services of an officer below the grade of master, his place, or a vacancy caused by the promotion of another officer to such place, may be supplied by a person not a citizen of the United States until the first return of such vessel to its home port; and such vessel shall not be liable to any penalty or penal tax for such employment of an alien officer."

At the end of line 4, page 4, add:

"SEC. 3. This act shall take effect on and after January 1, 1897."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I can make a brief statement to the House concerning this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, without objection, will be allowed to make a statement of the nature of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to require that engineers and assistant engineers on vessels under an American registry shall be citizens of the United States.

Previous to 1884 the law authorized the employment of aliens as engineers and assistant engineers on American vessels. By the act of 1884 an amendment was made requiring that all officers of American vessels should be citizens of the United States, and under that law the Treasury Department immediately issued a circular, stating that the former statute providing that aliens might be employed as engineers had been repealed, and that the law now required all such engineers to be citizens of the United States. That was the interpretation of the Department from 1884 down to 1893, when a new interpretation was made about the time that the steamers New York and Paris received American registry. On the New York and Paris engineers and assistants were employed who were not citizens of the United States. Nearly all of them immediately took steps to become citizens of the United States, and I think all who so took steps can become citizens before the 1st of January, 1897. The object of the bill, as I say, is to provide that all engineers and assistant engineers on American vessels shall be citizens of the United States. We have postponed the date when the bill shall take effect until the 1st of January next, in order to allow the assistant engineers on the Paris, New York, St. Louis, and St. Paul to become citizens of the United States on or before that date.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will wait until I complete my statement I shall be very glad to answer his question.

Mr. LOUD. It is right on the point you are talking about.

Mr. PAYNE. The law, as of course all the members of the House are aware, provides that in case of war these vessels can be taken and used as auxiliaries to the Navy, and of course it is very important, not only in the time of war, but previous to that time, that all these engineers should owe allegiance to the United States. If we had an engineer who was a foreign citizen, or an assistant engineer who was a foreign citizen, a very slight accident might ruin the machinery of either one of these vessels. The committee deem it wise, therefore, to make this provision at the earliest date possible and practicable at which these engineers might become American citizens. The International Navigation Company, owners of this American line, were heard before the committee, and the principal objection they had against the bill was that it would take effect at once and embarrass them. We amended it to conform to their views in this matter, so that it shall take effect January 1, 1897. The other amendment to the first section is simply a reincorporation of the present provision of law with reference to that item in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York if, in his opinion, the construction given this law was not very much strained in the decision of 1893?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see how any lawyer can read the law of 1884 and the other statutes of the United States in reference to the officers of steam vessels, and possibly construe the law as it was construed by the Secretary of the Treasury in 1893, and the present Secretary of the Treasury, and also the Attorney-General.

Mr. LOUD. This simply carries out the intent of the law?

Mr. PAYNE. I think the law to-day, by its plain intent, was correctly construed from 1884 to 1893, in requiring that these men should be considered as officers of vessels, and should be required to be citizens of the United States.

There is another change made in reference to the licenses of engineers which makes the license end with a term of five years, subject to reexamination, and the taking away of the license in case the engineer should become incompetent; and a provision for renewal at the end of five years. There is also a further provision in this connection. It enacts into law what I understand is now the rule of the Treasury Department, that when an engineer's term of license has expired, and he is in a foreign port, that he can go before a consul and by presenting proof of competency, by affidavit or otherwise, the papers can be forwarded to the inspector here and his license can be renewed for a period of five years only.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand from the statement of the gentleman from New York that the general law of register as it now exists, and which is now recited in this bill, is unchanged, but that the only change that is made in the law is specifically to include engineers and assistant engineers and the officers, who must be American citizens.

Mr. PAYNE. There is one other change that I meant to speak about, and that is the provision of law that makes these engineers subject to draft in the service of the United States in case of war.

Mr. DINGLEY. And to extend the period of licenses from two years to five years. That is the only difference?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no other change?

Mr. PAYNE. There is not.

Mr. MERCER. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York if the extension of the time at which this bill shall take effect until the 1st of January is on the theory that we have no American citizens who are competent to act as engineers on these vessels?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; but the men who are engaged on the New York and the Paris are men who had been there for many years. When the change was made, and some of them before, made application for their first papers in order to become citizens of the United States, and they are old and trusted employees upon these vessels. And the changes met the approval of the engineers as well as the approval of the American Line.

Mr. MERCER. Does the gentleman recollect that when the St. Louis, as good as any ship which flies an English flag, made her first trip across the Atlantic some distinguished English citizens were on board, and one of them a temporary resident of the city of Washington, and because he saw fit to make a voyage in an American-built ship was severely criticised by the British press for doing so?

Mr. PAYNE. I think I saw something of that kind in the papers. I do not know whether that is an argument in favor of this bill or not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of another bill.

Mr. DANIELS. I desire to proceed with the case of Aldrich against Robbins.

Mr. LOUD. I desire to make a report.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman will yield a moment.

TONNAGE TAX.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2672) concerning tonnage tax.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of chapter 421 of the laws of 1886, as amended by section 1 of chapter 61 of the laws of 1888, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 11. That section 14 of 'An an act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes,' approved June 26, 1884, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 14. That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum imposed prior to July 1, 1884, a duty of 2 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 10 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West India Islands, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, or the coast of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea, or the Hawaiian Islands, or Newfoundland. A duty of 6 cents per ton, not to exceed 30 cents per ton per annum, is hereby imposed at each entry upon all vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any other foreign port, not, however, to include vessels in distress or not engaged in trade. Sections 4223 and 4224 and so much of section 4219 of the Revised Statutes as conflicts with this section are hereby repealed.'"

SEC. 2. That section 12 of chapter 421 of the laws of 1886 and section 4232 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect one month after its passage.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to repeal the reciprocal provision in reference to the tonnage tax under which vessels sailing under the flag of the Netherlands and also under the German flag are now exempt from the payment of that tonnage tax; and a like exemption is made by those nations to American vessels, also, plying between our ports and their ports. The tonnage tax on vessels in the foreign trade—that is, the transatlantic traffic—amounts to some 30 cents a ton a year, and the tonnage tax on vessels in the American trade, plying between the Americas, amounts to 3 cents for five voyages, or 15 cents per ton per year. This bill not only seeks to repeal the reciprocal provision of law, but also to reduce the tonnage tax on the American foreign trade—that is, the coastwise trade with the Americas—from 3 cents a ton to 2 cents, or from 15 cents per ton per year to 10 cents per ton per year. As I said, the principal countries now enjoying this reciprocal provision are Germany and the Netherlands. The amount of exemption to these two countries is $80,000 a year, which the United States would receive—and which, by the way, goes toward the support of the marine hospitals, over that—which they do not now receive. This agreement under which this reciprocal arrangement went into effect has saved to the United States vessels some $600 or $700 a year, while it has saved to the German vessels and to the vessels of the Netherlands some $80,000 a year; or, in other words, the benefit is almost entirely to the owners of foreign vessels and vessels sailing under a foreign flag.

Mr. CANNON. How does the gentleman propose to cure that?

Mr. PAYNE. I propose now to charge the same tonnage tax on German vessels and vessels from the Netherlands that we charge to vessels from Great Britain and other countries having vessels engaged in the transatlantic trade.

Mr. CANNON. Does that violate any treaty?

Mr. PAYNE. No; the matter has received the attention of the Administration and of several Administrations.

Mr. DINGLEY. There never was any treaty upon this subject. It is simply legislation on our part.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no treaty such as the gentleman suggests. Our treaty was with reference to the trade with Brazil.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from New York permit a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do I understand from the gentleman that it is proposed to reduce the tonnage tax on the coastwise carrying trade?

Mr. PAYNE. The proposition is to reduce the tonnage tax on the trade between our ports and the West Indies and the South American ports, and also between our ports and Canadian ports on the lakes, from 3 cents to 2 cents a ton.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the object of that?

Mr. PAYNE. Simply to favor that commerce. The change does not make a very large reduction in the amount of revenue.

Mr. McMILLIN. What reduction does it make?

Mr. PAYNE. I can not state the amount at this moment, but I will give the gentleman the estimate from the report before I take my seat.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would like to know the aggregate reduction of revenue that this change would make, and also whether this legislation has been recommended by the Treasury Department.

Mr. PAYNE. This bill is recommended by the Commissioner of Navigation.

Mr. McMILLIN. What about the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know whether the Secretary has confirmed that recommendation or not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has he been called upon for an opinion?

Mr. PAYNE. The recommendation of the Commissioner of Navigation was contained in the Commissioner's annual report, which passed through the Secretary's hands, but I do not know that the Secretary has in so many words expressed himself in writing in favor of the measure.

In regard to the question of our treaty obligations, I will say, in the first place, that President Cleveland in 1895 reviewed this subject in his annual message, and came to the conclusion that such a change would not violate any treaty. The United States circuit court, in the case of the North German Lloyd Line vs. The Collector of New York, a case which the North German Line never appealed, so that it must be taken as acquiescing in the decision, the court in that case decided that this discrimination was not in conflict with the "most favored nation" clause of any treaty obligation. Mr. Blaine, as Secretary of State, in 1892 held the same opinion, and in support of it he cited the opinion of Attorney-General Garland given in 1885. So it will be seen that the executive authorities of the Government that have examined this question, as well as the courts, have held that no violation of any treaty obligation is involved.

Mr. CANNON. This bill, if I understand the gentleman, places the Netherlands and Germany upon the same footing as other nations in this respect?

Mr. PAYNE. Upon exactly the same footing.

Mr. CANNON. I have an indistinct recollection that years ago we appropriated to refund tonnage tax paid by Belgium. Is Belgium now on all fours with the rest of the world in this respect?

Mr. PAYNE. Belgium now pays the tonnage tax, and the American lines plying between New York and Philadelphia and Antwerp pay the tonnage tax. The gentleman's question suggests one of the inequalities of the present system.

We have an American line sailing from New York to Southampton and there are two German lines, the North German-Lloyd and the Hamburg-American, sailing from German ports to New York, but stopping at Southampton to take on and unload passengers and freight. Those German lines have all the advantages of competition with the American line between New York and Southampton, while at the same time they are exempt from the tonnage tax and the American line has to pay the full tonnage tax. A like inequality exists between the situation of the vessels of the (American) International Navigation Company plying between New York and Antwerp and coming in competition with the Netherlands line running from New York to Amsterdam and Rotterdam, the Netherlands line being exempt from the tax and our vessels having to pay it.

Mr. CANNON. Then this legislation, if enacted—I am asking only for results—will put other nations upon an equality with each other in this matter and will also put the United States upon full equality with every other nation?

Mr. PAYNE. Every nation will be on an equality in this respect. The vessels of all nations will pay the tonnage tax.

Mr. CANNON. Will that result in an increase or a decrease of revenue?

Mr. PAYNE. There will be an increase of something over $80,000, and the decrease on account of reducing the tonnage tax on the American coastwise trade——

Mr. DINGLEY. The near-by foreign trade.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; the decrease on account of that change of the law will be about $7,000 a year.

Mr. CANNON. So that the net increase of revenue will be about $72,000?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; above $70,000.

Mr. MCMILLIN. After this reduction is made in the coastwise tonnage tax, will there be sufficient revenue from this source to support the marine hospitals?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; because the net increase under this bill will be upward of $70,000.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then, taking it all together, this will be a self-sustaining service.

Mr. PAYNE. The Commissioner of Navigation anticipates that there will be an increase of $100,000 of revenue, but even upon the basis of the present figures it is clear that there will be over $70,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 666) to amend section 4829 of the United States Revised Statutes, concerning surgeons, assistant surgeons, and other medical officers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THOMAS JOHNSON.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 365) to fix the date of the discharge of Thomas Johnson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to fix the date of the discharge of Thomas Johnson, Company L, Seventh Kentucky Cavalry, at November 10, 1862.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. BERRY. Thomas Johnson was captured and paroled by the enemy during August, 1862. Subsequently he was discharged from the service, having been severely injured. On the muster roll of his company, dated December 31, 1862, there is the entry, "Discharged a private, at Camp Lew Wallace." The soldier having lost his discharge in a railroad wreck, the War Department records have been diligently but unsuccessfully searched in order to ascertain the date of his discharge. It being apparent to the committee after examination that the discharge was in the latter part of the year 1862, this bill has been reported in order that by act of Congress we may officially fix the date, which the War Department, in the absence of official records, can not do.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Has the bill been favorably reported?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir; by the Committee on Military Affairs. The report is here.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the report will be read.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 365) to fix the date of discharge of Thomas Johnson, having had the same under consideration, would report it back with an amendment and recommend that it do pass.

It is shown by the records of the War Department that Thomas Johnson was enrolled August 5, 1862, and mustered into service August 18, 1862, as a private in Company L, Seventh Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, to serve three years. He was captured and paroled by the enemy during the month of August, 1862 (the precise date not stated). The muster roll of the company, dated December 31, 1862, is the only roll on file on which his name is borne, and he is reported thereon, "Discharged a private, at Camp Lew Wallace." That repeated search has been made of all records on file in the War Department likely to afford information as to the date and cause of the soldier's discharge, but nothing has been found showing by whose authority, for what reason, or as of what date he was discharged. In statements submitted to the Department, with a view to establishing date and cause of discharge, the soldier declared that at the time of his capture he had been injured by the fall of his horse; that he was then sent to Camp Lew Wallace, and was there examined by medical officers, who pronounced his injuries incurable, and that he was thereupon discharged from the service.

A variance appears in respect to the alleged date of the discharge, as in some instances it is stated to be in the early part of November, 1862, and in the others the month of January, 1863. In view of the contradictory statements made by the soldier, and the absence of any record showing the date and cause of discharge, the Department was unable to arrive at any definite conclusion in the matter, except that it is evident that he was discharged on some date prior to December 31, 1862.

It is apparent that this soldier was discharged the service some time in the latter part of 1862, but that, owing to the loss of his discharge in a railroad wreck, and the absence of any other record showing the date of such discharge, the only method by which such date can be supplied would be the passage of the proposed bill.

Your committee are satisfied that the relief should be granted, and submit the following amendment:

Strike out the word "tenth," in line 5 of the printed bill, and insert in lieu thereof the word "twentieth."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to strike out "tenth" after the word "November" and insert "twentieth," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BERRY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LOUD. I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to ask that they be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4808) to increase the efficiency of the postal service, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Without implying any criticism on the reference, I will state that the bill is of a semijudicial character, giving additional powers to post-office inspectors; and therefore the Judiciary Committee should properly take charge of the measure.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the change of reference will be made as requested.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DANIELS. I ask now that the House proceed with the contested-election case of Aldrich vs. Robbins.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the pending contested-election case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. This being Friday, is it not in order under Rule XXVI to move to go into Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar? I ask a ruling of the Chair upon the question whether that motion is not now in order. Of course I do not feel like making it, but I hope the chairman of the Committee on Claims or the chairman of the Committee on War Claims will do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that business would be in order as against an election case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The rule is very emphatic in saying that—

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business unless otherwise determined by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a question of privilege would override that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The House, however, could, I presume, postpone the question of privilege, and then a motion would be in order to proceed to the Private Calendar, if either of the gentlemen I have indicated would make it.

The SPEAKER. Unquestionably the question of consideration can be raised on an election case if any gentleman wishes to raise it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I simply desired that the chairman of one of these committees should make the motion that we proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar. If neither of them sees fit to do so, of course I shall not undertake to do it myself.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—ALDRICH VS. ROBBINS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] calls up the pending contested-election case.

Mr. DANIELS. The arrangement is that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] shall now make the closing argument on behalf of the contestee.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, it should not be, but it is asking a great deal to request of members of the House of Representatives to divest themselves of all partisan feeling and to devote so an election contest that judicial temper which was promised to the House in the early part of the session on the part of gentlemen of the majority who have control of our proceedings. It would perhaps be a vain hope and one requiring too much of confidence that would impel us to believe that every gentleman would act with judicial spirit and without partisan feeling in the consideration of the question now before the House. The fact has already been made manifest to us that many gentlemen have not cared to inform themselves about the real issues involved in this contest. The array of empty seats on the Republican side which glared before the view of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], yesterday throughout the whole of his able argument in behalf of the contestee, when not more than a dozen Republicans honored him with their presence, to say nothing of attention, is evidence that at least some people on that side of the House do not care to hear what may be said on our side of the question.

And yet I state it to be my belief that there is not a gentleman on that side of the House outside of the Committee on Elections No. 1 who has ever read the record in this case, and the statement is equally applicable to this side. I do not criticise gentlemen for not having done so. I do not make this statement as censure, because I realize that it is utterly impossible for Representatives to attend to their other legislative duties and at the same time devote themselves to studying the voluminous records in all the contested elections pending before the House.

I could not expect it. I do not believe that there are a dozen gentlemen on the other side of the House who have read the two reports of the majority of the Committee on Elections or the views of the minority in this contest. I understand, of course, that this is a gratuitous statement, but I say what I believe to be a fact. Gentlemen are given too much to following leaders upon all of these questions. All I have a right to ask of the Democrats on this side of the House, and even to as great an extent of the Republicans on the other side of the House, is that they at least give attention to the case now and endeavor to ascertain as much of the truth of the issues involved as may be possible from an attentive hearing of the arguments of gentlemen who have made it their business to inform themselves upon the record.

If, Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of the House, without any understanding whatever of the issues involved here in a contest, to unseat a member who holds his certificate from the governor of his State and reverse the findings of sworn officers without reference to anything whatever except partisan declamation on the floor of the House, I can not prevent it, but I must at least protest against it. I am aware, sir, of the difficulties which environ me in this case. I am admonished by the temper the House has already evinced and by circumstances to which I have already referred that we can not hope, perhaps, that the question will be decided by the deliberate and intelligent judgment of the House, but that members will be led by blind partisanship in the determination of the matter; but I can not for that reason forego the performance of my duty in trying to have it otherwise.

I appreciate the difficulties which confront me at the threshold, not only by reason of the circumstances that I have already narrated, but I realize the difficulty that any man must encounter who comes before a deliberative body in support of a case in which is involved a question of fraud, and where he admits fraud to exist.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend that gentlemen in the discussion of this question shall put me in a position of trying to defend fraud. The arguments of gentlemen upon the other side of the House on yesterday, the logical result of the arguments advanced, is an effort to put us of the minority in the position of trying to defend fraud in connection with this case. I want to say that not one of us has done so and not one of us will do so, and I take the occasion here to assert that I abhor fraud, I detest it, and I go to the full length with the gentlemen who in their heat during the course of this discussion have expressed their denunciation of fraud in connection with this election. And neither privately nor officially will I ever consciously give my support to it either here or elsewhere.

But, Mr. Speaker, what is the question which confronts us? Will gentlemen endeavor to get down to the issues of this case and give it a judicial and impartial consideration? Will they endeavor, for one brief moment, to divest themselves of prejudice? Will they endeavor to constitute themselves judges, impartial judges, acting under the influence of a desire to maintain the integrity of the House and of our institutions, as well as to keep intact the purity of the ballot box? If the question is whether there was fraud in the election in the Fourth district of the State of Alabama in the election held in 1894, if that is the only question presented for our consideration here, I might as well take my seat, because we have admitted that upon the record. If the question is whether or not, as stated by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] on yesterday, that for a generation that district has been the field of fraud in elections, and particularly the county of Dallas, then I might as well withhold any remarks I may see proper to make, for I am not informed upon that from the record. If the question before the House is, dd Gaston Robbins, the contestee in this case, stand, in the manner facetiously described by my colleague on the committee [Mr. LINNEY] from North Carolina on yesterday, silently by and fail to take any testimony in connection with the case; if, forsooth, because he has elected to rely wholly upon the evidence taken by the contestant, and because of that fact the case is to be disposed of to his detriment, then we have no day in court. If it is to be summarily decided upon the statements of gentlemen who are members of this House, their own gratuitous statements, that all of the negroes of the South are Republicans, and therefore that Robbins could not have obtained any negro votes in that district, then I need not proceed further with the discussion.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to protest against each of these views of the case. These are not the questions confronting us. The question is presented to us as judges; the question is proposed to you as men, as sworn officers of the Government, to determine the issue according to law, because that is involved in the oath that every member takes who assumes the solemn responsibility of representing a constituency in the American Congress. The question is, is this contestee, who holds the seat, entitled on the facts set forth in this record, in view of all of the evidence, even in view of fraud admitted and proven, entitled to retain the seat and represent his constituents upon this floor?

Not as a matter of personal right to him; not as to the personal rights of the contestant, but in recognition of the rights of the people of the Fourth district of Alabama to be represented here by the man for whom a majority of the votes not fraudulent have actually been cast in the election held for that purpose. We have no personal feelings in this matter. We can not have. The law requires us to determine it from a judicial view, having reference to what may be legally considered in the case, that is, the record.

If the contestee has seen fit to rely upon the case as made out by the contestant in his testimony, if he has deprived himself of the benefit of taking testimony, I think it is a misfortune; nevertheless he is not to be refused a hearing in this House on the testimony that has been taken on that account. He is not to be prejudiced before this body by reason of not having taken testimony.

Are you capable, gentlemen, of considering it in the light of the testimony and the law itself, and rendering a dispassionate judgment upon the cause? I believe that you may single out any gentleman upon either side of this House and appeal to him personally, and he will endeavor honestly and faithfully to render a judicial opinion upon any question presented; but when it comes to party action, Mr. Speaker, that is a different matter. When men get together in the phalanx of partisan organization they do not act under the cool, deliberate conviction that impels the judge upon the bench; and there is no better illustration of it than that afforded by my very genial and able friend from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] in the speech which he delivered yesterday before the House. Why, Mr. Speaker, in the committee room my friend is conservative, is reflective, is considerate, is disposed to be fair—wants to be. I am convinced that he endeavors there in conference with his colleagues upon the committee, where the best personal feeling prevails, calmly and dispassionately to determine questions without reference to party advantage; and then he comes before the House and in an argument before you tells you that when he was cool and deliberate in the committee, in passing judgment upon this case, he did wrong, and now under the intoxication of the applause that comes from a partisan association in the House he is impelled to make the wildest declarations, and to say: "I think I did wrong; you ought not to let me do it." Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, we can not appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober. In the case here, we look sadly from Philip sober to Philip drunk [laughter]—drunk with demonstrations of partisan approbation.

Mr. Speaker, before I begin to take up this matter in a logical way, I want to brush aside a few matters that came from the argument of the gentleman who spoke in behalf of the majority report—no; not the majority report, for there is no majority report—but in behalf of the resolution to unseat this contestee and seat the contestant, a resolution supported by two reports, being a division of the majority into two factions.

Now, sir, these gentlemen content themselves with making the broad declaration—they assume it and take it for granted—that every man who is a colored man is necessarily a Republican. I want to call the attention of the House to the condition of affairs which existed in that county of Dallas, where the principal part of this contest is located. The proof shows that the Republican party there was in a state of disorganization; that it was without any leadership urging it on to united effort; that it had abandoned its purpose in that line; that they had been in the habit of voting indifferently as they chose. The negroes themselves testified to the fact. It is in the evidence here in the cause, and these gentlemen know it is true.

Not only that, but the leading white Republican of that county, Judge Craig, who had the honor of representing the district in the Congress of the United States, and who in times gone by has been chosen judge of his district, testifies that there are in the county of Dallas normally from 100 to 200 colored Democratic voters. He says that is a conservative statement of the colored Democratic voters in Dallas County; and moreover, Judge Craig testifies that frequently the negroes, even Republican negroes, when there is a popular Democrat in the field, will vote for him as against anybody else; that they do it, and that even when there is a popular Republican antagonist, he says that from 100 to 200 colored voters in the county can be counted as reliably Democratic. Not only that, but I do not want any gentleman here to forget other testimony which is significant, as given by Judge Craig, and that is that there are not more than from 100 to 200 white Republicans in Dallas County. There are not more than 300 white Republicans and Populists and "Jeffersonian Democrats" all told. Yet he testifies that there are from 2,500 to 2,600 white voters in the county of Dallas, all Democratic with the exception of from 100 to 200 Republicans, and, including the Populists, not more than 300 at the outside; but he says that a conservative estimate of the Democratic white vote in that county is 2,400.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of these facts proven by the record, what do we contemplate here? We contemplate a majority of this committee coming before the House of Representatives and asking Congress to disfranchise two-thirds of the white vote of Dallas County, in the State of Alabama, because fraud has been proven in certain precincts. While we have agreed with them and have cast out the votes in the precincts where proof of fraud was at all reliable, this record bristles, on the other hand, with the testimony of colored men who swear that there are Democratic negroes in the county, and some of them swear that they voted for Robbins. One swears that he votod for him because he is a friend of their people.

Mr. Speaker, it is outside of the record; no gentleman is bound by it; but inasmuch as so much has been said outside of the record, I hope I may be indulged to say that any gentleman who lives in the South knows more of the character of the colored man than those who are not associated with him in life.

There is one thing of which the colored man is proud and has a right to be proud of, and that is his franchise. It was bestowed upon him before he was prepared for it, but I concede every honor to the Republican party for which it has any right of contention in this respect. I want to tell you that every Southern man knows that the negro is going to vote, if he is given a chance. He does not want to lose his vote, he will tell you; and he will vote for the man who solicits it and says to him, "I am your friend; come and stand with me." In my own district, and at my own home, there are colored men who are professed Republicans, who will tell anybody, and swear on the stand that they are Republicans, and yet no Republican can take them away from their Democratic friends in elections. They are our friends; they have confidence in us; we have rendered each other mutual services; the white Democrats have been kind to them, and they stand by us. Of course I do not mean the majority, but many. The contestee resides in the county of Dallas. His home is in the city of Selma, and yet if colored men go to the polls and vote for him, and their names appear on the poll lists, this House is told that that is a badge of fraud, even when the proof is that the contestant himself had issued notice to them and sent his emissaries to say, "I do not want your votes." My friend from Massachusetts said here yesterday that it was only negroes, as I understood him—I do not want to misquote him—in Dallas County who were requested not to register or vote.

Mr. MOODY. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said it was only Republicans who were requested not to register and vote.

Mr. DINSMORE. So far as we are able to ascertain from the report, it was the organized opposition to the Democracy that was enjoined not to vote there. So far as I have been able to discover, the Populists and the Jeffersonian Democrats also refrained from voting, and not only that, the white Republicans refrained. This was a common understanding between the opposition.

Here is the evidence of the contestant himself, in the record, which I read from:

The Republicans, Populists, and Jeffersonian Democrats remained away from the polls in accordance with a prearranged plan.

And yet when they are instructed by a "prearranged plan," when there is an agreement, and when the contestant himself has testified that they remained away, when they show here that Judge Craig says that Mr. Aldrich disfranchised him; when we come and ask this House to count the votes that were cast for Gaston A. Robbins, we are told "you can not do that." Twenty-four hundred white voters must be disfranchised because you are unwilling to count any colored voters for the contestee in this case. Mr. Speaker, have we not the right to judge from all the evidence we have here as to how men voted? Why, the contestant in his notice of contest admits that a sufficient number of votes were actually and legally cast, more than enough, to elect Robbins, and he says his friends of all parties of the opposition remained away, did not vote; and yet he says afterwards, in his desire for the seat, that many—how many he does not pretend to know or say—were cast for him.

Now, before proceeding further, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the attention of the House for a short time as to the legal aspect of the case. I stated before that the question for us to consider is who, as a matter of fact—and if we can ascertain it from the record it is our duty to do it—received a majority of the legal votes actually cast at that election, for the one who did is the chosen member for the Fourth Alabama district. After eliminating those townships wherein there was fraud, after eliminating all votes not proven to be fraudulent, it is our duty to determine who received the greater number of those that remain, which one of the parties, the contestant or the contestee, is entitled to a seat in this House.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, we have in the views of the minority called attention to the fact that the notice of contest is not in compliance with law. I do not propose to dwell upon that. That point was ridiculed by my valued friend from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] in his most entertaining speech; and the further question of the right of the notary to take the depositions in this case and the validity of the evidence in the case were ridiculed by my distinguished friend from North Carolina. He said that no lawyer who had a license for two days should dare take such a position as we have taken, or that there was no lawyer who had a license two days who would not be ashamed to take such a position. That may be the gentleman's opinion.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that from the learned gentleman's own argument he had no conception of the question involved, and that when he came to present that question he did not seem to know that there were two questions that were distinct and dependent upon separate grounds. I will read from the record what is stated upon that question. In the first instance we demur to the notice of contest, and, as I said a moment ago, upon this I do not care to dwell, but leave it to the House for its consideration. I will pause here long enough to state the objection to it. The proof taken is not in pursuance of the notice of contest. The notice of contest is not explicit and specific, according to my judgment, as the law requires that it should be. It called attention to the fact that there was fraud in certain precincts. It said that "you are accredited with so many votes when you did not get so many." It does not say how many votes were fraudulent. It says, "I received of the votes really cast more than were returned for me," but does not state what proportion nor how many.

I deem it sufficient to let the matter rest there.

The other question is, whether or not the notary who took all the depositions in Dallas County had authority to act, whether or not the oath administered by him to the witnesses was a valid and binding oath, and whether the testimony taken before him is testimony for the consideration of this House, since, having been appointed a notary for the county of Chilton, he took the testimony in the counties of Calhoun and Dallas, beyond the limits of his jurisdiction.

Those are the two questions. Now let me refer to the speech of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina. Here is what he says:

Why, my friend has raised the point in his report, and it is the first objection made, that the notice of contest was defective; that it was not stated with sufficient accuracy, with sufficient technical certainty. They wanted more certainty than is required in the pleadings in any court. They wanted more certainty than has ever been known in any tribunal that I ever heard of. They say the notice will not do, when it is a straight-out allegation of rascality and fraud at that election, and when it gives notice of what they were going to do. Why, it must be clear, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] put it, that when the Federal Government, when the Congress of the United States, having charge of these Federal elections, confers upon any person, no matter who, the right to take depositions, that he exercises that right, not by virtue of a State law, but by virtue of the power given him by the Federal statute.

He is mixing up the two questions here; he seems incapable of separating them; and yet he presumes to lecture other gentlemen for their opinions as lawyers, and says that no lawyer who had had a license for two days ought to take such a position.

But let us follow him further:

Suppose, as my friend suggested, the statute had said that any justice of the peace should have this power. Does anybody deny it? Suppose it had said any minister of the gospel should have this power. Does anybody deny it?

This upon the notarial question. Now see him flounder over to the question of notice, not conscious, apparently, that it is a different one entirely.

In my State it is the law—and I believe I can safely say it is the law in the State in question here—that in taking depositions all you have to do is to put in your notice the name of the party before whom the deposition is to be taken, and it does not matter who he is; if your State statute authorizes it, he is properly authorized to take the depositions.

Now, let us go to the consideration of the question of the power of the notary to act. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that in the only case where this House had adjudicated this question it has been determined adversely to my contention. In the case of Washburn vs. Voorhees the House found that the authority conferred by the statute of the United States created an individual officer for the purpose of taking the testimony and did not recognize or designate an officer already constituted and authorized under State law to take it. It is upon this point that we take issue with the view laid down in the case cited. Let me first read the statute as it was at the time the decision in the case of Washburn against Voorhees was rendered. Here it is, and the House will observe that it is different from the law as it now stands. It provides that—

When any such contestant or returned member shall be desirous of obtaining testimony respecting such election, it shall be lawful for him to make application to any judge of any court of the United States, or to any chancellor, judge, or justice of a court of record of any State, or to any mayor, recorder, or intendant of any town or city in which said officer shall reside, within the Congressional district in which the said contested election was held, who shall thereupon issue his writ of subpœna, etc.

In that case the law specified that the officer before whom the testimony was taken, if a mayor, could take it in the city in which he resided, and in that case of Washburn vs. Voorhees the testimony was taken before a mayor who went outside of his jurisdiction and all around the county taking testimony. The statute said that if he was a mayor, recorder, or intendant he could take the testimony in the town where he resided. What else does this statute say? It says that no witness shall be required to go beyond the limit of his county to testify.

Now, what was the purpose of the Congress of the United States in enacting that statute? Was it to take a man who was already an officer under State authority and make him an officer to take this testimony? Was it to take a man who was already a judge, a member of the judiciary, and reinvest him with authority as a judge? Was it the purpose to take a man who was judge of a court of record under State authority and reinvest him with authority to act in a judicial capacity? Or was it the intention of Congress to designate an officer already accredited with authority and vested with the power to administer oaths to exercise his jurisdiction in behalf of Congress in taking testimony in contested-election cases? With all respect for those who hold contrary opinions to mine, it does not seem to me that that is in accordance with reason. But let us examine the statute itself, the statute under which this case arises:

SEC. 110. When any contestant or returned member is desirous of obtaining testimony respecting a contested election, he may apply for a subpœna to either of the following officers who may reside within the Congressional district in which the election to be contested was held:

First. Any judge of any court of the United States.

Second. Any chancellor, judge, or justice of a court of record of any State.

Third. Any mayor, recorder, or intendant of any town or city.

Fourth. Any register in bankruptcy or notary public.

SEC. 111. The officer to whom the application authorized by the preceding section is made shall thereupon issue his writ of subpœna, directed to all such witnesses as shall be named to him, requiring their attendance before him, at some time and place named in the subpœna, in order to be examined respecting the contested election.

SEC. 112. In case none of the officers mentioned in section 110 are residing in the Congressional district from which the election is proposed to be contested, the application thereby authorized may be made to any two justices of the peace residing within the district, and they may receive such application and jointly proceed upon it.

Then, in section 115 it is provided that—

No witness shall be required to attend an examination out of the county in which he may reside or be served with a subpœna.

Will gentlemen contend that Congress believed there was a district in the United States where there was no judge of any court of record? Will any gentleman contend that Congress believed there was any district in the United States where there was no notary public? Certainly not. But Congress was consulting the convenience of the parties contestant and contestee, by permitting them to go before any "officer" residing within the bounds of his jurisdiction and employ his services in taking the necessary testimony, and in case there was no judge of a court of record at the time residing in the county, or no district judge of the United States, then the parties need not go into an adjoining county to find a judge, but the testimony might be taken by a notary or one of the other officers mentioned.

But without regard to that point, the argument is the same. It is manifest that Congress intended not to create an office, but to designate an officer already existing by virtue of the authority of the State in which he was living and to avail itself of his services for the purpose required. The language is that when the party desires to take testimony "he may apply to either of the following officers."

"Officers" shall be selected. "But," said a distinguished gentleman—from Indiana, I believe—yesterday, "suppose Congress had said 'any person.'" Why, sir, the gentleman's question answers his own proposition. If Congress had said "any person," that would have vested the person with authority for the purpose, but it would have been looked upon by every lawyer in the land as a most absurd piece of legislation. Every man would have been constituted an officer under the statute. But the act does not say "person"; it does not say "minister of the gospel"; it does not say any of these persons enumerated outside of the statute, but it says "the following officers," enumerating different officers already in existence as officers having authority by the law of their creation to administer oaths. And it is my opinion as a lawyer, however little credit may be attached to it, or however little it may deserve, that it never was the purpose of Congress to create new officials, but to select and designate such officers as were already vested with legal authority and to authorize them to take the testimony required by this statute.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that a precedent established by the House of Representatives is worthy of the same consideration which the solemn, deliberate judgment of an unbiased court has a right to demand from it. We all know what a precedent amounts to in this House. We are frail; we come here battling for partisan supremacy; we come here seeking by every means at our command to secure some advantage over the opposition. Gentlemen know that in past election cases the decisions of this House are not entitled to that consideration to which the dignified, deliberate judgments of unbiased courts are entitled. I do not feel bound by the decision in Washburn vs. Voorhees. I do not feel that Congress is even bound by the judgment of a court if it is wrong, much less by a decision of this House, when everybody knows that these precedents are disregarded whenever it suits the convenience of the party wishing to do so, and when everybody knows that the temper entering into the adjudication of these questions is not a judicial temper but a partisan one in nine cases out of ten.

Now, then, this notary public who took all this testimony in Dallas County and all the testimony in Calhoun County was brought from another county for the purpose; he traveled all around with the contestant; he managed the contestant's election. He was brought over for the purpose of taking this testimony. Nobody else would do. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is my deliberate judgment that this is not legal evidence. There is no witness who testified before that notary who could be convicted in a court of competent jurisdiction of the crime of perjury, for under the law of Alabama the jurisdiction of a notary public is restricted to the limits of the county for which he is appointed. If the testimony taken by this notary is not legal evidence, the contest must fail, for it leaves us with the vote as returned by the election officers.

Now, there is one legal proposition which, while it was ignored by gentlemen on the other side in a large part of their argument yesterday, will not be denied by any gentleman in this House upon either side of the Chamber, and that is as to the duty of Congress where there is fraud proven. I read from McCrary on Elections, pages 331 and 332. The rule laid down in this House in the case of Howard vs. Cooper is thus quoted:

When the result in any precinct has been shown to be so tainted with fraud that the truth can not be deducible therefrom, then it should never be permitted to form a part of the canvass. The precedents as well as the evident requirements of truth not only sanction but call for the rejection of the entire poll when stamped with the characteristic here shown.

Commenting on the rule thus laid down, this author says:

The rule just stated needs the following explanation in order that it may be correctly understood. The committee, no doubt, meant to say that if the result, as shown by the returns, is tainted with fraud, the returns are to be rejected as false and worthless. But as we have elsewhere seen, the question whether the entire vote of the precinct shall be rejected for fraud depends upon another question, viz, whether from the evidence it is possible to obtain the true results. The returns may be rejected as fraudulent; and yet the true vote may in some cases be ascertained; and when it can be ascertained independently of the rejected returns, the law requires that it be respected and enforced. When the true vote can not be ascertained either from the returns or from evidence aliunde, the vote of the precinct must be rejected.

In adopting this rule the committee do not lose sight of the danger which may attend its application. Wholesome and salutary, not less than necessary, in its proper use, it is extremely liable to abuse. Heated partisanship and blind prejudice, as well as indifferent investigation, may under its cover work great injustice. It is not to be adopted if it can be avoided. No investigation should be spared that would reach the truth without a resort to it. But it is not to be forgotten or omitted if the case calls for its application.

Here is a wholesome proposition of law upon such a question as this. Why, sir, a gentleman said to me yesterday in conversation, a gentleman of the opposition: "If there were so much proof of fraud in these other townships, I am in favor of throwing the whole thing out." Sir, that is the only thing I fear from this House; that is the thing against which I protest. All I ask of you is to judge of the issues with reference to the precincts which are not successfully attacked for fraud; if then you believe that the contestant was elected, unseat the contestee, and nobody can censure your action. But if you rush to a conclusion simply from the appearance of fraud, then you have done injustice to the Fourth district of Alabama and its people—not only to them, but to yourselves and the Government which you represent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the consideration of such gentlemen as honor me with their attention to this matter as it has been judicially determined by the committee, in so far as it has been judicially determined. In the first place, there are six counties in the district, Calhoun, Chilton, Cleburne, Dallas, Shelby, and Talladega. Of these six counties the contest is narrowed down to two by the proof, for although the contestant gave notice that all manner of fraud and bulldozing had been committed in two other counties, he offered no testimony whatever to show it.

It was said on yesterday by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], in the discussion of this question, that the contestant had carried all of the other counties. That, Mr. Speaker, was a mistake. If he had examined the record he would have found that it was not correct. It is true the contestant came to Dallas County with a majority of 1,612 in his favor, but he did not carry all of the other counties, as the gentleman has said. He came with a majority of 1,612. What is it? He comes to Dallas County with this majority——

Mr. DANIELS. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to correct one statement that he has just made. He has said that the contestant came to Dallas County with a majority of 1,612. The contestee concedes in his brief that he came with 1,654 down to Dallas County.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, it may be. I was speaking simply from memory, and was only using the figures to illustrate a point. The exact number is immaterial for the purpose of the argument; but I will accept the statement of the gentleman, and will modify the number accordingly. So the contestant, according to the testimony, came to Dallas County with a majority of 1,654. Now, according to the testimony of the Republican witnesses in this case, there are 2,500 Democratic white voters in the county of Dallas. The contestant, then, comes to a county having all of these Democratic white voters, a county in which the voters belonging to the organization opposed to the Democratic candidate had been instructed not to register, and not to go to the polls, and not to vote; a county where the Republicans had been enjoined to remain from the polls, and, as insisted in the notice of contest and in the brief of the contestant himself, they did so remain away, and took no part in the election.

Now, when the contestant came to this county with the majority I have specified, the members of this committee express themselves as amazed that the contestee comes out of that county with a majority in his favor. Why? Because a majority of the residents of that county are colored men, many of whom are proven to have voted the Democratic ticket, some proven to have voted for the contestee, all of whom had been enjoined to remain away from the polls; and not only that, but the white Republicans, the Populists, and the Jeffersonian Democrats adopted the same course. Is it, then, anything strange that the contestee should receive a majority of the votes of his own party in a county where all of the testimony shows the other side took no part in the election, a county having 2,500 Democrats; and are they astounded in the face of these facts that the contestee should have a majority of votes? This is the keynote of their argument; this is its tenor, although the fraud which was inquired into, and which was brought largely into notice in this discussion by these gentlemen because of the fact, the isolated fact, that there is fraud or was fraud in the conduct of the election, has had its influence.

Now, you restrict the fraud to those localities where the evidence shows that it existed, and having done that you will find, gentlemen, I believe, if you will consider this case dispassionately, and without any political bias or prejudice, that the contestee was duly elected and is entitled to the seat he holds on this floor by virtue of the certificate of the governor of his State.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry just there?

Mr. DINSMORE. With pleasure.

Mr. COX. When you come to the county of Dallas, estimated to be a large Republican county, and where instructions had been given to the Republicans not to attend the election or to vote, and the majority is overcome by the Democratic candidate, what I wish to know is as to the exact vote of that county.

Mr. DINSMORE. If my friend will be patient for a moment, I am just about proceeding to that point.

Mr. COX. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him, but I wanted to know the exact vote there.

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not regard it as an interruption. That is a consideration of the question that I propose to address myself to immediately. Now, as I have said, there are six counties which I have named in this district. Three of these are not questioned. There was a contest in the county of Calhoun at a certain precinct involving only a small vote. There were also beats in the city of Anniston, in Wards 1, 2, 3, and 4 of that city, where a question was made by the contestant as to the accuracy of the votes cast. The contest in these instances, however, depended entirely upon different ground from that involved in the Dallas vote. The committee considered this case with reference to all of these disputed precincts, and the majority of the committee found this vote to be unsuccessfully assailed, and that it should be counted as returned. Seven out of nine of the members of the committee so found, and not only a majority of the committee itself, but a majority of the Republicans on the committee, determined that there was not fraud in these wards, and that that vote should stand as returned by the officers of election. Am I not authorized, then, in view of these facts, to ask the House to so find, and to count this vote as returned, when four of their own members of the majority side of the House say that it should not be attacked? This is all there is outside of Dallas County, and I content myself with this summary method of dealing with it, as it is not necessary to take up the time of the House further in a discussion of that branch of the subject.

Now, there were certain portions of Dallas County which we concede must be counted. I have made a tabulated statement of that part which ought to be counted and is supported by a majority of the committee. It is as follows:

County.	Robbins.	Aldrich.
Uncontested:
Chilton	320	785
Cleburne	562	677
Talladega	1,390	2,110
As counted by seven members of the committee:
Calhoun	1,838	1,481
Shelby	920	1,631
Dallas:
Uncontested beats	221	42
Liberty Hill beat	274	----
As counted by five members of the committee:
Dallas:
Summerfield	29	2
Martins	60	----
Lexington	37	1
River	8	----
Union	6	----
Pences	31	----
Elm Bluff	7	----
Carlowville	31	----
Boykins	11	----
Mitchells	16	----
Total	6,527	6,734

In the counties of Chilton, Cleburne, and Talladega there was no contest, and in Shelby County only one precinct is contested, while in Calhoun County I have already referred to wards 1, 2, 3, and 4, in the city of Anniston, where contestant claims that he received votes that were not returned for him. There is no contest as to the remainder of these counties. In Dallas County the uncontested beats should be counted, and nobody controverts that, including also Liberty Hill, one of the contested beats, where contestant charged fraud existed; and in that township seven members of the committee, three Democrats of the minority and four Republicans of the majority, say that Liberty Hill should be counted as given in the returns, that it has not been assailed successfully, and that this beat should stand as recorded.

After Liberty Hill we have figured in this table the following votes, which it is agreed were actually received by the contestant and contestee in the beats of Summerfield, Martins, Lexington, River, Union, Pences, Elm Bluff, Carlowville, Boykins, Mitchells, and City beat—that is, the town of Selma. Upon this computation, upon the count as here stated, a majority of the Committee on Elections have reported to this House.

The venerable and able chairman of the committee [Mr. DANIELS] himself has joined in this count, as has also Mr. COOKE, another Republican member of the committee, and say that a Republican House should count the vote as so reported. Then that leaves a majority for Aldrich of 207 votes. But we are not through with all the beats. There are three more beats, and here is where the battle lies. The beats of Orrville, Woodlawn, and Oldtown the minority of this committee say should be counted as returned by the election officers, and if you do so you seat the contestee. If you count any two of them you seat the contestee.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], who opened the argument upon the other side of the Chamber yesterday, stated that we had agreed to throw out certain beats. But, he says, here the gentlemen were forced to stop, because if they had not they would have seated Mr. Aldrich. I might retort, Mr. Speaker, with more justice than gives sanction to the insinuation of the gentleman against us that we have acted not in honesty but in a partisan spirit—I might retort upon a majority of the committee if I thought proper to do so, but I refrain.

Mr. MOODY. If the gentleman understood anything I said yesterday as a reflection in the slightest degree upon the Democratic members of the committee, I beg leave to withdraw it and to say that I had no such intention whatever.

Mr. DINSMORE. I am perfectly sure that my good friend, for whom I have the highest respect, was only influenced in saying what he did say by the heat of debate, and not by any belief on his part that any gentleman of the minority had been actuated by any except proper motives in arriving at his conclusion. But it is in the RECORD. It was stated on the floor; and I could not but refer to it in self-defense.

Mr. Speaker, if I do not offer reasons why these beats should be counted for the contestee, I can not expect you to give them credit. With a vacant side of the House staring me in the face, I can not expect to convince absentees; but I appeal to such as honor me with their attention and manifest a desire to know something about this case to hear the views as expressed by the minority, to consider them well, and also what I shall have to say.

At this point I want to advert once more to the speech made by my delightful friend from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY]. Mr. Speaker, that distinguished gentleman started out by swinging incense before the memory of Blackstone, pronouncing a panegyric upon Jere Black and the distinguished sons of his own State, Judge Pearson and Judge Settle, all eminent lawyers. The gentleman himself honored the bench upon which he once sat. He revels in the glory of the ermine; but the speech which he made yesterday, I regret to say, does not partake of the spirit and dignity of the bench, does not evince the judicial mind, as did the gentleman's utterances and reputation while he served upon the bench, before he became a member of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, he spoke very eloquently; he challenged the admiration of the opposition; he won the rapt attention of his own side; he evoked the enthusiastic applause of the galleries, but what he said outside of the argument that I have already referred to had nothing whatever to do with the question involved before the House as it now stands. Did he take the evidence in this case that is here for your consideration, upon which you are asked to consider the issues now, as to the controverted questions? Not at all. He amused the House and entertained himself by reading from the record here page after page of the testimony with reference to deceased and absent negroes down in Alabama, in Dallas County; but not one word of that evidence applied to any beat which is in controversy. It was all with reference to River beat and other beats which are conceded by the minority as fraudulent, and which have been cast out of consideration, which the House is not asked by us to consider. And yet the gentleman won the praise of his side and the applause of the gallery, and the encomiums of the press for his bold, defiant attack upon "Southern methods" of conducting elections.

Suppose somebody had come before my distinguished friend when he was on the bench, and an issue was made before him, an issue well defined from the pleadings, and this man had got up and sawed the air and stamped and fumed upon matters irrelevant and outside of the case. My friend from North Carolina would have rapped him down and told him he did not care to hear him upon such matters. I state this deliberately, I mean what I say, that every word of the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina upon testimony in this case relative to Dallas County was upon beats which the minority cast out and do not ask the House to consider at all.

Mr. COX. And the majority agreed to that?

Mr. DINSMORE. Why, we all agreed. There was no dissenting voice on that.

Mr. PITNEY. If I understood you, the minority of this committee agreed that the returns from those 10 precincts, or whatever the number was, should be cast out?

Mr. DINSMORE. We did.

Mr. PITNEY. The ground of your action was that there was plenary evidence of a widespread conspiracy to commit fraud——

Mr. DINSMORE. The gentleman is in error in that statement.

Mr. PITNEY. Let me finish my question, and then the gentleman can make any correction he thinks necessary. The majority of the committee claimed there was evidence of a widespread conspiracy, manifesting itself by certain methods adopted in each of these precincts. The minority of the committee agree that those 10 returns shall be thrown out. Does the gentleman not think that the evidence of the conspiracy and the evidence of the methods adopted in the 10 precincts which the minority have agreed shall go out is to be taken into consideration, together with other corroboratory evidence which relates particularly to those other beats which it is proposed to dispute?

Mr. DINSMORE. If the gentleman is a lawyer, as I presume he is, he is familiar with the principle of law that until after a conspiracy has been established by proof you can not introduce proof to connect parties with the conspiracy; and I maintain that there is no conspiracy proven in this case. There is not a syllable of evidence that justifies a conclusion of the existence of a conspiracy.

Mr. PITNEY. My contention is that there was a conspiracy to commit fraud in this case.

Mr. DINSMORE. I insist that there is no evidence of a conspiracy. Gentlemen may assume a conspiracy, but there is not a particle of proof of it. When they attempt it, they go back for a generation and refer to the past condition in that district.

Mr. PITNEY. I do so by referring to the evidence in these 10 precincts. Was there not substantial proof of a conspiracy in these 10 districts? Was not the character of fraudulent methods the same in all?

Mr. DINSMORE. My dear unconverted friend, the frauds in connection with elections are similar in every beat, in every district, in every county and State election throughout the Government where fraud is committed; and there are but certain kinds of frauds that may be successfully resorted to. One is stuffing the ballot boxes; another is padding the poll list; another is permitting men not entitled to vote to vote, and making false returns, and another that of buying votes; and that is all. But it is insisted—and here I will pause to advert to that—it is stated defiantly that the probate judge was the chief conspirator. It was stated repeatedly. My friend from Massachusetts nods his head. The judge of probate was stated to be the chief conspirator in this fraud. The only evidence in this case against the judge of probate was that he is the man who appoints the inspecting officers and the man who has control of the archives, who when a letter, or letters, if you please, unaccompanied by fees, making a demand for a copy of the registration list were sent to him, failed to send it. There is no evidence in this case that anybody ever went to him and asked for it. Why, the gentleman from Massachusetts said that nobody had ever seen the list. "No eye has ever seen this registration list." Now, I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to know where he got this information?

Mr. MOODY. From the record.

Mr. DINSMORE. The record makes no such disclosure.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information, to know whether we correctly understand what the gentleman has stated with reference to the evidence in this case which was read by the gentleman from North Carolina yesterday. Do I understand you to say that what he read was not evidence in the case?

Mr. DINSMORE. No, sir; I did not make such a statement.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. We may have misunderstood you. Do I understand you, then, to say that if the testimony which he read was taken in this case that it was not germane to the issue.

Mr. DINSMORE. Is the gentleman ready for an answer?

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. DINSMORE. The reason why I insist that it was not applicable is because that testimony was taken to show that fraud was committed in certain beats—the River beat, Union, and one or two others—no matter what beat; but the whole committee, without reference to party, every member of the committee, agree that they should be cast out, and were cast out, and are not now being considered on the result. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. And there is no issue upon it.

Mr. DINSMORE. There is no issue upon it; and yet the gentleman from North Carolina, with a judicial record behind him, blazed here with fiery eloquence on propositions which nobody controverts. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I am asked by gentlemen about me to request unanimous consent that the gentleman now speaking may conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas has ten minutes remaining of his time.

Mr. MOODY. It is very apparent from my knowledge of the case that the gentleman's remarks can not be concluded within ten minutes; and I make the request now, so that the gentleman from Arkansas can speak upon the subject at his best discretion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may be allowed to proceed without limit. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend and colleague, and assure the House that I shall endeavor not to abuse its patience and its indulgence.

Mr. Speaker, I want to continue the consideration of the testimony further. Certain gentlemen have talked about a conspiracy. I was going on to say, when I was interrupted, that the charge is made that the judge of probate is the chief conspirator, and yet all that they can allege against him from the record is the fact that when he was written to by Hardy, the chairman of the Populist central committee, and by Mr. Aldrich, two letters, in neither of which were inclosed the fees for a copy of the registration list, that it was not furnished. The evidence does show that, if I am not mistaken, and I do not want to misrepresent anything. I studied it very carefully, and I will attempt to state nothing outside of it.

There is no proof that Aldrich ever went to him and demanded it. There is no proof that Hardy ever went to him and demanded it. There is no proof that either of them ever tendered the fees for this registration list. On the contrary, the evidence in this case convinces me that they were merely trying to lay the foundation for a contest and that they did not, in good faith, want a registration list. However that may be, nobody will deny that they could have gotten it, or, if anybody does deny that, certainly nobody will deny that the best way to have obtained it was the way which they did not take, namely, to go to the judge of probate and said: "Here, you are the custodian of these records; as such custodian you have in your possession the registration list of Dallas County; I want a copy of it, and here is the money for it." But they did nothing of that kind. There is no such testimony in the case, and there are 100 pages of testimony in this case certified by this same judge of probate of Dallas County.

But gentlemen say there is another point to show that this judge was guilty of glaring fraud. What is that? Why, that he refused or neglected or failed to appoint as inspectors of election individuals selected by Mr. Aldrich, the contestant, for that purpose. Mr. Speaker, there is no law requiring the judge to appoint those persons, and no gentleman will say that there is. The law requires that the inspectors shall be of different parties; that is all. No right is given to the candidate by the law of Alabama to demand that certain individuals shall be appointed, but the law does distinctly provide that the inspectors appointed shall be of different political parties, or that there must be appointment from the opposition, and Mr. Aldrich testifies that he did not know the politics of the men whom he asked to have appointed. As a matter of fact, a number of them were Democrats, and that being so, the probate judge had no authority to appoint them, because that would have been to make all the appointments from one party.

I want to bring the House to an understanding of the true attitude of this matter. Fraud is charged against the probate judge because he refused to appoint persons as inspectors whose appointment had been requested by the contestant, who had no right to make such a demand. Then there is a charge of fraud against this probate judge for failing to furnish a copy of the registration list when in fact there was no proper demand made for that list. Now, is this House, upon this flimsy pretext, to dishonor this officer and affirm the statements made by my friend from Massachusetts that this judge of probate was the arch conspirator in the scheme for the perpetration of fraud in that county?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I know the gentleman from Arkansas does not desire to misrepresent our position.

Mr. DINSMORE. I certainly do not.

Mr. MOODY. Our position is not that the judge of probate went beyond his duty in declining to appoint the persons whose names were presented to him, but that in 10 of the 13 beats that are found to have been fraudulent he did not conform to the provision of law which requires that each party shall have a representative at the polls, and that the proof in the record is abundant and conclusive upon that subject. Our position is that it was that action of the judge of probate, in direct contravention of the law, which made every one of these fraudulent precincts possible; so that if anybody in the world is responsible for the frauds which resulted in every case where there was not a representative at the polls, the judge of probate is the man.

Mr. DINSMORE. If anybody is responsible for the frauds—that leaves the case in a very nebulous condition. But the gentleman says that what they complain of on the other side is that in a number of these beats the judge appointed ignorant negroes as judges of election.

Mr. MOODY. No; in one beat.

Mr. DINSMORE. And that he did not appoint—whom? Whom do you contend that he ought to have appointed?

Mr. MOODY. I have tried to make myself clear.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, it is no doubt due to my stupidity, and not to the gentleman's want of perspicuity.

Mr. MOODY. I am quite certain that you are wrong on that point, at any rate. Our contention is that the law entitles Mr. Aldrich and the party supporting him to one inspector at each poll, and that it was the duty of the judge of probate to appoint such a person. We do not say that it was his duty to appoint the person suggested by the candidate; he was not compelled to do that under the law, but he ought to have selected and appointed somebody who was a Republican or a Populist or a Jeffersonian Democrat. He did not do so except in three beats. In one of those three there was appointed, by accident, a Republican; in another place an ignorant negro was appointed to sit between his former master in the days of slavery and the person upon whose place he lived; and in the third place the appointee was a purchasable negro, as to whom I am sure the gentleman from Arkansas would not believe a word that he says. They were the only representatives that the contestant had; and what we complain about is the conduct of the probate judge who made all this fraud possible.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I regret to be in the attitude in which I am left by the majority of the committee and by the contestant whom they represent, with reference to this man whom the gentleman says I would not believe on oath. I confess that I have some suspicions about this individual; and I regret not to be able to give the utmost confidence to the testimony which the contestant has offered here and upon which he asks this House to seat him. I regret that the character of a number of witnesses in this case is such as not to entitle them to be believed by myself or anybody else. But as to this one witness who the gentleman says is unworthy of credit, I take occasion to remark that he ought to be entitled to some respect at least from Republicans, since he was at that time the chairman of the Republican central committee of the county of Dallas, and was a leader of the delegation that nominated Mr. Aldrich as the candidate of the Republican party for Congress. [Laughter.]

It is claimed that at certain beats there was no Republican appointed and that Mr. Aldrich had a right to expect such appointments. I deny that contention. There is nothing in the law on which to base it. What is required by the law is that a "member of the opposition" be appointed—he may be a Populist; he may be a Republican. And wherever the law could be complied with it was done. The proof shows that in some beats there was not a single white Republican, so that none but black Republicans, men who were ignorant, or a majority of whom were so, could be appointed.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DINSMORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PITNEY. I wish to make a suggestion concerning the effort made by the contestant to secure the production of the original registry list or a certified copy of it.

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. PITNEY. The question has been raised as to the effort that the contestant made to produce in evidence, for the benefit of this House, the registry list of Dallas County, or a certified copy of it.

Mr. DINSMORE. That is the question I was discussing a few moments ago.

Mr. PITNEY. Now, the contestant made some effort in that direction; but the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] contends that he did not make a proper or sufficient effort. On that point I wish to make this suggestion: Inasmuch as the contestant showed other evidence attacking, admittedly on very strong grounds, the returns from 10 beats, attacking those returns with such force that the minority of the committee were obliged to agree with the majority that the returns should go out, is it not the gentleman's view that the contestant was right in his contention that the registry list would be very important evidence bearing upon those beats; and did not the evidence that he introduced concerning those beats cast the burden upon the contestee to make some effort to produce the original registry list, or a certified copy of it, for the information of the House?

Mr. DINSMORE. I shall not attempt to evade the embarrassing attitude of this case owing to the fact that the contestee did not take evidence. But in answer to the suggestion just made, I will say I do not feel it was incumbent upon him to do so; and unless the contestant himself shows that there was such fraud in every beat as to render the returns unworthy of credit, they should not go out. I insist further, as the only evidence offered for consideration here is that the contestant or his friends wrote two letters to this probate judge, never tendering him any fees and never going to him in person to make any demand, I insist that alone is insufficient to sustain the attack based on the ground of fraud or conspiracy. And I contend further that the neglect of the probate judge to appoint the men whom Aldrich asked him to appoint, when he did in fact appoint some of them, and when Mr. Aldrich had no right to demand the appointment of any particular person, is to my mind the flimsiest evidence upon which to ask Congress to find that a sworn officer has been guilty of fraud and conspiracy.

Mr. COX. Who wrote those letters?

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Aldrich wrote one, and Mr. Hardy, the chairman of the Republican committee, wrote another. I will turn to them. I read those letters as they appear on page 231 of the record:

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE,
September 25, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: I desire to obtain from your office a certified copy of the registered voters of Dallas County, by beats.

Please advise me how soon such a copy can be made and amount of your fees for the same.

Will you also kindly furnish these headquarters with list of inspectors for your county when appointed, and greatly oblige,

Yours, respectfully, W. F. ALDRICH.

Hon. P. G. WOOD,
Judge of Probate, Selma, Ala.

OCTOBER, 3, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: We wish to obtain a certified copy of the registration list of your county (Dallas), by beats.

Please inform us how soon we can get this list and amount of your fees therefor.

Fees will be remitted on notice from your office that the list is ready.

Most respectfully,

J. D. HARDY,
Chairman Republican Campaign Committee.
Per F. M. S., Secretary.

Hon. P. G. WOOD,
Judge of Probate, Selma, Ala.

Mr. MOODY. There is another letter on page 194.

Mr. DINSMORE. I will read it.

MY DEAR SIR: On the 3d instant I addressed you a letter, requesting a certified copy of the registration lists of your county (Dallas) by beat, and asking the amount of your fees therefor. To this I have no reply as yet. Will you kindly inform us how soon we can get said list and the amount of fees for the same?

Most respectfully,

J. D. HARDY, Chairman.

Hon. P. G. WOOD,
Judge of Probate, Dallas County, Selma, Ala.

Now I read from the sworn testimony of Mr. Aldrich immediately following that letter:

And I know of no other or further correspondence by him on that subject.

Q. Do you know the political affiliation of the persons whom you requested the board, whose power it is to appoint inspectors of elections, to appoint?

A. I do not in all cases.

Q. Do you know the political affiliations of the persons who were appointed and did serve?

A. No, I do not.

That is what Mr. Aldrich swears in his testimony, taken after the election. It is contended here that none of these Republicans were appointed, but Mr. Aldrich swears he does not know the political affiliations of the men who were appointed.

This is all of the correspondence, I believe, on the question of the registration list.

Mr. MOODY. No, there is Commissioner Holbrook's letter.

Mr. DINSMORE. I thought I had already referred to that. This letter is dated January 21, Selma, Ala., and I ask you to observe the headings of all of these letters. It is as follows:

SELMA, ALA., January 21, 1895.

DEAR SIR: You will please furnish me, at your earliest convenience, a certified copy of the original registration lists, as certified to you by the beat registrars, from the following beats in Dallas County, to wit: City precinct, No. 36; Orrville precinct, No. 8; River precinct, No. 10; Oldtown precinct, No. 12, and Liberty Hill precinct, No. 25.

Copies of the foregoing registration lists are desired for use as evidence in the contested election case wherein W. F. Aldrich is the contestant and Gaston A. Robbins is the contestee, in which case testimony is now being taken before me.

Yours, respectfully, S. S. HOLBROOK, N. P.

Hon. P. G. WOOD,
Judge of Probate of Dallas County, Selma, Ala.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence, there has never been any offered, so far as I remember, that any one of these letters ever came into the possession of the county judge.

Mr. MOODY. If the gentleman will pardon me, on page 196 of the record is the admission by counsel for contestee that the probate judge had received all of them.

Mr. DINSMORE. The gentleman is correct. I will read the statement. It is as follows:

Contestee further says that at the proper time and place he will show by competent witnesses that the said P. G. Wood, judge of probate, did furnish to the contestant in this cause a certified copy of the registration list, asked for by J. D. Hardy, chairman, in his letter dated October 3, 1894. Contestee will further show at the proper time and place that the request made in the letter dated January 21, 1895, signed by S. S. Holbrook, N. P., will be granted as soon as it is possible for the same to be done.

Contestee admits that the letter signed by J. D. Hardy, chairman, and addressed to P. G. Wood, probate judge, was received, and, in fact, all of the three letters above introduced were received, by P. G. Wood, but states that said P. G. Wood has ever been ready and willing to comply with the requests therein asked as soon as possible and the requirements of the law are properly met.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here are a number of letters, four in all, addressed to this man, dated and headed from Selma, Ala. Contestant evidently, as these letters show, was relying upon correspondence by letter addressed this way for the actual obtaining of these lists rather than by making the attempt in the usual manner, and in such a manner as a man who really desired to obtain the lists would have pursued. I confess that for the purpose of a contest it is perhaps better to have had it in writing, because there are the words; but if he actually wanted the lists, what would my friend from Massachusetts have done, what would my mercurial friend from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] have done, if he felt that he was being defrauded by an officer who had control of these lists? Why, would not either of them have gone at once and said: "We want this registration list; here is the money for it; give it to me at once in pursuance of my right, and here is your money to pay for it"? He would not wait to send a letter to him and ask him if he could furnish it, but he would go and tender the money for a copy of it, and say, "Now, give it to me." He would not have had to wait if he had done so, and I say that it is the most flimsy testimony, in my mind, ever presented here on which to ask a judicial tribunal to condemn a public official.

Mr. PITNEY. But is it not sufficient evidence on which a judicial tribunal might ask the other party to the contest to produce the testimony, or make an effort, at least, to do so?

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, I have already answered that suggestion of the gentleman once, and I do not think it necessary to repeat it. If he wants to decide this case on the ground that the contestee did not take testimony in his own behalf, he is at liberty, of course, to do so. But, as I have already said, while the contestee no doubt prejudiced his case by not taking the testimony in the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama, that district has a right to have this question decided on the testimony that has been taken. There can be no question of that fact.

Now, I have been detained so long at this point that I shall proceed at once to consider some other aspects of the question. I want to ask gentlemen to consider with me the Selma beat in Dallas County. Remember that up to this point, including the Selma beat, we have the sanction of a majority of this committee, to count, as stated in the table I have presented, all of the votes in Dallas County and the other counties all together, leaving out of consideration only Orrville, Old Town, and Woodlawn precincts, and leaving the parties in the attitude at this point that Mr. Aldrich will have a majority, by that proceeding of the committee, of 207 votes against the contestee, Mr. Robbins. But before I take up the three beats which it has been insisted by the minority shall be counted as returned, but against which all the majority have decided, I want to consider and concentrate your attention solely on the Selma beat of Dallas County.

I have consented with some reluctance, Mr. Speaker, to throw out the official returns of Selma. To my mind the testimony attacking it is meager. Such testimony as has been offered here to show that men voted in the precinct who did not actually vote has not been of as reliable a character as I would have wished. The testimony of a witness that he is acquainted with the people in a particular locality, and yet does not know a large number of names of men appearing on a certain list, is not to my mind such evidence as would enable any man, in the ordinary transactions of life, to consider it as satisfactory. Take a paper and show it to a man; here is one containing a list of names. "Do you recognize the names of those people living in this beat?" "Well, I recognize this, or that, and this [picking them out], but from here to here I do not recognize them." And yet here is this testimony. On this character of testimony the majority are asking you to disregard and discredit the returns, holding that it is evidence of fraud, though the law does not so specify. The law says that simply proving that a man of a certain name lives in another place and was not present when the voting was done is not sufficient evidence to challenge the vote of the same name when deposited in the ballot box. The law declares that there must be corroboration to show that the individual is one and the same person. Only in a very few sporadic instances have they fixed the identity of the individual himself. But Judge Craig says, "I do not know a number of these names," and the inspector of health of the district testified that he "did not recognize many of them." Now, I ask one of you gentlemen to try an experiment. Go home to-night, take up your mailing list from your own home in the city where you live. Run over it and see whether you are not confronted with name after name of men living at your own home that you can not recall and do not know anything about.

But the evidence discloses that in this beat there were two men employed who went and watched, and according to their testimony only between 700 and 750 votes could have been polled there, because only that many went into the polling place. They testified that they were there all day, from the time the polls were opened until after they were closed; that they could see; but there is evidence of various witnesses in this case that from the positions where they placed themselves it would have been impossible for them to have seen everybody that went in and out of the polling place. One supplied himself with live-oak acorns and the other with coffee grains, and whenever ten men went in one man would take a grain of coffee out of one pocket and put it into the other. The man with the acorns waited until he got a hundred. Then he would take an acorn out of one pocket and put it into the other. These men come in and testify that only seven hundred and odd votes could have been polled there, because only that many people went in. The testimony of more than one witness shows, as I say, that these men were not in a position, as stated by themselves, where they could have seen all the people who went in there. In addition to that, the testimony here shows that in this beat there are at least 1,250 white Democrats.

Judge Craig, the leading—and we may assume the most intelligent—white Republican in the city, a man who has represented the district in Congress, swears there are at least 1,250 white Democrats in the city. The testimony shows that there was an active canvass; the most active one that had been conducted for a number of years, that carriages and vehicles were plying in different parts of the town bringing the Democratic voters to the polls. I say when I agreed that only 762 votes—or whatever the number is—should be counted for this contestee, I did it believing that he had received twice that many votes. That is what I meant yesterday in response to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY], who assumed that we had conceded there were over 3,000 fraudulent votes in Dallas County. I conceded no such thing. I say that because we are unable—being of the opinion that the proof is sufficient to attack the validity of this return and to make it unreliable and doubtful—we are unable, when we look around for testimony to support any definite count, to find evidence on which to base any specific number, and we can only take the number which has been admitted by Mr. Aldrich in his notice of contest to have been cast, and proven by the witnesses, although in such an unsatisfactory way, to have gone in there.

I do not believe that Mr. Robbins got only 762 votes in this great beat, where the proof shows there are 1,250 white Democrats at least and at least 25 colored Democrats. I do not believe that Mr. Robbins got only 762 votes. I believe he got twice that many; for we must remember that this is a city of 10,000 inhabitants, a town with 1,250 white Democratic votes in it; and even Judge Craig puts the number as high as 1,400—from 1,250 to 1,400. He says when there is a popular Republican antagonist running, even then 1,250 Democratic votes can be reliably counted upon.

Talk about disfranchising people! Here is where the disfranchisement comes in. I do not resent any demand upon the part of the opposition, nor hold them responsible for this disfranchisement. It comes from the unreliability of the poll itself and the doubtful character of the return; but I do insist that when 762 votes are proved to have been cast, and are admitted by the contestant himself to have been cast in his notice of contest, when there was an active campaign and Democrats were being brought in carriages, when Judge Craig and the other Republicans testify that the Republicans did not vote, that the opposition to the Democrats did not vote, I contend that we are authorized to count those 762 votes for Gaston A. Robbins, and in this opinion I am supported by the judgment of the distinguished and venerable chairman of this committee, a man of reputation for judicial learning, and another one of my Republican colleagues upon the committee.

Now, it was charged that there was all manner of intimidation and bulldozing in this precinct. Mr. McIlwain, one of the witnesses called by the contestant—because these are all witnesses of the contestant—testifies as follows:

Q. Mr. McIlwain, were any deputy sheriffs around the polling place in the Shelby precinct?
A. Only one that I know.

Yet in the notice of contest it is said that there were great cohorts parading the streets, intimidating the voters and keeping them from the polls.

Q. Was there any intimidation at the polling places in the city precincts?
A. Not that I know of. I saw a good deal of conversation. I think they wanted me to leave there.

This is one of the watchers who is giving this testimony.

Q. Do you know of any attempt at bribery in the city precinct, No. 36, at that election?
A. Not of my own knowledge.
Q. Did you see any attempt to prevent legal electors from exercising their free choice in voting?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you see any browbeating of electors at the city precinct, No. 36?
A. I did not.
Q. Were there any threats to arrest made in city precinct, No. 36?
A. Not that I heard of.
Q. Do you know of any voter who would have voted for Mr. Aldrich and who was in any way prevented from voting for him by any deputy sheriff, or any friend of Mr. Robbins?
A. No, sir. I did not see any deputy sheriffs intimidate, or any friend of Mr. Robbins prevent voters from voting.

Now, that is upon the question of intimidation there. Other witnesses testified whose testimony I will not stop to read.

Now, I refer to Major Compton's testimony. Major Compton is a witness often referred to by gentlemen upon the other side. I want you to hear his testimony:

Q. You say that the Democratic ticket in 1888 polled 9,000 votes in Dallas County. There was no opposition ticket to the Democratic ticket in that election, was there?
A. My recollection is that there was none.
Q. Was that not a phenomenal vote for a Democratic ticket to receive in a Republican county?

A. That was a phenomenal vote for the Democrats to receive in Dallas County, which has been Democratic since 1878.
Q. About how many colored voters have you got in Dallas County, and how many white voters?

Is it of importance, gentlemen, to know how many voters there are?

A. There are in Dallas County, according to my judgment, about 2,400 white voters and there are about 7,000 colored voters.
Q. Now, Major, I want to ask you if you honestly believe that there are 3,000 Democratic voters in the county of Dallas on a fair, square count of the vote, every man being allowed to vote for the candidate of his choice?
A. I can only answer this question by saying that, according to my recollection, at no election held in Dallas County within the past eight years has the Democratic candidate for office received less than 3,000 votes, according to the returns made and certified to to the proper official.
Q. Major, that is not an answer to my question, and again I ask you if you honestly believe that, under a free ballot and a fair count, each voter in Dallas County being allowed to vote for the candidate of his choice, the Democratic party could poll 3,000 votes in this county?
A. With a popular candidate, I believe so.

Here is a man who hesitates and deliberates well upon his statement before he makes it. He says he thinks that a popular Democratic candidate can get 3,000 votes in a free and honest election there, if honestly counted.

Q. You say that there are 2,400 white voters in Dallas County. In your judgment how many of those white voters belong to the Populists or Jeffersonian Democratic party?
A. Well, my judgment is that there are not exceeding 150. I doubt if there are that many now.

Remember that.

Q. There being 150 Populists, that would leave 2,250 Democratic white voters, would it not? Where would the Democratic party get its other 750 votes from to give it 3,000 voters in this county?
A. From the negroes.

Had he any justification in saying that? Grigg says that there were between one and two hundred colored Democrats in that county, and you are told the same by other witnesses, this man Compton and others, that there were negroes whom, when they were approached by Democrats, they were able to induce to vote for them.

I will not detain the House further, as I promised not to abuse its indulgence, upon this beat. But let it suffice anyone, in conclusion, to say that I have made, that we of the minority have made, such a conservative estimate of the vote which should be counted for the contestee with this object, that the chairman of the committee, who is a Republican, and one of his associates, who is a Republican, has coincided with us, and if I have the misfortune of having my judicial friend from North Carolina formally turn against me upon this proposition, I rest secure in the arms of the chairman of the committee.

Now, then, in reference to three other beats—Woodlawn, Orville, and Oldtown. I will take Woodlawn first.

Mark you, Liberty Hill the chairman of the committee throws out for fraud. He and his associate [Mr. COOKE] throw Liberty Hill out for fraud; but the other four Republicans, even these hypercritical colleagues of ours on this committee, who are so jealous of every badge of fraud, say there is no ground why Liberty Hill can not be counted, giving the vote for Robbins and Aldrich there as shown. There are but three precincts where we of the minority stand alone—Woodlawn, Orrville, and Oldtown—and I will review the evidence concerning these as rapidly as possible.

I want to call attention to the argument of the gentleman with reference to the township of Woodlawn. I desire to ask attention to the speech of my distinguished friend; and when I say friend I mean it, because I have a sincere regard for my friend from Massachusetts, a gentleman of learning and ability, and in the committee room of calm, judicial demeanor. But he says in his speech of yesterday—let me refer to it, I have it here in the RECORD, fortunately, where it has been printed.

Now, with reference to the testimony of St. John Tavel. He was one of the inspectors of the election of this beat. He was one of the men who had been inspector at the election. Now, here is the testimony which the gentleman from Massachusetts quotes from:

How did he answer the first question submitted to him, which was:
"Q. Did more than 14 men vote at this election?
"A. I refuse to answer that question. I recognize that I am under oath now."

Then he goes further down and quotes from some of his testimony. Mr. MOODY says:

The counsel next asked him, after taking up the poll list: "Can you pick out of the list any other names than the 14 who have been named as voting?"
Now, there was a test. They were men who knew he lived in that beat, and he had lived there all his life, and he was an inspector of the elections. If he swore falsely and named specific names there was a strong chance of indictment for perjury. He responds:
"I can not.
"Q. Will you try?
"A. No."

What says my friend?

And it is on this testimony that the Democratic members of this committee would overturn the finding of the Republican majority. I leave it with you gentlemen here to determine, without another word.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] says the testimony of this witness is the testimony upon which the minority would ask you to overturn the findings of the majority as to this precinct. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to other testimony of Mr. St. John Tavel; and it is to the testimony that I want to confine myself upon this question. But I shall take occasion to say that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROYSE] in his statement yesterday tried to throw discredit upon him by saying that he said that was not as he signed his name. He never said he never wrote his name that way. The substance of that is that he sometimes wrote his name with two "l's" and sometimes elongated; but he did swear he signed these election returns. They did not tell us that. They quote his testimony. They play with this thing of his name; but they never once tell this House that John Tavel says here positively that he did sign that election poll list. But I want to refer to the rest of his testimony. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] said that he refused to state that more than 14 did vote there. He does not tell you further on. He does in his testimony come up boldly and squarely and say that there were as many votes polled there as returned in that list.

Why not state to the House all the testimony? Why is it that one gentleman will dwell, with all the tropes and figures of rhetoric, upon testimony that is not pertinent to the issue before the House, and that should be disregarded with the returns it was introduced to support? Why is it that my other friend will refer to isolated statements of Mr. Tavel and tell you that that is the testimony upon which the minority ask that the view of the majority shall be overturned, and yet omit this most material part of his testimony?

Mr. PITNEY. Is there any testimony of Tavel that he signed this specific return or any one of that purport? Is not his testimony simply that he signed a poll list?

Mr. DINSMORE. I will read you his testimony.

Q. Did you sign the inspectors' certificate of election after the polls were closed on that day?
A. I did.
Q. Where were you when you signed that certificate?
A. I was in the room of the polling place in Woodlawn precinct.
Q. How did you sign your name?
A. I do not remember exactly as to how I signed it.
Q. What is your best recollection?
A. According to the best of my recollection, I signed it in my usual way. Generally, I abbreviate the St. John to St. I sometimes write the John in full and sometimes abbreviate it to Jno. Well, I sometimes write out the Lewis in full and sometimes designate it by the letter L. If I change the Tavel part of my name at all I elongate it. If I change the Tavel part of my name it is to write it with two "l's."

There is no evidence in this case, unless I have overlooked it, as to how that return was signed, but Tavel says that he signed it himself, and what better evidence can you ask of the fact than that? Tavel is your own witness, and he says he signed that return.

Again he was asked:

Q. Do you swear positively that there were more than 14 votes cast at Woodlawn precinct on the 6th day of November, 1894, for a member of Congress from this district?
A. I refuse to answer that question. I recognize that I am under oath now.
Q. Do you say under oath that you saw 139 voters living in Woodlawn precinct, each for himself, cast a vote in that precinct before you, as one of the inspectors of election on the 6th day of November, 1894, for a member of Congress?
A. I do not remember how many votes were cast that day.

Now, I ask the House to remember that in this part of the examination they are appealing to his recollection, but further on, when he makes his official signature the basis of his remembrance, he verifies this, and says there were this number of votes:

Q. Did you sign the poll list showing that 139 men voted there that day, each man voting for himself?
A. To the best of my recollection, I did.
Q. Is that the truth, Mr. Tavel, that 139 men voted at Woodlawn precinct on the 6th day of last November for the two Congressional candidates?
A. I think so. I suppose so. Of course, I decline to state positively that they did.

With that becoming caution which any man, relying upon his mere recollection or upon anything except his official record, ought to manifest, he qualifies his answer in that way; but he goes on to verify his statement further:

Q. Do you believe that the 139 men whose names appear on this poll list were present, and each for himself voted at that polling place on the 6th of November, 1894?
A. Yes; I do believe it.

So, gentlemen, here is your own witness, a man who was an inspector of elections, and I have read you his testimony. You took a part of his testimony, a little bit of it, garbled it, presented it to this House as his testimony, and said that upon that testimony the minority asked the House to overturn the conclusions of the majority of the committee; but here I show you his positive testimony that he did sign that poll list and that he believed 139 votes were polled there that day, each man voting for himself as set forth in the return. Now, how is this testimony attacked? It is attacked by two witnesses, Seay and Cater. Seay is proven by the evidence to be a kind of a vagabond.

The evidence shows that he has abandoned his infirm wife and gone roaming over the neighborhood for a week at a time, and that when asked what he was doing he said, "I'm workin' for other people." "You were working for other people when you came to watch that precinct, were you not?" "It seems I was." He is one witness who contradicts Tavel, and Cater is the other. Now, Cater acknowledges that he has spent a part of his time in jail. I want to do him full justice. I do not pretend that the record discloses that he was in jail for stealing a mule or a hog, but I do say that it shows he was in jail for lack of influence enough among the respectable people of the community to be able to secure for himself an appearance bond.

Those are the two witnesses who are summoned into this court to contradict Tavel, one a roaming vagabond and the other a confessed jail bird, and their testimony is relied upon to invalidate returns which another witness, one of the inspectors of election, has sustained by his oath. Now, shall this poll be cast out? Do it if you like, gentlemen, but if you do, so far as I am concerned, you will do it over my protest. I would not cast out that poll for anybody. I would not disturb an official return in any election on behalf of any person on such evidence. I would rather leave the case to the certificate of the officers who made the return than to disturb it upon evidence like this, for remember when you do throw out that return you throw out the solemn act of three men acting under oath upon the testimony of one man who is a vagabond and of another who is a jail bird. These two men testify that they were at that poll and saw only 14 men vote, and that is the testimony upon which you are asked to throw out the poll.

Now, I will go to another point, for that is all the evidence upon this subject.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman says that is all the evidence on this subject. Is it not the evidence of Seay that he was there all day watching with his companion, and that he (Seay) was the last man that voted; and does not the poll list disclose the fact that his name is No. 14, while on the list there are returned 139 votes? Now, would it not have been very easy to contradict Seay by showing that he voted early in the day, or that others voted after him?

Mr. DINSMORE. My friend is still harping on my daughter, upon contestee's failure to take testimony, of which I think I have sufficiently spoken. When I said that was all the evidence in the case, I meant that these witnesses gave the only testimony upon which you relied to impeach the return at this poll.

Mr. PITNEY. But does not the return impeach itself on that evidence?

Mr. DINSMORE. I think not. That return is supported by the testimony and by the certificate and by the attestation under oath of three men acting under an official obligation. They have attested it and they support it by their testimony, and I do not think this House will disregard it because two tramps come in and seek to overthrow the testimony of these three men.

Now, I go to Orrville beat. William M. Booth and W. H. O'Brien are the two witnesses called here. These, with one other witness, E. M. Riley, are the only witnesses, I believe, who testify as to the number of votes that were probably polled in that place. O'Brien does not know. Booth does not know. I read from the evidence of Booth:

Q. How long were you in or about the polls?
A. Only a very short while.
Q. Did you see any colored men entering the polls or leaving while you were on the ground?
A. I did not take any particular notice. I saw some in the town.
Q. Do you recollect whether or not there was any crowd directly around the polling place, either when you entered or when you left the place?
A. No, sir; I do not really recollect.

Now, let me run hastily over the evidence of O'Brien:

Q. What is your name, how old are you, where do you live, and how long have you lived there?
A. My name is W. H. O'Brien. I am 44 years old. I live in Orrville precinct, Dallas County. I lived there for about eight years.
Q. To what political party do you belong?
A. To the Organized Democratic party.
Q. Did you or did you not vote on the 6th day of November, 1894, for a member of Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama?
A. I did, sir.
Q. For whom did you cast your ballot?
A. For Robbins.
Q. Were you at or about the polls much during that day?
A. I was not, sir.
Q. At what time did you arrive at the polls when you went there to vote, and how long did you remain?
A. I went there some time in the afternoon, and I remained there only a short time. I suppose that I was there possibly half an hour; not over that.
Q. According to your best recollection, was it after 2 o'clock when you were there?
A. I guess, sir, that it was about 2, or it may have been a little after that; I can not tell exactly.
Q. Are you positive, Mr. O'Brien, that it was not after 3 o'clock in the afternoon?
A. I am not positive as to that time.

Now, in evidence of this kind on the part of the contestant—and such has been the argument here—the object was to fix the time within which certain votes were polled and to connect that with other proof as to the number of votes polled about that time. I pause long enough upon this to call attention to the fact that the testimony of a witness as to his recollection of the hour at which a particular event occurs is always attended with great unreliability. No man can testify accurately in such a case unless there is some particular fact to fix his attention upon a particular time at which the event occurred.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DINSMORE. I shall be very glad to answer, it if I can.

Mr. PITNEY. I venture to ask it because the gentleman stated to me yesterday that he would answer any questions.

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not think I have declined to do so in any instance. I shall be very glad to answer the gentleman, if I can.

Mr. PITNEY. What I wish to ask is this: Whether the evidence of O'Brien to the effect that he voted about 2 o'clock (his number on the poll list being 7), in connection with the evidence of Booth, who testified that he voted between 12 and 3 o'clock—nearer to 3 than 12, according to my understanding of his evidence (his number on the poll list being 294); in connection with Johnson's evidence that certain names on this poll list are the names of persons residing in another precinct; in connection with the further fact that there were produced in evidence five registry certificates of men whose names were on this poll list—produced from a custody other than that in which the law would leave them if those men had voted, for the law requires that the voter shall surrender his registry certificate to the inspectors of election when he votes; in connection with the additional fact that there was no inspector there representing Mr. Aldrich, and that there was no production of the registry—my question is, whether this evidence, taken all together, tends in any degree to impeach those returns, and if so, in what degree?

Mr. DINSMORE. The gentleman has propounded a great many questions in one. I shall endeavor to answer them to the best of my ability. In the first place, I stated a moment ago that the testimony of any witness as to the time when any particular event occurred is generally unreliable; and O'Brien's testimony as to the time when he voted is not, to my mind, so satisfactory that I would not upon it impeach any return, even in connection with any other evidence. The testimony in this case further shows that the bulk of the voters would be most likely to come in about the hour of noon, when people were taking a recess for their midday meal. That evidence is given by some one; I do not remember who. The testimony of O'Brien (his number being 194)——

Mr. PITNEY. O'Brien's number was 7.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, sir, the testimony of O'Brien as to his vote I connect with the votes of the other witnesses who testify, and I conclude that they testified truly; that testimony of this kind where it is not contradicted is to be accepted as correct.

As to the five certificates of registration, the law does not require that they be preserved; they may be thrown down anywhere and fall into the hands of any idle or designing person.

Now, a word as to the testimony of Johnson as to finding on the list the names of persons who did not live in that beat. Mr. Gilbert Johnson is a ubiquitous witness. He testifies as to various beats. He does not restrict his testimony to people living in Lexington beat, where he resided; he goes over into Orrville and claims to be familiar with all the colored people in that beat. But his testimony, even if you accept it as true, is subject to the rule which I mentioned a while ago—that when a man simply comes in says, "Here is the name of a man who lives in another beat, not in this beat," such evidence is not sufficient to satisfy a court—and if this House is not a court it ought to be—that the identical man bearing that name was in another place and did not vote there upon that day.

Mr. PITNEY. But when Johnson mentions 25 different names I would ask the gentleman whether that does not raise some presumption of the truth of his testimony?

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not remember the number of names he mentions. The gentleman asks if this does not raise some presumption in favor of the truth of his testimony. How they struggle, Mr. Speaker; how they strive for some faint suspicion, even, when the burden of proof is on them to overturn the returns by satisfactory evidence, because you must attack the official acts of the sworn officers of election, who performed their official duties and verified it by their signature and their oath in order to overcome the presumption in favor of the contestee. And yet, notwithstanding this, with this burden upon them, the gentleman will jump at some vague suspicion.

Mr. PITNEY. Excuse me, I did not undertake to give my own opinion in reference to the matter. The question was intended to elicit an expression of the opinion of the gentleman himself, who has studied the case, as to whether he was not willing in view of this testimony to give some weight to this cumulative evidence.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman is satisfied with his statement. I must beg to be excused from further interruptions. I hope he will understand that I mean no discourtesy to him, but I want to get through as soon as possible and not detain the House any longer than necessary. I have tried to be courteous to the gentleman in yielding to his inquiries.

Mr. PITNEY. I thank the gentleman for his responses.

Mr. DINSMORE. Now, to hurry on. There is another witness. Oh, what a herd of cattle has been brought into this case! We have a Mr. Riley who testified, one E. M. Riley, and his testimony will be found on page 50 of the record. He came to Orrville beat as a "spotter," or was sent for that purpose. He says, "I was intimidated," "I was scared." "They ran me away!" The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE] argued that Riley was frightened away from the polls. Let us see what his own testimony is.

Q. Where do you reside?
A. In the city of Selma.
Q. How did you happen to be in Orrville on the 6th day of November, 1894?
A. I went there for the purpose of counting the men that voted in that precinct.
Q. Who hired you for that purpose?
A. Mr. G. B. Deans.
Q. Who is Mr. G. B. Deans?
A. He is the chairman of Mr. Aldrich's campaign committee.
Q. How much did Mr. Deans pay you for going to Orrville on that day?
A. I received $12.50.
Q. Your purpose in going there was to keep an account of the number of voters who voted at that precinct, was it not?
A. It was.
Q. Twelve dollars and fifty cents was the hire you were to receive for keeping that account, was it?
A. It was not.
Q. For what purpose was the $12.50 given you?
A. For staying there as long as I did.
Q. If you had stayed there longer would you have received more money?
A. If I had stayed there all day I would have received more.
Q. How much would you have received if you had stayed all day?
A. Twenty dollars.
Q. Was that the price that Mr. Aldrich paid for services of that character in this county?
A. I do not know.
Q. Was the price agreed on with you?
A. It was.

Now, they charge bribery against the contestee in this case. But, Mr. Speaker, there is not a shadow of testimony from the beginning to the end of this whole volume which has been brought here which attaches the faintest suspicion, even, against the contestee of any bribery, or anybody acting for him. And yet not only this witness, whose testimony I have just quoted, but divers others testify as to the bribery of the men on behalf of Mr. Aldrich in the election.

He was asked further:

Q. How long did you remain at the polls?
A. Between three and four hours, I think.
Q. At what time was the warning given you to leave?
A. I suppose between 10 and 11 o'clock.
Q. Did you or not leave at once?
A. I did not.
Q. Why?
A. Because I did not feel like it.
Q. Then you were not afraid of any bodily harm.
A. I certainly was or I should never have left.
Q. How was it, then, that you did leave within the fifteen minutes within which time you were warned to leave?
A. I did not say that I left within fifteen minutes.
Q. How long after the warning was given you before you left?
A. I do not know.
Q. Was it an hour?
A. I do not know.
Q. Was it two hours?
A. I do not know.
Q. Was it three hours?
A. It was not that long.
Q. Was it two hours and fifty minutes?
A. It was not that long.
Q. Was it two hours and thirty minutes?
A. It was not that long.
Q. Was it two hours and ten minutes?
A. It might have been.
Q. Was it two hours and five minutes?
A. It might have been.
Q. Was it two hours?
A. I do not pretend to say how long it was, for I do not remember.

He did not feel like going away from the polls, and yet he was "badly frightened," according to his own testimony. Now, what is the law in such cases? It was seriously contended by one gentleman who argued the case for the majority that there was intimidation here, when everybody familiar with the principles of the law of elections knows that unless somebody was influenced by intimidation, some voter deprived of his ballot or prevented from voting, or an effort had been successfully made by somebody to impede the progress of the election and actually succeeded in preventing the officers from the discharge of their duties, that such testimony is not worth a farthing. Besides that, this man did not live there at all. He could not have voted at that precinct. He said he was "frightened." Was he frightened, according to his own testimony? When he was asked why he did not leave, he said because he "did not feel like it."

Gentlemen, are you going to stand on the testimony of a bribed witness? It is no answer to say that they were only paid $20 a day to go and count men who went to the polls. I feel warranted in saying that this testimony from the very beginning showed that these witnesses were paid to watch and testify for the purpose of impeaching the returns; bribed to testify. That is the Orrville precinct.

Where is the testimony that attacks the returns? Nobody has testified as to the number of votes polled; not a witness called for that purpose, except the testimony of the officers themselves, which is testimony until it is overturned for fraud. The testimony, the certificates of election of the officers of election, who verified the accuracy and correctness of the returns by their official oath, is the only testimony that you have.

Now, let us go to Woodlawn beat. The testimony of witnesses in reference to this is set forth in the record. I wish to call your attention especially to the testimony of Louis P. Jones. He testifies that he did not stay there long, but that he was 150 or 200 yards off from the polling place. That he was in a position for two or three hours where he could see the voting place and those who went to it. According to his recollection, only one came into that polling place after he had been there. Let me read from his testimony:

Q. Did the colored people in Oldtown—I mean the colored voters—as a general thing register last May?
A. I do not know. When I registered none registered the day that I registered. The people were advised by circulars sent out by Dr. Moseley to the colored people in that precinct not to register, and the number that I talked with said that they were not going to register.
Q. Are the colored voters in Oldtown precinct Democrats or Republicans?
A. I do not know that. My best information is that they are Republicans.
Q. Do you know any Democrats among the colored people in this county?
A. I know some colored people who vote the Democratic ticket, if that makes them a Democrat.
Q. Do you vote the Democratic ticket?
A. Do I have to answer that question?
Q. Do you consider it disgraceful to vote the Democratic ticket?
A. No, sir; I do not.
Q. Louis, who did you vote for on the 6th day of last November for Congress?
A. The reason that I said that was because we all were instructed two years ago to vote it.

Then Lewis stopped and turned to the attorney who was taking the testimony for the contestant and says:

Is you Mr. Bowman? You instructed us to vote the Democratic ticket two years ago.

Then he is asked:

Q. Who did I tell you to vote for two years ago?
A. You said vote for Reuben F. Kolb, and you said that if anybody said that he was not a Democrat—I know you instructed us to vote for him. I do not know what else you said.
Q. Now, who did you vote for on the 6th of November last, for Congress, in Oldtown beat?
A. I voted for Mr. Robbins.
Q. You say that Dave Riggs did not vote there that day?
A. I said that he did not vote while I was there at the polling place. He did not go directly away with me. I saw him within twenty-five or thirty minutes after I left there. He came then to the place where I was standing in sight of the polls, and he told me that he had not voted.
Q. When you went away from there to go back home, did you go away from there together?
A. He went away, but did not go with me. He went in an opposite direction from where the polls were, and went in the direction of his home.
Q. What time did you leave that place to go home in the afternoon?
A. I do not exactly know. I suppose between 1 and 2, or probably it might have been 3 o'clock when I went home.
Q. On the road home did you meet any voters going toward the polling place?
A. No, sir.
Q. Pretty near all the voters in that precinct are colored men, are they not?
A. To my best judgment, I feel pretty sure that they are.
Q. Why did Dave Riggs say that he did not vote?
A. He said that he had not registered.
Q. Did you vote for Governor Jones two years ago?
A. No, sir; I did not vote for Jones or Kolb two years ago.
Q. You are a Democrat, are you not?
A. No, sir; I am not a Democrat, but I voted for Mr. Robbins because he has done favors for my race. I vote the Democratic ticket sometimes when I think it is to my interest to do so.

Again, on cross-examination, he was asked:

Q. Lewis, are you or not a representative colored man?
A. Well, I used to be, but I am not now.
Q. When did you quit being a representative colored man?
A. It has been a long time ago.
Q. The representative colored man will tell the truth on oath, won't he?
A. No, sir; he won't.
Q. Will a colored man who is not a representative colored man tell the truth on oath?
A. I have not known them all to be tried.

[Laughter.]

Here is a colored man testifying as to this beat. There is nothing in his testimony upon which it can be attacked save and except the one fact for which he was called to testify, namely, that there is the name of a Louis Jones on the poll list. I suppose they tried to get something out of him as to how many votes were polled. All he testifies to is that he did not vote, although his name is on the poll list. They ask you to throw this out because of the testimony of men who swear they did not vote, while there are names of a few on the poll list corresponding with theirs.

Now, the House was regaled yesterday by a lot of irrelevant testimony read by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LIN-

NEY] not in support of the issue here. Evidence was introduced in behalf of issues already eliminated from this contest. Let me read the testimony of two or three other witnesses who were called by the contestant to testify in his behalf:

Q. What is your name?
A. Bob Adams.
Q. Where do you live?
A. In Oldtown beat, Dallas County.
Q. How long have you been living there?
A. For twelve years. I am a colored man and was a slave before the war.
Q. Did you register last May?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you vote in the last November election for Congressman?
A. No, sir; I was in the field working.
Q. Is there any other Bob Adams living in that precinct besides yourself?
A. No, sir.
Q. Are you a Republican or a Democrat?
A. I am a Republican man.
Q. The colored people in that beat as a rule are Republicans, are they not?
A. Nearly all of them are.
Q. Were the colored people not advised by the leaders of the Republican party not to register and not to vote in any of the elections of last year?
A. I do not know about that.

This was in Oldtown beat. Here is a colored man who did not know about these instructions. I read this for the purpose of showing that these colored people were not all informed of the instructions; and this is in support of the theory and the evidence that colored people did vote in that contest and did vote for Robbins, for the testimony shows that in the Orville beat, and it is true with reference to all of them, the colored people voted generally with their landlords; that there are no white Republicans in that beat; that they work upon the farms with their landlords and usually vote with them. And there is other testimony that goes to show that this sometimes happens to a large extent throughout the county.

There was another witness named Gamble who testified that he did not vote. The name on the poll list was Gammon.

Q. Your name is G-a-m-b-l-e, is it not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And not G-a-m-m-o-n?
A. No, sir.
Q. You are not the Gammon who voted in Oldtown precinct on the 6th of November, 1894, are you?
A. No, sir; I did not vote.
Q. Oldtown precinct is a pretty large precinct, is it not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How large a precinct is it?
A. I do not know how large it is.
Q. About how many voters live in Oldtown precinct?
A. I do not know, sir.
Q. Do you know all the voters who do live in Oldtown precinct?
A. No, sir; I do not.
Q. There are lots of them there that you do not know, are there not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you take much stock in politics?
A. No, sir; a little sometimes.
Q. What was the election held for on November 6, 1894?
A. For Congress.

Here is another, George Walton, who is called to testify in behalf of the contestant. He testifies that he did not vote.

Q. George, how big a place is Oldtown precinct?
A. I don't know, sir.

That is the beat in which he lives.

Q. How many people live there?
A. I don't know, sir.
Q. Who is Vice-President of the United States?
A. I don't know that.
Q. Who was the Democratic nominee for Congress from this district?
A. I don't know, sir.
Q. Who was the Republican nominee for Congress in this district?
A. Mr. Kolb.

This witness is testifying with reference to the election for Congress in the Fourth Congressional district in Alabama in 1894. He is called to invalidate the return, to show that he did not vote, and he swears that he did not know who was the Democratic candidate, but that Mr. Kolb was the Republican candidate. Mr. Kolb had run for governor in the August election preceding, and was not a candidate then; and we are left to the inference that he thought he was testifying as to the August election and not as to the November election, because Mr. Kolb was not the Republican candidate, but Mr. Aldrich was.

I will not trespass upon the intelligence of the House to go further into this testimony. I have called attention to the manner in which this matter has been argued, upon excerpts from this testimony with reference to these beats, both on the part of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] and my friend from Indiana [Mr. ROYSE], without giving the testimony which bore more directly upon it, and which more amply and fully covered the ground. I maintain with my colleagues of the minority that these three beats ought to stand as returned by the officers of election, because they have been unsuccessfully assailed, not assailed by such respectable testimony as is entitled to the consideration of this House; that these three precincts should be counted as returned, which would show the contestee elected by more than 500 majority.

A few more words upon the subject of bribery. The evidence of Crocheron shows that he was approached and offered money to make a false return. The evidence of Bell shows that he received $30 or more for watching a precinct, when he did not live there, when he did not live in the county, but was a citizen of Texas.

Gentlemen, how does this appear to the calm, judicial mind? Suppose this were an action pending before a tribunal where cases are decided according to the sovereign principles of law, without bias, without prejudice, without fanaticism or party feeling. Why, it would not last as long as a snowflake would last in that torrid country referred to yesterday by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY]. It may be sufficient testimony for you to unseat a Democrat; if so, do it; but I appeal to you once more to eliminate that part of the case from consideration which has been eliminated by the unanimous consent of the committee and endeavor to arrive at your conclusion upon the part which properly appeals to the judgment of members of this House. If you do apply the principles of law that you would apply if you were judges upon the bench, I verily believe you will not allow the returns from either Woodlawn, Oldtown, or Orrville to go out, but that you will leave them there standing upon the certification of the officers appointed, who did certify to them under oath; because I think I have shown that they are assailed by the flimsiest, most unreliable, most disreputable character of testimony.

I know the difficulty of carrying a case where there is fraud. I have not tried to dodge it. I have not tried to shield myself in any way from it. I say with you that I shall welcome the day, if it ever arrives—although it may be as far away as the millennium—when there shall be no fraud manifesting itself either in the South or in the North, either in Alabama or in Pennsylvania, either in Mississippi or in New York.

But the concluding remark yesterday of my friend from Massachusetts was that so jealous is he of the integrity of the associations of this distinguished body that he would not have its atmosphere contaminated by a person who comes from a district where all these frauds have been proven.

Mr. Speaker, I challenge one single word of this testimony from beginning to end that in anywise insinuates any improper conduct against the contestee personally. In what I am about to say I acquit the contestant. But my friend who is so jealous of the atmosphere of this Chamber, if he unseats the contestee welcomes to his association a man, although I say nothing against him, whose chief attorney is convicted by this evidence of bribery. The chairman of the committee who had charge of his campaign is convicted by this evidence of bribery. Let him who stands up for pure elections criticise evil and wrong wherever it appears, whether for him or against him.

The Speaker of the House appointed me to membership upon this committee, and in the selection he did me honor, but he imposed upon me burdens of which I could well wish to be relieved. If we are to be beasts of burden for the House in these election cases, all I ask is that you give to us credit for sincerity of conviction and honesty of conduct, and that you will weigh well our statements, our arguments, and the results of our labor, and determine the cause fairly and justly, and the minority will be content. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TURNER] expected to address the House as one of the minority in the discussion upon this case, but so much time has been taken that he has given up the idea of saying anything in the House and desires to be at liberty to insert his remarks in the RECORD. I hope there will be no objection to the leave that the gentleman asks in this respect—to have his remarks printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia be given permission to print remarks in the RECORD upon this subject. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, owing to the great time that has been consumed in addressing the House upon this question, I feel myself obliged now to compress whatever I may have to say within the shortest possible limit, and to assure the House in this respect that I shall endeavor to avoid wearying them by a lengthened discussion of the attributes of this case. To come down to the objection which has prominently been made and discussed here on the part of the contestee as to the authority of the notary, I desire to call attention of the House to the provisions of the statute upon that subject. Those provisions to a certain extent have been commentedupon by the other side; but in my judgment they leave the case entirely clear and free from the objections which have been raised against the testimony taken outside of the county of Shelby. The notary who took this testimony resided in that county; and it is objected here that because he was a resident of the county of Shelby he was without authority to take testimony in the county of Dallas.

Now, when we come to look at the statute in reference to the authority of the persons who are mentioned in the statute to take testimony in contested-election cases, we see that the intention of the law has been not to circumscribe the case within the authority conferred upon the officer by the local laws of the State, but to designate by the term of the office the individual who should be authorized to exercise the authority conferred upon the officer by the language of the laws of the United States. It does not subject him to the qualification that he shall be limited in his authority by any State laws or any State adjudications upon this subject, but the laws of the United States have designated the class of persons by reference to their offices who shall be authorized to take testimony provided for by the statute of the United States in these contested-election cases. Take, for instance, the notary or any other officer who is mentioned or referred to in the statute of the United States, and he has no authority whatever under the local laws of his State to take one word of testimony in a contested-election case. The laws of the State have conferred no such authority upon him, but he is a State, a local, or a county or a city officer, and his duties and his power and authority are prescribed by the laws of the State, which of themselves exclude altogether the possibility of taking evidence in a case of a contest of this description. So that we are not to look at the laws of the State for the purpose of ascertaining the authority of the individual who is selected to take the testimony in a contested-election case, but we are to look at the statute of the United States, because it will be remembered that this is entirely a Federal proceeding, provided for by the Congress of the United States, to gather evidence to enable the House to determine who are or who are not elected as members to represent the district from which they appear as Representatives before the Congress of the United States. It is a matter entirely and exclusively subject to the law of Congress and not to any restriction whatever that is imposed upon the local officer, who is referred to as a local officer who shall exercise this broad authority created by the act of Congress.

We have only to look at the language of the law in order to see that it was the intention of Congress to cover the whole subject by its legislation, to prescribe the authority that should be exercised by the officer in cases of this description, and, without going further into general observations upon this subject, I will call the attention of the House to the language of the sections of the statute relating to this matter. They have provided that when there is a contested election and the person contesting the election is desirous of taking evidence he may apply to either of the officers for a subpœna, one of them being a notary. The statute provides that the person contesting the election may apply to either of the officers mentioned in this statute for the subpœnas to secure the attendance of his witnesses and the taking of their evidence. The statute does not by any language or by any possible construction of language limit or restrict the authority of the officer to the jurisdiction for which he may have been appointed or elected under the laws of the State, but it gives him ample and complete authority, equivalent to the entire necessities and requirements of the case, for instituting and carrying on the proceeding. Then the statute provides, among the officers to whom this application may be made, that the applicant may select a notary public for the purpose of exercising this Federal authority; and it proceeds further and declares that the officer—mark the language of the statute, gentlemen; it is not in the plural, it is the officer—that the officer to whom application is authorized to be made shall thereupon issue his writ of subpœna directed to all such witnesses as shall be named to him, requiring their attendance before him at some time and place named in the subpœna. There is no restriction there. On the contrary, does not the language of the statute impress itself upon your minds as being as broad as the legislative power could have made it, authorizing the officer and making it his duty to issue subpœnas for all the witnesses who may be named to him without restriction as to where any witness may reside or where he may expect to be examined with but one single exception? This subpœna is required, as I have already read, to command the witness to appear before the officer and be examined concerning the contested election. Then the statute provides further that in case none of the officers mentioned in section 110 are residing in the Congressional district—not limited, you see again, to the county, but to the Congressional district—that in case neither one of the officers mentioned in this section resides within the Congressional district where the election is proposed to be contested, application may then be made to two justices of the peace who may reside within the district, and whose authority will be clearly as broad as the Congressional district itself.

Now, what is the object of providing this authority to take the testimony before two justices of the peace if neither one of the other officers mentioned resides in the district, if they are to be limited by the extent of the authority or jurisdiction conferred upon them by local law? It is perfectly absurd to suppose that the Congress of the United States would so restrict the officer called upon to act in an emergency of this character. If that were the case, if the justices were selected where no other officer could be found in the Congressional district, and if the justices were to be restricted to their county, it will be seen at once that they could take evidence only in that county and that as to the rest of the district it would go entirely unprovided for. But the statute goes further and declares that no witness shall be required to attend an examination out of the county in which he resides or is served with a subpœna. Why make this provision for the protection of the witness and restrict his attendance to the county in which he resides or in which he is served, if the officer has no authority under the laws of the United States to go beyond the limits of the county? The provision would be entirely absurd under that construction, and it is warranted by no authority. Now, we go further. It is provided in section 117 that the depositions of witnesses residing out of the district and beyond the reach of the subpœna may be taken before any officer authorized by law to take testimony in contested-election cases, showing still the intention of Congress to be that the officer who is selected to take testimony in such cases shall act without restriction throughout the entire length and breadth of the Congressional district in which the contest is intended to be carried on. But if it turns out that the witness is in some other Congressional district, then the law has provided that you may go before an officer in that district and take that witness's testimony. And his authority has not been restricted to the county for which he may be an officer or to any particular county of his Congressional district, but it extends to the entire district in which he shall reside.

Again, the statute provides in section 120 that—

All witnesses who attend in obedience to a subpœna, or who attend voluntarily at the time and place appointed, of whose examination notice has been given, as provided by this chapter, shall then and there be examined on oath by the officer who issued the subpœna.

Is not that broad enough to dissolve and dismiss all possible doubt as to the authority conferred by the statute in this matter? It has been seen that by the preceding provisions the officer is authorized to issue subpœnas for all the witnesses who may be named to him, without restriction as to the county, the only limitation being the Congressional district itself; and when these witnesses who are subpœnaed in this way appear, they are required to appear before the officer who issued the subpœna; and it is no matter where they shall appear, provided it is within the Congressional district in which the contest has arisen; and the officer has full and ample authority, and is positively required by this section of the statute, to go on and take the testimony of these witnesses.

By section 122 it is further provided that—

The officer shall cause the testimony of the witnesses, together with the questions proposed by the parties or their agents, to be reduced to writing in his presence, and in the presence of the parties or their agents, if attending, and to be duly attested by the witnesses, respectively.

You will see in this language another clear indication of the intention of the law. It does not refer to the "officer" of a county, but it is "the officer" who shall have issued subpœnas requiring the attendance of witnesses; he is the person who is to take the evidence, reduce it to writing, and send it to the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Section 123 adds still further force to this construction of the statute. That declares that—

The officer—

Mark the language—indicating clearly that but one officer may be required to execute the entire purpose and authority of the statute. If this were not the case, we should find somewhere in the statute something to indicate an intention to restrict the examination to the authority conferred upon the officer by the State legislature. But there is not, either by direct language or by implication, anything in the statute in any form imposing this restriction upon the authority of the officer. On the other hand, an entirely new and independent proceeding is provided for by the language of the law. There is confided entirely to the authority and jurisdiction of one person the issuing of the subpœnas, the taking of the evidence, and the return of the evidence to the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

I continue the reading of section 123:

The officer shall have power to require the production of papers; and on the refusal or neglect of any person to produce and deliver up any paper or papers in his possession pertaining to the election, or to produce and deliver up certified or sworn copies of the same in case they may be official papers, such person shall be liable to all the penalties prescribed in section 116. All papers thus produced, and all certified or sworn copies of official papers, shall be transmitted by the officer, with the testimony of the witnesses, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Can there be a doubt as to the intention of Congress in this matter? Can it be doubted that Congress intended to create an entirely independent proceeding of its own, one which should not depend upon the laws of the State, but to be within the scope of the language made use of, confiding the authority to any one of these officers to take the testimony within the entire length and breadth of the Congressional district, when applied to by either of the contesting parties—to issue his subpœnas, and to proceed to hear the evidence in the contest?

Of course, it would not be expected in a case of this description that legislation any less broad in its character would have been provided, because less broad legislation would not have been sufficient to meet the emergencies or necessities of the case. It will not necessarily follow because the person selected is an officer of a particular description that the party to the contest would be able to find another within the district; and the language has been carefully drawn so as to make it the duty of this officer to issue subpœnas for all witnesses, to require the witnesses to be brought before him, to take their testimony, and to return it, together with copies of any documents or papers that may be produced before him, to the House of Representatives.

As will be seen, the duty as well as the authority of the House is singular in its character. Authority is not conferred upon two or more officers except in the case of justices of the peace where no one of these designated officers can be found within the district, but it is confided solely and wholly to the one officer, whatever his character may be officially, to go on and take all the evidence that may be required for the purpose of making up the case and sending it to the House of Representatives for its decision.

In the case of Washburn vs. Voorhees (reported in 2 Bartlett on Elections, 54) this question came before the House of Representatives in the year 1866. In that case it was objected, as it has been here, that the mayor of the city, who had no authority whatever outside the bounds of the municipality, was not authorized to go outside of that city and take evidence in a contested-election case. But that objection was met in the same manner in which it has been met here, though perhaps not quite so much in detail. The House concluded that there was nothing whatever in the objection; that Congress had substantially created a tribunal of its own, had prescribed the mode in which its authority should be exercised, the officer who should exercise it, and the manner in which the evidence and the papers should be returned to the House of Representatives. Upon this subject, the report of the committee in that case used this language:

> But the committee were of opinion that the authority to take these depositions was derived not from the statutes of Indiana, but from the statute of the United States already cited, the mayor of a city being one of the persons designated in that statute to take such depositions; and that he would have been authorized as such designated person to take those depositions had the statutes of Indiana conferred upon him no authority to administer oaths.

In view of this authority that has stood unquestioned since 1866 down to the present time, in view of the broad language of the statute of the United States and its manifest intention to confer upon the officer this extended authority, can there be a doubt that this notary had the power to go into the county of Dallas and take in the manner prescribed by the statute the testimony that has been objected to? It strikes me there is no plausible ground on which to sustain the objection which has been made. Looking to the intention of the law and the object to be attained, it being the object of Congress to build up a system of its own and to confer the authority upon any one of these officers mentioned in the statute to take the evidence anywhere within the Congressional district where it might be offered and to return it to the House of Representatives, it seems that this question is presented in such a form as not to be open to controversy.

Now, passing from that, I desire to call your attention to the manner in which the reports of the committee have been made that brought the case before the House for its consideration. Four members of the committee have in their report, which I have no doubt the House is familiar with, reached the conclusion that the contestant was elected in the district by a majority of 1,121 votes. That is the utmost limit that has been placed upon the evidence in dealing with the votes cast in this election in 1894 for Representative in Congress from the Fourth Congressional district in the State of Alabama. Now, in reference to the result, the other two members of the committee, Mr. COOKE of Illinois and myself, have not gone quite so far in determining what the majority of the contestant should be under the evidence produced and returned as the report to which I have just called your attention. We have, however, gone through these matters, precinct by precinct, carefully and systematically, and after a careful scrutiny of all the votes returned by the inspectors and clerks of the election precincts, have reached the conclusion, after going through, as I have said, with the utmost care, and looking at all the evidence bearing on the rights of each of the parties in this contest, that the contestant was elected by a majority of 601 votes. So, you will see that there is no substantial difference between any of the members of the committee, unless it be as to the number or size of the majority that the contestant is entitled to over the votes that were allowed the contestee at this election.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. If the gentleman will permit me, he does not mean to say that, I suppose. The gentleman means, no doubt, no difference between the majority of the committee. The gentleman said of the whole committee. There is a marked difference in that regard.

Mr. DANIELS. The majority; that is right. I was comparing the two reports made by the majority members of the committee.

This difference, I may say, Mr. Speaker, has arisen concerning the large vote that was returned from one of the precincts in Dallas County for the contestee. That is the precinct known as No. 36, or the City precinct. There the vote returned by the inspectors and clerks of elections as having been taken in that election was 2,021 votes.

It will be recollected that the inspectors were to meet at 8 o'clock in the morning and prepare themselves for taking the vote by 9 o'clock, and that they were required to close the polls at 5 o'clock in the afternoon; and when you come to consider the vast number of names recorded as having voted during that time, you will see that it required the receiving of three or four votes every minute throughout the whole day, without cessation, to have taken the number of votes claimed to have been here cast and placed in the ballot box. They returned 2,021 votes, and of that 2,021 they have been generous enough to give to Mr. Aldrich, the contestant in this case, 5 votes.

Now, evidence is given by persons who went to the polls suspecting that there was to be mischief that day—for suspicion seems to have extended generally throughout the county—for the purpose of seeing and counting the individuals who went to these polls for the express or supposed purpose of voting at this election. One of these witnesses stationed himself at the court-house, near where the polls were opened, and another went to another part of the grounds, where they could see the two doors of the court-house, where voters would ordinarily enter the building, and one of them counted 715 persons as having gone into the court-house on that day, during the whole time, and the other one counted 723; and this count was made in such manner as to impress upon the mind of anyone reading the testimony that they had fairly and honestly, so far as they were able to, discharged the duty they had assumed to discharge, namely, to discover the number of persons who went to the polls on this occasion.

Now, other witnesses had their attention called to this remarkable return of 2,021 votes; among others Mr. Craig, a lawyer of extensive practice, who had held various positions of trust in the State of Alabama, and who had also been a member of Congress. He is a gentleman whose integrity is without the slightest reflection of suspicion, and his attention was called to the number of voters appearing to have cast their votes in this county of Dallas and in this particular precinct, and according to his statement all that he could recall of persons whose names were on the list thus returned was about 196 votes. Another gentleman, John A. McKinnon, was a physician in extensive practice in Selma, a man who was well acquainted with people there, who had the returns presented to him and went through them thoroughly, and stated in his evidence that he recognized the names of 221 persons, running down to No. 221 on the poll list, as citizens and voters in the city of Selma. Then his statement is that he ran down the list to 1234, from 221, and there was no person on the list whose name he could recognize as a person who was a resident or voter of the city. From 1234 to 1700 and more he says he found the names of persons that he was acquainted with and knew to be citizens of Selma, but when he proceeded from that point to 2021, there was not a single name of an individual that was known to him on the list who was a citizen or voter of that city. This was an intelligent man who had resided many years there, a physician of extensive practice, and who had also occupied an official position in taking statistics relative to births and deaths of the people residing in the city; and this testimony, after careful consideration of all the names on the list, after bringing to his recollection all the possibility of his acquaintance in the city, was that only about seven hundred or seven hundred and thirty or forty in this district of the names that were included upon that list did vote in this election.

Mr. Comptont, who was a responsible lawyer in practice there, also testified that he went to the polls, and it took him two minutes to take his ballot and prepare it and put it into the ballot box. It took an intelligeta lawyer two minutes to do that.

These circumstances were sufficient to impress upon the minds of the committee the fact that great frauds had been perpetrated in this locality, and that this list of voters, returned in this manner, was to a very great extent a mere myth, a mere misrepresentation, a mere fraudulent pretense that these persons had come to the polls in that city and had cast those votes. And we should have joined with the other members of the committee in rejecting every vote of this precinct down to 221, had it not been for the statement of Mr. Aldrich himself. That statement we considered, when added to the other evidence, conclusive upon us, and we were bound to allow the vote that we do allow in this precinct, namely, 762 to the contestee, giving to him, for the purpose of securing and maintaining the rights of the voters, the utmost liberality in the judgment that we reached concerning the transactions of that day. Now, upon this subject Mr. Aldrich says in his notice of contest:

> At precinct No. 36, said county, commonly called Selma or City beat, there were actually cast at said election only 767 votes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does not Mr. Aldrich, in his notice of contest, make that same statement and admission with reference to every other one of the contested beats in Dallas County?

Mr. DANIELS. I think not.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It is published so, anyway.

Mr. DANIELS. We will dispose of the others when we get to them. Now, under the circumstances, I will say that I desire to compress my remarks within the shortest possible limit, on account of the length of time that has been taken in this debate, and therefore I can not yield to questions.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he did yield.

Mr. DANIELS. Now, it was in consequence of the evidence leading up to this point, indicating that over 700 people had gone to the polls that day and probably had gone there for the purpose of voting, and this unqualified admission of the contestant himself, that we were obliged to limit the vote—instead of striking it all down to 221—to 762 in favor of the contestant upon this occasion. There is the difference, substantially, between our report and the report made by the other four members of the majority of the committee. They have stricken out all these votes down to 221, while we have allowed to the contestee in this case 762. I say to you, gentlemen, in reference to these matters, that we pursued the utmost liberality in endeavoring to ascertain the vote of this as well as other precincts, for the purpose of determining who the legal voters were, how many legal votes were cast, and preserving their rights, instead of sacrificing them on account of the fraud and the illegality of other voters who went to those precincts, or who are represented to have gone to those precincts, and deposited their ballots.

Now, attention has been called by the gentlemen representing the minority of the committee to three or four precincts as precincts that should be maintained, which we have not allowed, which we have concluded were not sustained by the evidence taken before the notary upon this occasion and returned here for the consideration of the House. It is claimed on behalf of the contestee that the votes in these precincts, three or four in number, should be retained, and in that way a small majority will be given to the contestee, allowing him to retain his seat as a member of the House.

Now, in this respect I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there was returned for the contestee, as the majority received by him in this district, 3,738 votes. That is the return of the returning officers and the canvass as made by the secretary of state, and it was upon the strength of those votes, returned in this manner, canvassed in this way, that this certificate was given to the sitting member. But here in the examination which has taken place before the committee the evidence has been of so cogent and forcible a character as to prove to the satisfaction of the minority itself that this statement was an unmitigated and unqualified fraud; that instead of there being 3,738 majority given to him, there was given to him only a majority of 559, leaving a number exceeding 3,000, by the practical confession of the minority of the committee, or, to be precise, 3,177 votes, that could not be counted, even by the gentlemen who are disposed to be so liberal and so generous to the contestee in the disposition and determination of this contest.

So that they have cut down the majority that was returned in this manner from 3,738 to 559, thereby acknowledging that the sitting member sits here in this House under a load of 3,177 fraudulent or illegal votes. That is the position that he occupies here to-day, and it is only by unwarrantable criticisms upon three or four precincts, where the evidence against them is perhaps not quite so strong as it is in others, that he is secured this 559 votes as a pretense for retaining him in his seat.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to the evidence of one witness, and perhaps only one witness, relating to these different precincts.

That is, I believe, the precinct of Woodlawn. Two witnesses were produced on the hearing who testified that they were at the polling-place during the morning, early in the morning, before the polls were opened at all; that they remained there until the polls closed in the afternoon; and no more than 14 persons voted at that precinct during that day. And yet what do we find the officers of the election did? Why, they certify that 160 votes were taken and only two votes for Aldrich. Now, it is claimed on the part of the contestee that the majority of the committee are in error in rejecting this precinct, because the testimony of this John Lewis Tavel is in contradiction of these two witnesses, who swear that there were not more than 14 votes voted at the polls on the day of the election. I desire to call your attention to a few of the questions and answers to those questions by Tavel, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any person can give the slightest credit to the statement that he made. It is stated, as the fact is in the report of the minority, that he characterized these two witnesses as liars. He was asked:

Q. How many men voted at Woodlawn precinct on that day?
A. I do not know.
Q. Were there more than 14 votes polled there on that day?
A. I suppose so.
Q. Why do you suppose so?
A. From my recollection of the vote cast, there were more than 14.
Q. Do you swear positively that there were more than 14 votes cast at Woodlawn precinct on the 6th day of November, 1894, for a member of Congress from this district?
A. I refuse to answer that question. I recognize that I am under oath now.

He had been one of the inspectors of the election, and was called upon in behalf of the contestant here to prove what was the truth and the fact, supposing the truth could be elicited by questions put to him direct, as they were upon this subject. And yet you will see from the answers that he makes that he evades this entirely, substantially confessing that his mind is a blank on the subject, and when he is brought to the point where he must answer the question directly, fearing the consequences of perjury, he says, "I decline to answer."

Q. Do you say under oath that you saw 139 voters living in Woodlawn precinct, each for himself, cast a vote in that precinct before you, as one of the inspectors of election, on the 6th day of November, 1894, for a member of Congress?
A. I do not remember how many votes were cast that day.

Then again:

Q. Did you or not make and sign a certificate as one of the inspectors of election at Woodlawn precinct on the 6th day of November, 1894, to the effect that 139 votes were cast there that day?
A. If it is usual for inspectors to sign that sort of a certificate, it is very probable that I did so.

And yet, not knowing and really not believing that any such number of persons voted in this precinct on this occasion, not being able to state that more than 14 had gone there and voted, he is willing to sign this certificate, false in its character, representing that this large number of persons were there for the purpose of and giving their votes.

Now, objection has been taken also to Liberty Hill. I desire to call the attention of the House to that, and then I shall pass to the consideration of other matters. We depend mainly upon Rothschilds, one of the witnesses who were called. Mr. Rothschilds was sworn. In Liberty Hill 274 votes were returned, and not more than 30 white persons are stated by this witness to have resided in that precinct. Now, Mr. Kline, whose attention was called to the number of people that were there during election day, gives this answer:

Q. In your best judgment, how many men were in Safford on the day of the election?
A. I have no idea; I do not know whether there was 1 or 100.
Q. Do you think that there were as many as 150 there on that day?
A. I think that there were not.

And yet you find the inspectors of this election returned 274 votes there. Mr. Kline answered further:

Q. Do you think that there were as many as 225 there on that day?
A. My judgment is that there were not.
Q. Do you think that there were as many as 274 men in the town of Safford on the day of the November election between the opening and closing of the polls?
A. No, sir; I think there were not.

Now, Mr. Rothschilds was a person who had previously resided in this precinct, had been engaged in the business of a commission cotton merchant there, but at the time that this examination took place had removed and resided in a nearby precinct. He is asked:

Q. Have you or not an intimate acquaintance with the conditions and with the people who live in Liberty Hill precinct, Dallas County?
A. I have.
Q. Please state, in your best judgment, how many white voters reside in Liberty Hill precinct.
A. My best judgment is that there are about 30 residing there.
Q. How many colored voters?
A. From 200 to 300.
Q. About how many names of white men do you find on that poll list?
A. Thirty-one, if I am not mistaken.
Q. You are a Democrat, are you not?
A. Yes sir.

And that fact probably accounts for the cautious manner in which this man gave his testimony, restricting his answers in this way so as to do as little damage or detriment to his own political friends as possible. But we do not stand, Mr. Speaker, upon the testimony given in this matter by the witnesses whose attention was called to these particular precincts for the purpose of maintaining the integrity of the resolutions or the conclusions at which we have reached. We look outside of this for the purpose of ascertaining and determining what was the stimulating motive that operated upon the minds of these people upon the day or prior to the day of this election, and we charge that there was a conspiracy entered into on the part of the majority party to carry this election in such a manner as to secure the election of the contestee without reference to the number of votes that may have been polled and without having a bearing on any other consequences that might result from the violation of the law.

Now, what do we find in this respect? We find that before the election took place—and I call the attention of the House to this as a circumstance indicating the existence of such a conspiracy as is charged, because conspiracies may be established not only by direct evidence, not only by confessions of the persons who are engaged in them, but by circumstances tending to indicate clearly their existence, and such circumstances are potently and intelligently set forth in the record in this case brought before the House for its consideration—it is stated on page 195 of the record that a list of names of persons suitable for inspectors was offered to the probate judge, and he was asked to select for each precinct a name which would be satisfactory to the Populists and to the other parties represented, and place that man on the board of inspectors for the purpose of endeavoring to manage the election in a careful, regular, and reasonably cautious manner. The men upon that list were reputable men, as appears by the statements made in the record without contradiction, and the list was presented to the probate judge, but the case says, "But whom they did not appoint and who were not appointed."

Now, why was it that the persons were not appointed who were selected in this manner to represent the minority to secure an honest and lawful election? It is not claimed that there was any expectation that the colored vote would find its way to these polls on that occasion. The colored voters had been advised by their leaders not to register and not to vote, because their votes would not be counted. There was a suspicion throughout the county that there was some rascality contemplated, and that votes would be returned for the sitting member here without reference to the actual number of voters or the actual circumstances of the case, simply for the purpose of putting him in as a member of this House. Now, to show that the Republicans did not generally vote, I simply call attention to one statement contained in the brief which was submitted to us on the part of the contestee. In that brief I find this statement:

It is admitted that the Republicans of Dallas County were requested not to vote, and did not vote.

So that the Republicans who were in the county did not go to the polls and deposit their votes in the ballot box or pass them through the hands of these inspectors at all. It is proved by the testimony of Mr. Craig, and is uncontradicted, that there are about 10,000 voters in the county, about 75 per cent of whom were Republicans, and only about 25 per cent, about 2,400 or 2,500, were whites and Democrats. Yet, Mr. Speaker, when you come to consider the votes at this poll, you have a return of 5,464 majority in favor of the sitting member, although in point of fact, when you come to sift down the votes actually given to and received for him, you find that there were not more than 1,003 votes cast there for the Democratic ticket in that county during that election, leaving over 3,185 spurious votes that were in the returns made of the vote in Dallas County from these 14 precincts.

Now, to go back again to the conspiracy, you find from the report of the minority of the committee that as to ten or eleven of these precincts they admit that the vote there can not be counted, and therefore that it should be rejected. This is substantially an admission that the vote cast there was spurious, and for this reason they admit that the vote of these ten or eleven precincts ought to be rejected. We agree that that is the case, but we insist further that these other three or four precincts which the contestee endeavors to save can not properly be counted for him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how shall we establish the fact of this conspiracy? You have first the fact that the probate judge refused to appoint as inspectors the men whom it was proposed to put on the board of inspectors at each precinct in a position where they could see what was going on. Why was that refusal made, unless it was to avoid the possibility of having any person present who could be a witness of the iniquity and the villainy which was there to be transacted? It is not to be supposed that in the fifteen precincts of this county this large vote would be given in the different precincts, exceeding the white population so largely as it did, unless there had been some preconceived plan among the persons who were managing the election as to what should be the result. It would be quite outside of all experience to find so many isolated instances of fraud without any concert of action, precinct after precinct joining in returning an extravagant vote of this description. Why, then, was this done in the different precincts? It was because a plan had been laid down, a scheme had been concocted, by which these persons were to enter into a conspiracy to return votes that would place the contestee in a seat in this House, when, in point of fact, he had not been elected. Look through the list, which you will find in the printed record, and you will see the uniform manner in which these precincts were villainously carried by the return of a vote beyond that which was cast there, and beyond the white vote at those precincts, as has been proved by disinterested witnesses. We have exercised the utmost liberality in passing upon those beats so far as they can reasonably be supposed to present an honest return of votes, and therefore wherever there was supposed to be uncertainty as to the number of white votes cast at the polls, and there is a certainty as to the number of white people residing in the precinct, we have said: "Well, let it go; perhaps these white people did appear at the polls and cast their votes, and we will give the contestee the benefit of the doubt," while if we had drawn the lines with strictness and rigidly applied the evidence, we should have excluded certainly quite a large number of these votes and increased the majority of the contestant beyond what we have stated it in our report.

As we have gone through this vote, precinct by precinct—as the evidence has developed the truth of the occurrences attending the election in that district—we have found the vote to be in this condition—a condition which of itself, I may say, conclusively proves the existence of one of the foulest conspiracies to violate the laws and to poison the ballot box that has ever been brought to the attention of a Congressional or other legislative body: In Summerfield precinct, which is not questioned, they have returned 160 votes for Mr. Robbins, 2 for Mr. Aldrich; and the evidence is that the white vote of that district did not exceed 31. We have therefore reduced the vote 129. In Woodland beat, where the return was 130 for Robbins—where there were 14 white persons residing, and where the votes are proved by two witnesses to have been no more than that number—we have taken out that number, less the 9 returned for Mr. Aldrich, and left the vote 125 less for the contestee. So in Martins, the vote returned for Robbins was 503; in Orrville, 368; in Lexington, 250; in River beat, 276; in Oldtown, 278; in Union, 293; in Liberty Hill, 274; in Elm Bluff, 123; in Carlowville, 127; in Boykins, 24; in Mitchells, 389; and in the city precinct, 2,014, we having made, it will be remembered, a deduction of 1,253, the return having been 2,021.

That shows the vote in those precincts as returned by the officers, who were allowed to manage the election and control the ballot box as they pleased, in obedience to those who were in conspiracy with them. These votes amount to 5,241. Making the deductions which the evidence required should be made, the number is 4,118, leaving, as I have already stated, 3,185 spurious votes in those precincts, in addition to the 30 which appear to have been honestly given to the contestant.

Now, let me call attention to another thing which tends to emphasize the evidence of a flagrant conspiracy on the part of these officers. I refer to the cases in which no vote whatever was given to the contestant. It is not to be supposed that where such large numbers of votes were cast as 503, 278, 276, etc., there would be no vote whatever for the contestant; yet, according to the returns made by these officers in those precincts, not a single vote was given for him. All the votes in these precincts were in an unscrupulous manner turned into the ballot box as votes for the contestee and counted for him for the purpose of returning him here as a member.

Now, let us look further for the purpose of determining this question of conspiracy. When the witnesses were before the notary occasion was taken to offer evidence to the effect that these inspectors of elections were men of fair character. They stand here upon the presumption of fairness of character as a shield against these charges of fraud, illegality, and iniquity. Undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, where a person holds an official position, the presumption is that he obeys the law and discharges his duties faithfully. So, there is a presumption of innocence in favor of every man accused of crime. Yet how easily and how readily this presumption is overthrown when a witness comes before a court of justice and gives evidence that an offense has been committed. By such evidence the presumption is entirely overthrown and the obligation is placed upon the person who claims and insists upon his innocence to vindicate himself if he can against the imputation of fraud and illegality.

Now, what have these officers done in these various precincts—either the 4 in which the minority contend the election was fairly conducted or the 10 where, as they concede, the election was not conducted in such a way as to entitle it to confidence? What is the position in which these persons place themselves? Notwithstanding the evidence of a very large number of fraudulent votes and the evidence given to establish the real vote in those precincts, no one of these persons, either in the 4 precincts or the 10, has gone upon the stand to testify that his conduct in connection with that election was legal and honest and that the returns made represented the true state of the vote cast. These circumstances of themselves, without anything further, are sufficient to overthrow every possible presumption in favor of their integrity.

Why, Mr. Speaker, when a charge is made against a person involving criminality or imputing disreputable conduct to him and he has an opportunity of taking the stand to testify that the charge is not true, would not an innocent individual inculpated in this manner instinctively take the stand to rebut such a charge and to attest his innocence? If these men had been innocent, if there had been a consciousness on their part that they could so testify, they would have rushed over each other for the purpose of reaching the notary and giving evidence in vindication of their action, showing that they had acted fairly and honestly and that the election had been legally and honestly conducted. But not one of them undertakes in this way to exculpate himself. The evidence of the few inspectors called for the contestant, with the exception of Tavel, to whom I have called attention, went directly to prove that in the precincts where they were inspectors the election was fraudulently carried on and the vote dishonestly returned.

I refer to these circumstances as cogent evidence establishing the fact that there was a foul conspiracy on the part of these individuals, in which the probate judge was a prime mover, and in which the officers of election, the inspectors and the clerks, were a party, to fabricate the returns and to place votes in the box and return them for the benefit of the contestee in this case; votes that under no possible circumstance was he entitled to or had he the merest shadow of a foundation to claim.

Now, sir, when we take into consideration these circumstances and the force and the effect of them, these voluntary abdications by these men who were implicated in this matter of fraud of all disposition to attempt to exculpate themselves, what other inference can be drawn from what has taken place than that there was this conspiracy? Was it not—in addition to the direct evidence given concerning the votes of this precinct—was it not the most comprehensive evidence that could be presented of the existence of a conspiracy, of a concerted action for the purpose of depriving the people of that locality of their rights and foisting a member on this House who had no right to a seat here? You know, as a matter of experience, that when there is concerted action taking place, when such a conspiracy is set on foot, it is not proclaimed to the winds of heaven; it is kept as secret as possible in the breasts of the parties to the illegal action—the participants and movers in the conspiracy themselves. The fact that they did not take any testimony to exculpate themselves is peculiarly convincing, because to do so would be to still further implicate themselves and acknowledge the existence of the fraud; and hence we are driven by force of circumstances to ascertain the existence of the concerted action by the existence of the incident of persons cooperating to secure the same end, and determine that fact by ascertaining that they are occupying the same position, that they are working to the same purpose and pursuing the same methods, all of which point to the one fact that the conspiracy was set on foot, and that each one was performing his share in the effort to make it a success; for, Mr. Speaker, if we see a number of persons engaged in bringing about a particular result, no matter what the result may be, and their actions are consistent with the existence of a design to bring about such a result, and that they finally do succeed in bringing it about, all must assume that there was some concerted action, some agreement or arrangement between them to cement their unity of conduct to reach the result afterwards accomplished. That is precisely the situation here. You have also, as I have said, the large votes that were returned from the different precincts, all indicating the improbability of any such a vote being given, and the conceded illegal vote of 3,185 for the contestee.

In reference to the Woodlawn precinct, the evidence of the witnesses shows that there were only 45 white voters in the precinct. In Lexington precinct there were only 45; in River precinct only 15 or 20, and in Oldtown from 175 to 200 voters in the precinct, and there was no distinction in that number between the white and the black. This number included all of them; and then you refer to the testimony of Mr. Craig, to which attention has already been called, that seven-tenths of the voters of these precincts of this county were colored and Republican and that the men had been persuaded not to register or vote at the polls, and counsel for contestee has admitted in the most solemn manner and in his brief that such was their action, and that these persons abstained from voting. At Liberty Hill the evidence shows that there were not over 30 white voters in the beat. At Carlowville only 31 to 33; at Mitchells, from 30 to 35; all going to show in every instance the same conspiracy existed through all these precincts, and that votes far in excess of the number of the white legal voters living in the precinct were returned at this election. No more flagrant violation of the laws of election—and they are frequent enough it is mournful to say—can be found in the history of any State or any locality in the Union, no matter how debased, low, or corrupt it may be, than is exhibited in the returns made on this occasion when they come to be gauged and measured by the circumstances to which I have directed your attention. What are we to say in reference to returns of such character? The minority say that there are at least 3,171 illegal votes, or fraudulent votes, and therefore 10 of the precincts must necessarily be thrown out. Where and why should they draw the line between the 10 and the 4? Where can be the difference? You see the evidence of conspiracy is as applicable to the one as to the other. The persons who were asked to be appointed on the board of inspectors were not appointed in either of the 4 precincts; the persons who were the inspectors in the 4 precincts neither of them asked to come on the stand and vindicate the integrity of his conduct. They are as dumb as an antediluvian corpse, and this very dumbness runs through the entire range of all the persons engaged in these official capacities on the day of that election in the entire 14 precincts. They all acted alike and from the same motives.

Now, as a matter of justice to the House, as a matter of justice to the people of the United States, as a matter of justice to the State of Alabama, where certainly the influence of your action must be felt in the future, and may have much to do in the way of redeeming the political delinquency of that State, is it not your duty, is it not the duty of the House, to speak out in potent terms and remove from their association the man who is here seated concededly representing 3,171 or more illegal or fraudulent votes, and where the evidence is so strong and so conclusive as further to show that by a majority of at least 601 he has no right here, but that the seat belongs to his opponent, the contestant in this case?

I leave this matter in your hands. The responsibility is upon the members of this House to vindicate the laws and the rights of Republican institutions. If such an election is to be tolerated, if it is to be allowed to be maintained, and if Representatives are to be chosen and returned in this manner, then so far we have no republican institutions, but this is a government of fraud, of trickery, of knavery, by debased persons who are willing, if they take an oath at all, to violate that oath and return whatever may to them appear to be necessary for the purpose of frustrating the rights of the people and placing in positions of honor and trust persons who have no right to be there. The integrity of the country, the integrity of the State, all require that there should be a signal vindication of the rights of the people, the rights of the law, and the rights of the State in the disposition of this case. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I ask now, Mr. Speaker, that a vote be taken on the two resolutions that are appended to the report of four members of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions of the minority.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William F. Aldrich was not elected a member of the House of Representatives from the Fourth district of Alabama for the Fifty-fourth Congress, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That Gaston A. Robbins was duly elected a member of the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fourth district of Alabama, and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. DINSMORE. Upon these resolutions I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on substituting these resolutions for the resolutions offered by the majority.

Mr. DANIELS. I should like to have it understood that this vote is as to whether Mr. Robbins is to remain in the seat or not. That is the substance of this, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of it.

Mr. DINSMORE. Is the House called upon to vote on the resolutions of the minority?

The SPEAKER. The House is now called upon to vote upon the question of the substitution of the resolutions of the minority for those of the majority.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 58, nays 173, not voting 124; as follows:

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. COFFIN and Mr. LIVINGSTON as directors of Columbia Hospital.

The SPEAKER. On the question of agreeing to the resolutions of the majority, the ayes have it, and the resolutions are agreed to. The Chair understands that the member desires to be sworn.

Mr. DANIELS. I ask that Mr. Aldrich be sworn in.

Mr. Aldrich appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The House is now in recess until 8 o'clock, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, will please take the chair at the evening session.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 1.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

Mr. POOLE (when the name of Mr. STRODE of Nebraska was called). Mr. Speaker, Mr. STRODE, not thinking any man in the American Congress would be mean enough to call "no quorum" on the Union soldiers to-night to keep them from getting their pensions, and not feeling very well, has absented himself from this meeting, the first Friday evening session he has failed to attend, and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. FARIS (when the name of Mr. STEELE was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Major STEELE, returned from his home in Indiana yesterday and on the way contracted a severe cold. I talked with him this afternoon in the Hall and found that he was quite indisposed, and that is the reason he is not present this evening. I ask that he be excused.

Mr. COFFIN (when the name of Mr. WELLINGTON was called). Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. WELLINGTON, left here on Wednesday night feeling very ill, and is now sick at his home. I ask that he be excused.

There being no objection, Mr. WELLINGTON was excused.

Mr. MAHON (when the name of Mr. WOOMER was called). Mr. Speaker, as is known to the House, my colleague, Mr. WOOMER, is badly crippled. He is able to be in the House during the daytime; but it is exceedingly unsafe for him to come out at night. I ask that he be excused.

There being no objection, Mr. WOOMER was excused.

The roll call having been concluded,

Mr. TAFT. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. GROSVENOR, is ill at home. I ask that he be excused.

There being no objection, Mr. GROSVENOR was excused.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the objection to excusing my colleague, Mr. SULZER, is withdrawn.

The question being again put, there was no further objection, and Mr. SULZER was excused.

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague, Mr. DINSMORE, be excused. He is in somewhat delicate health, and when he closed his speech to-day was quite exhausted.

There being no objection, Mr. DINSMORE was excused.

Mr. PITNEY. In regard to my colleague, Mr. PARKER, who is one of the most faithful members in attendance on these evening sessions, I want to say that he has recently received news of the sudden death of his mother's brother; and he told me to-day that he was obliged to go home and attend the funeral, which is to be held to-morrow. I presume that he has departed from Washington on that errand. I therefore ask that he be excused.

There being no objection, Mr. PARKER was excused.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask an excuse for the gentlemen from Missouri, Mr. MOZLEY and Mr. BARTHOLDT, who have gone home on account of a death in the family.

There being no objection, Mr. MOZLEY and Mr. BARTHOLDT were excused.

Mr. JENKINS. I also ask an excuse for my colleague from Wisconsin, Mr. BARNEY. He has been called home by an important telegram. He did not disclose to me the nature of the business calling him away.

There being no objection, Mr. BARNEY was excused.

Mr. AITKEN. I ask an excuse for the gentleman from California, Mr. JOHNSON, who is busily engaged, no doubt, in looking after those diamonds which were stolen at his hotel.

Several MEMBERS. What is the excuse?

Mr. BARHAM. The gentleman from California was excused to-day, and there is no necessity that he be excused again.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If it is resolved to continue the session of the House and to revoke all leaves of absence, that would include, as I understand, those granted during this call. We are continuing the session of the House simply to undo what we have done, unless it is the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to move an adjournment upon the completion of the roll call.

Mr. PICKLER. I did not catch the remark of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. As we have been granting leaves of absence pending the roll call, my suggestion was that if the gentleman, on the completion of the roll call, should offer a resolution revoking all leaves of absence and ordering the arrest of absentees, every leave which has been granted during the last half hour would be revoked.

And I suggest that the way to reach it would be, first, if it is intended to arrest the absentees and bring them before the bar of the House, to order the arrest of those not recorded as present on this call, and then to excuse those members to whom it may be desired to grant leave of absence, which would have the effect of excluding them from arrest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that it would be competent to order the arrest of those who are absent without excuse without revoking the leaves of absence.

Mr. BAILEY. But the gentleman from South Dakota will understand, if all of the leaves are granted and not revoked, that it would be utterly impossible to obtain a quorum, and we may as well adjourn at once.

Mr. TALBERT. As I understand it, the rule applying usually to calls of the House does not apply to Friday night sessions, if I am not mistaken; that is to say, the rule applicable to the issuance of warrants on these occasions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The new rule, the Chair would state in response to the suggestion of the gentleman, does not, but the old rule, which has been readopted, does apply to such cases.

Mr. TALBERT. My understanding was that in adopting the new rule there was a proviso that the warrants of arrest should not apply to these sessions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The new rule has been adopted, which differs on that subject, but the old rule has been reenacted and remains in force as in former Congresses.

The Chair will state that 145 members have been recorded as present on this call; not a quorum.

Mr. PICKLER. I move the adoption of the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HICKS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does that include the gentlemen whose names have been read and excused by the House this evening?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No order has been made revoking the leaves of absence.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, if in order, I rise to move to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was adopted. My purpose is simply this: This is the first Friday night that this proceeding——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order at this time.

Mr. TALBERT. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to debate that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not a debatable question.

The pending question is the motion to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, which is not debatable.

Mr. TALBERT. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I make the point of order that the gentleman from South Carolina is out of order; that he can not move to reconsider the vote because he did not vote for the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no knowledge as to how the gentleman voted, there having been no roll call. The presumption is that he voted with the majority, and the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman had better sit down until he learns something about the rules. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. NORTHWAY, it was adopted.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say I hope that resolution——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. TALBERT. Excuse me; I thought the motion was carried. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the gentleman's motion was laid on the table.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. POWERS. I ask unanimous consent for permission to make a speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT and others. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to be permitted to address the House. Is there objection?

Mr. TALBERT, Mr. PICKLER, Mr. HEPBURN, and others objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. PICKLER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. POWERS. The House is very anxious to hear me, evidently. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAFF. Before I make up my mind about objecting, I want to know on what side of the question the gentleman is going to talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. On "our side," of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to make a statement to the House of what he intends to say.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the gentleman from South Dakota be excused, and as I do not desire myself to submit any remarks on the motion, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Vermont.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. POWERS. I make the point of order that I had the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The House will be in order, and the Chair will recognize no gentleman unless order is restored upon the floor.

Mr. TALBERT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to inquire, if the gentleman had the floor, how he can be prevented from addressing the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not have the floor.

Mr. POWERS. I rose and asked unanimous consent to make a speech. Objection was made from various quarters, but the same objections subsequently were withdrawn. Now, I insist that the original request is the only matter pending before the House. It is apparent and must be to the Speaker that there is a very general desire that my request be granted. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Vermont that he did request the privilege of addressing the House. Thereupon numerous objections were made, and the question was decided. It could not be renewed by several members saying they withdrew the objection.

Mr. POWERS. I renew the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont asks anew the privilege of addressing the House.

Mr. HEPBURN (without rising). I object.

Several other members objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. POWERS. No gentleman can object unless he rises in his place.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. POWERS. I raise the point of order that no objection can be made by a gentleman unless he rises in his place and addresses the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already announced that the request has been objected to.

Mr. BAILEY. I move to excuse the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] from attendance upon this session of the House.

Several members objected.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not ask unanimous consent. I move that the gentleman be excused from attendance upon this session of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that in the opinion of the Chair the motion is not in order, for this reason: Under the rule the Clerk proceeded to call the names of absentees, when excuses were in order. Subsequently to that the House adopted a resolution to send for absent members. When any absent member is brought into the House, it will be competent then for the House to excuse him. Otherwise, while the House is under this order to bring in absent members, the Chair thinks that no motion to excuse a member is in order.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Chair please, I will be frank——

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). I will be frank in saying to the Chair that my purpose was, if the Chair held that way, to then appeal, and upon that to yield and permit the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] to address the Chair; but now a serious question is raised, in which I feel some interest myself, and I desire to suggest to the Chair in all seriousness that the original call was for the purpose of rendering excuses for nonattendance, those excuses to be rendered by gentlemen who did not happen to be in the Hall of the House during the first roll call, but who had come in pending the second roll call. Any gentleman so coming in was privileged then, when his name was called, to rise and offer any excuse he pleased or ask to be recorded as present.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is addressing himself to a point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. What point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, the gentleman is endeavoring to state it. The Chair will not interrupt the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair himself stated the ground of his ruling, and if the gentleman from South Dakota did not understand it, that is a matter between him and the Chair.

Mr. PICKLER. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. BAILEY. Then you very pertinently inquired of the Chair. I myself understood perfectly what the Chair decided. I understood the Chair to decide that it was not in order now to move to excuse any member of the House from attendance upon this session. From that decision——

Mr. PICKLER. Do you appeal from that decision?

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to raise the point of order that no debatable question is now pending.

Mr. BAILEY. One point of order is now pending, Mr. Speaker, and another point of order can not be made.

Mr. HEPBURN. What I desire to suggest to the Chair is that no point of order is pending, the Chair having ruled upon the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated what, in the opinion of the Chair, is the rule upon the subject. The Chair did not finally rule upon the subject, although the Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. PICKLER. I thought the Chair had ruled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas upon the point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, this of course becomes a precedent, and I am sure that the Chair is as anxious that the precedent be a correct one as any member on the floor. You would find yourself in this condition: If, after the order of arrest had been made by the House, it should then come to the knowledge of any gentleman on the floor that a member included in the order of arrest was either himself sick or at the bedside of a sick member of his family, the Sergeant-at-Arms in strictness would, in obedience to the order of the House, be compelled to arrest him and take him from his own sick bed or from the bedside of a member of his family. I respectfully submit that it must be within the power of the House, at any time during the entire progress of the call of the House, to excuse any member for whom a good excuse is presented.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. If, under the writ the Sergeant-at-Arms finds a member sick in bed, he returns that excuse here when he comes in with his report, does he not?

Mr. BAILEY. He is not at liberty to take an excuse. His order is to arrest him and bring him to the bar of the House.

Mr. PICKLER. He must either bring him to the bar of the House or report that he is sick, and he can be excused by the House.

Mr. BAILEY. His order is to arrest him. Let me suggest this to the gentleman: Suppose the Sergeant-at-Arms goes to a tavern and finds one of the members sick whom he has been ordered to arrest and he telephones that he has found Mr. A included in his warrant, and that Mr. A is sick, or that Mr. A sits at the bedside of his sick wife, will the gentleman from South Dakota insist that the Sergeant-at-Arms may, in his discretion, fail to carry out the order to arrest that sick member?

Mr. PICKLER. But the Sergeant-at-Arms can report that to the House, and the House can excuse him.

Mr. BAILEY. And the House can excuse before the Sergeant-at-Arms reports as well as after.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HULICK. Suppose the Sergeant-at-Arms should find a member dead. Would he be required to bring his dead body here? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly he would not. You can not arrest a dead man.

Now, Mr. Speaker, rather than have the question incorrectly decided, as I raised the point merely and purely for the sake of permitting the House to gratify its anxiety to hear my distinguished friend from Vermont, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Suppose he should find a member in jail. What would he do? Would he bring him to the bar of the House?

Mr. BAILEY. He could not.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Then your argument fails.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; your question involves a conflict of jurisdiction, and does not reach my contention.

Mr. PICKLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to inquire who raised the point of order upon which these proceedings have been based?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PICKLER. Why is it not?

Mr. PITNEY. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One point of order is pending.

Mr. POWERS. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair has no desire to hear any further debate upon the point of order.

Mr. POWERS. That is an assumption that I hardly think is satisfactory to the House.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 84.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. PICKLER. I move——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. BAILEY. I know that all debate on the point of order is in the discretion of the Chair. If the Chair declares his readiness to rule, and does not desire to hear the gentleman from Vermont on the point of order, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PITNEY. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no proceeding before the House. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] It is evident that you can not get members here to-night, and I am opposed to our spending further time.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seem to have it.

Mr. BISHOP. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 86.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers on that. [Cries of "Too late!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had not completed the announcement of the vote.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirteen gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number; tellers are refused, and the motion is lost.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. COFFIN. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will first state the question to the House. The gentleman from South Dakota moves to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. EVANS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there has been intervening business, and that a motion to reconsider this kind of a motion can not be made after other proceedings have intervened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. According to the recollection of the Chair, the vote has just been announced on the motion to suspend further proceedings, and tellers have been refused.

Mr. LACEY. There has been a motion to adjourn since.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion to reconsider is in order, and also the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. POWERS. I rise for the purpose of making a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider made by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question being taken, the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether the Sergeant-at-Arms is now after the absentees?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair supposes the fact to be that the warrant is now being made out for the arrest of absent members, but so far as the House is concerned, the Sergeant-at-Arms is already engaged in the performance of his functions under the order of the House.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. POWERS. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota will state his point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. My point is, that during a call of the House no other business is in order, and the gentleman can not rise to a question of personal privilege at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that unless the question relates to these proceedings under the call the gentleman from Vermont would not be in order.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and claim the right to define it to the House.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman's question of privilege grows out of any matter connected with the call of the House, undoubtedly he has a right to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In effect the Chair so stated. The Chair stated that the gentleman would not be in order unless the question of privilege to which he rose related to the proceedings under the call.

Mr. POWERS. It is entirely confined to the proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. POWERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, all things come to them that wait. I rose in the utmost good faith to make a few humble remarks to this House, calculated to give the House instruction upon the subject then before it. [Laughter.] I was interrupted by my much-valued friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], but I will now disclose the real purpose of the speech that I proposed to make. I proposed to discuss the propriety of members absenting themselves from their duties here in the House to go home to make Presidential candidates [laughter], but my good friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who has just arrived from a mission of that kind, raised an objection to my talking to the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. May I be permitted to explain?

Mr. POWERS. I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman ought to be permitted to explain the platform. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont has the floor and will please confine himself to the question of privilege.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, the privilege which, I claim, has been violated, by the Chair especially, lies in this fact, that while the 356 members of this House, or so many of them as are present, were clamoring for an opportunity to listen to me, the Chair took it upon himself to prevent them from having that enjoyment. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the matter presented by the gentleman from Vermont does not amount to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. POWERS. The privilege which I claim is this: That every member of this House, when he rises in his place and addresses the Chair, is entitled to a respectful hearing, not only from the Chair, but from the audience. [Laughter.] The audience has given it to me——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont presents no question of personal privilege. He is out of order.

Mr. POWERS. I am coming to that. [Laughter.] The Chair, if he will be patient, will see in a few moments that I have a grievance here that ought to be remedied.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, the gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. POWERS. The privilege is the opportunity to make a speech for the edification and instruction of the House of Representatives [laughter] and the presiding officer of the House. Now, I was about, by way of preamble, to say [laughter]——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. POWERS. I was just about to do so. [Laughter.] I am so constituted, Mr. Speaker, that I can not get at a question of personal privilege without going back and getting a starting point in the same way as a great historian always does. When he undertakes to write the story of a nation it will not do to start right off with current matters; he must go back and ascertain the causes that have led up to the current events.

Now, when I noticed the absence of my good friend from Iowa, although he was absent on a mission that in some sense I approve, nevertheless I thought he ought to have asked permission of this House if he was going to Iowa to assist in making a Presidential candidate, because there are lots of Reed men on this floor. [Applause.] There are lots of McKinley men. [Applause.] I do not know but there is now and then a Quay man. [Applause.] Why, sir, I noticed a few days ago that in the streets of Washington a gentleman was knocked down and robbed because he was trying to bet largely on the nomination of McKinley. I, being a Reed man myself, was not surprised that a man who was going around betting money on McKinley lost it. [Laughter.]

But when my friend from Iowa left his duties here to go out to Iowa to assist in nominating a Presidential candidate, it did seem to me that he violated my privilege, my personal privilege, in not asking my consent that he might go; because he is a Representative on this floor, and my constituency has the right to have the benefit of his valuable counsel in the administration of the affairs of this House; and when, therefore, he ran away from his duty here, he ran away from a duty in which I and my constituents are interested.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. POWERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. MAHON. My friend seems to have some great trouble on his mind about the gentleman from Iowa having gone home to look after some one's Presidential "boom." I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from Vermont is to be the "favorite son" from that State?

Mr. POWERS. Well, Mr. Speaker, as long as Pennsylvania is presenting rather curious quantities for that purpose, I do not know but that Vermont might as well go in. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Vermont will be in order.

Mr. POWERS. I will come to the question directly, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont is out of order.

Mr. POWERS. The question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont will please resume his seat.

Mr. POWERS. Will the Speaker grant me this request—to ask the House if I may not print in the RECORD the remainder of my remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHICKERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague from New York, Mr. GILLET, who is now present, having come here on his own motion without being arrested, may have his name placed on the roll of those present.

Mr. BAILEY. He is entitled to that under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He is not, as the Chair understands, pending a call of the House, without the consent of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. If he appears without being arrested, he is entitled to have his name entered on the roll.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule is:

> Members who voluntarily appear shall, unless the House otherwise direct, be immediately admitted to the Hall of the House, and they shall report their names to the Clerk to be entered upon the Journal as present.

The name of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILLET] will be entered on the Journal as present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to arrest the members of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's motion is out of order, as the House has adopted an order for the arrest of all absent members. Therefore a motion to arrest particular members is certainly out of order.

Mr. WALSH. I submit as a question of order that the only way in which we can disentangle ourselves from this snarl——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is no question of order. The Chair has ruled the gentleman's motion out of order.

Mr. WALSH. I submit that it will be impossible for us to get out of this snarl unless we adopt a special rule, and the only way to get at that is to have the members of the Committee on Rules brought here.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, it being evident that the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has raised the point of no quorum is determined to defeat all pension legislation to-night, and as it is evident that we can not have a quorum by reason of the lateness of the hour, I therefore move that further proceedings be dispensed with. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PICKLER) there were—ayes 34, noes 91.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. AITKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AITKEN. What would be the effect if we were to adjourn at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House would stand adjourned until Monday morning, and all proceedings under the call would fall.

Mr. AITKEN. Would not those members whose names are included in the warrant of arrest be required to make excuses on Monday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They would not.

Mr. AITKEN. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 33, noes 81.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I move that during the absence of the Sergeant-at-Arms the House take a recess, and that in the meantime the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] be permitted to address the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. HICKS. I desire to ask unanimous consent to consider a bill at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can entertain no requests of that character.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 22, noes 80.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not a fact that under the rules of the House Friday night sessions are entirely devoted to the consideration of private pension bills and bills of a similar character; and is it not also a fact that the entire evening has been frittered away up to this time by the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN?]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, it will be entirely useless to expect to secure a quorum of the House at this late hour, so I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the Speaker if it is not true that he has just signed the warrant for the arrest of the absentees?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair would have no hesitation, however, in privately answering the gentleman, if he desires the information.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, as it is perfectly plain that if we arrest these absent members we can not get them here before the hour for adjournment, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there has been no intervening business since the last motion to adjourn.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit to the Chair that the Chair has signed the warrant for the arrest of the absent members, and that is very important business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is hardly intervening business, so far as the House at large is concerned.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Chair does that as the organ of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion is out of order.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to make a motion for a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that that is not in order. The House is without a quorum and proceeding under the rules to secure the attendance of its absent members.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I desire to know if it is not in order to have another call of the House to ascertain who have left the House since the former call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is not in order to have another call upon a call. The officers of the House are engaged in executing the former order of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say this, if the Chair will permit me, that that question has been raised and decided already.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BAILEY. On the point of order of the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already decided it.

Mr. BAILEY. I suppose the Chair wants to be right on the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair thinks he is right.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Chair will permit me to say so, that question has been decided twice affirmatively. I had myself once the honor to be in the chair when it was decided, and followed a decision of Speaker Carlisle when he occupied the chair, and I suppose that the Chair does not want to hold that such a call would not be in order without proper consideration of the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think it would be in order to entertain another call of the House while one is pending and being prosecuted by the officers of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I recall distinctly that the House was in the progress of a call. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] moved a further call of the roll, because it was believed that some members who had been arrested and brought to the Hall had again absented themselves. I then had the honor to be in the chair, and the question was not one free from doubt, but I thought then, as I think now, that the House must have the power to ascertain if absent members, having been arrested and having been brought before the House were still present. I decided that it was in order to order a further roll call, and upon investigation I found that Speaker Carlisle had decided the very question.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to page 238 of the Manual:

> Pending proceedings under a call of the House, the House may order the roll call to be repeated to ascertain which of the members are then absent; and it is in order to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody members who have absented themselves since the first call of the roll.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the roll, to see what members have absented themselves since the former call.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PICKLER. It being evident that the opponents of pension legislation do not intend that there shall be any business done to-night, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota moves that further proceedings under this call be dispensed with.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, has not that motion been laid on the table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from South Dakota is in order. The gentleman moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PICKLER demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 71.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As many as favor the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota to dispense with further proceedings under the call will, when their names are called, say "aye"; those opposed, "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 32, nays 109, not voting 214; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], coming over from a previous day.

The resolution submitted by Mr. CALL on the 9th instant, and modified on the 12th instant, was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, directed to obtain from the Washington Gas Light Company and report to the Senate a statement, under oath, showing the amount of cash on hand on the 1st day of January, 1895, including money on deposit in banks and elsewhere; also, a statement of the money received from consumers of gas; also, how much money received from other sources, each to be given separately; also, the disbursements of money and for what purpose; also, the amount of money at the close of business on the 31st of December, 1895, including money in bank and elsewhere; and also to report to the Senate such further facts in regard to the management of the business of supplying the people of Washington with gas and coal, and the price of each, and also the illuminating power of the gas so furnished, as they may deem material for action by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

Mr. PLATT. It is rather unusual to pass a resolution directing a committee of this body to obtain certain information. I do not say that the Senate ought not to have the information; I think we ought to have it; but certainly if the committee is to be directed to obtain the information from a private corporation there should be attached to the resolution power to send for persons and papers, for it can not get it in any other way, except by having power to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to such an amendment if the Senator from Connecticut desires it. I supposed the committee would use whatever means were necessary to accomplish the purpose if the resolution were passed; but I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, and will add to the resolution the words "that the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to state to the Senate that this subject has been under thorough investigation before the Committee on the District of Columbia of this body and also the committee of the other House, and as far as I could catch the terms of the resolution from the reading at the desk I think the information has already been furnished to the House committee and that it appears in a public document. If there is any fact called for by the resolution which is not in that document, in the information returned by the company to the House committee, I did not catch the reading of the resolution correctly. I think all the information asked for by the resolution is already in a document published by the House of Representatives, and in response to information called for by the House District Committee. We are investigating the same question in the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate. I will only say to the Senator from Florida—I am not positively certain that my statement is absolutely accurate, but if he will send for that document he can see very soon whether it does not embrace all the information that he proposes to call for.

Mr. CALL. This subject has been under investigation by committees of this body for the seventeen years in which I have been in the Senate of the United States. I have no other interest in the resolution than have the people at large here, and it was presented at the request, as I understand, of a large number of prominent people in the District of Columbia. However, as the Senator from West Virginia has made the suggestion that possibly there may be such information in a document already printed, I have no objection to a day's delay, and I will ask that the resolution may lie over until to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR THE SEIZURE OF VESSELS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, pursuant to the——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Morning business has not yet been concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon; I thought the morning business was concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. CALL, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate what orders have been issued from the Treasury Department to seize vessels of the United States loaded with arms and munitions of war, etc.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PLATT. Let the resolution be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CALL on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate what orders have been issued from the Treasury Department to seize vessels of the United States loaded with arms and munitions of war, with passengers on board, suspected to be destined for foreign ports, and under what authority of law such seizures and arrests have been made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 365) to fix the date of discharge of Thomas Johnson;

A bill (H. R. 2672) concerning tonnage tax;

A bill (H. R. 3715) for the relief of Capt. W. J. Kountz;

A bill (H. R. 3013) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine engineer service, and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve; and

A bill (H. R. 4698) to provide an American register for the steamer Matteawan.

THE FINANCIAL POLICY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER], coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PALMER on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, First. That it is the policy of the United States to maintain the existing legal and commercial standard of value.

Second. That the unlimited coinage by the United States of silver dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver with forced legal-tender quality for all debts, public and private, would subvert the existing legal and commercial standard of value by establishing a standard of values based upon silver coinage only.

Mr. PALMER. The Senate seems to be now engaged in the discussion of two very important questions, and I am content that this resolution shall lie over. I propose, however, at some convenient time to ask the Senate to take up the resolution, when I shall submit some remarks upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to call from the table the answer of the Secretary of the Interior to the resolution of inquiry which passed the Senate on the 4th instant, and I shall move to have that answer referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I desire to make a few observations upon it before it is committed, if I may have the permission of the Senate to do so. The whole matter will not occupy more than five minutes of time, and in all probability will not lead to any debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah, to take from the table the communication referred to by him, the indorsement upon which will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to the Senate resolution of the 4th of March, as to the reason the nonagricultural and unallotted lands of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation have not been restored to the public domain and proclaimed open to entry and location.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah, to refer the communication to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, it would be unfair to send to the Committee on Indian Affairs, without a statement which will show to the Senate its utter incompleteness, this alleged answer to the resolution of the Senate, sent by the Secretary of the Interior, and without calling the attention of this body to the wrong which is being perpetrated, not only upon the people of Utah and of the West, but upon the Treasury of the United States, by the persistent inaction of the Secretary of the Interior and his refusal, by that inaction, to obey the mandate of the law. This communication is not an answer. It is merely an evasion. Where it is not discourteous to the Senate it is misleading. It is discourteous to the Senate in that it does not give any reply to a very proper inquiry propounded to the Secretary of the Interior by the Senate, but refers us to the geological report of some special agent, who was sent, outside of the law, with instructions to examine the character of the land which the law says shall be thrown open to settlement and mineral entry. It is no more a reply for the Secretary of the Interior to state to the Senate that certain valuable mineral deposits exist there than it would be a proper answer of the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate, had he been required by law to build certain warships, to say that some scientist had discovered a new barnacle which fastened upon the bottoms of vessels, and therefore the Secretary of the Navy deemed it inadvisable to execute the law.

The communication of the Secretary of the Interior is misleading, in this, that it states that the matter of the opening of the Uncompahgre Reservation is now in the hands of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior has not been advised as to the President's purpose. Nowhere in all the voluminous correspondence which has been had on this question is there any showing, nor has there been any public showing by the Secretary of the Interior, that he has reported to the President of the United States according to the terms and provisions of the law the designation of the lands not allotted to the Indians.

I desire to call attention to the fact that the Senate may now have notice of it and that the Committee on Appropriations may have notice of it, that there was appropriated in 1894 the sum of $16,000 to pay for the work of a commission to allot lands in severalty to the Uncompahgre Indians and to treat with the Uintah Indians in Utah for the disposal of portions of their reservation. That commission was appointed in November of 1894, and proceeded to Utah, ostensibly to engage in its work of treating with the Indians, but as late as March, 1895, in communication with the Secretary of the Interior, the commission states that it so far has been unable to do anything because of the fact that the ground was covered with snow. The whole business has been conducted just along that line of ignorance and misconception. A commission was sent into the tops of the Rocky Mountains at the beginning of winter to examine the soil as to its character and fitness for agricultural purposes; a commission of gentlemen who knew nothing whatever concerning the character of the soil, no matter how estimable they may have been in other respects, was sent to the reservation and encamped there for months, drawing pay from the Treasury of the United States and absolutely performing no public service, as is shown by the official correspondence.

Mr. President, in asking that this so-called answer of the Secretary of the Interior shall go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, I desire most emphatically now to protest against any appropriation which may be charged to the account of the people of the West in treating with the Indians, which shall be so mismanaged; and I desire here and now publicly to protest against the implied assumption of the Secretary of the Interior that he alone knows anything about the character of the land in the Uintah and Uncompahgre reservations of Utah. I insist that he has not the right to set up his individual opinion against the declaration of the law of the United States, which says that, under certain contingencies, these reservations shall be declared open to settlement.

The men who have had this matter in charge have had the impertinence to assume that the only ones desiring to have the reservations opened were men who are the agents of corporations seeking to obtain control of the asphaltum lands of Utah.

The Secretary of the Interior intimates as the only possible reason for his failure to carry out the law, his individual opinion that it would be well for Congress to pass an act requiring that the mineral lands in the Uncompahgre Reservation shall be sold or leased at public sale to the highest bidder for cash; that if this were done vast sums of money would come into the public Treasury, and if the lands were allotted in the ordinary way, by settlement and mineral entry, the Government would be deprived of extensive profits which should go into its Treasury.

Mr. President, this is a misconception of the real situation. If these mineral lands should be put up at auction and sold to the highest bidders they would necessarily fall into the hands of large corporations. If they are located as are all other mineral lands of the United States, the hardy pioneer, the man who has made his prospecting trips through that region of country, will, under the law, take his just portion of the valuable land, paying therefor the price fixed by statute. The law restrains the entries on the asphaltum ground to 10 acres to each person, as it restrains the entries of all mineral lands to defined areas.

Mr. President, it would not be fair to leave the matter without protesting, in the name of the West, against the management of affairs so distant from Washington by a sentiment so wholly alien to the progress of the West. It is a great misfortune that the Secretary of the Interior is not required by law to know something of the country over which he exercises such absolute jurisdiction—a jurisdiction more autocratic than that of the Congress of the United States, because here, when laws are to be passed affecting the welfare of the West, there is discussion. With the Secretary of the Interior there is merely his dictum of personal opinion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah, to refer the communication of the Secretary of the Interior to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GORDON. I hope the Senator will not object to the communication lying over for one more day. It is a new question to some of us, and I should like an opportunity of looking into it to some extent while the subject is still before the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Utah will go over.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 13th instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. 477) to repeal section 553 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, requiring the district judge for the southern district of Florida to reside at Key West;

An act (S. 636) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Chamberlain, S. Dak.;

The joint resolution (S. R. 65) to print the annual report of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service;

The joint resolution (S. R. 78) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute the medals and diplomas awarded by the World's Columbian Commission to the exhibitors entitled thereto; and

The joint resolution (S. R. 85) granting the county of Cole, Mo., permission to use certain rooms in the United States building at Jefferson City, Mo.

JOINT RESOLUTION BECOMES A LAW.

The joint resolution (S. R. 43) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and distribute seeds, bulbs, etc., as has been done in preceding years, having been presented to the President on March 3, 1896, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, has become a law without his approval.

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. Pursuant to the notice I gave on March 10, I desire to submit, very briefly, a few remarks upon Senate bill 2147, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill, as requested.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 2147) establishing additional regulations concerning immigration to the United States, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of March 3, 1891, in amendment of the immigration and contract-labor acts, be, and hereby is, amended by adding to the classes of aliens excluded from admission into the United States the following:

"First. All persons over 14 years of age who can not read and write the language of their native country or some other language, except that an aged person not so able to read and write who is the parent or grandparent of an admissible immigrant may accompany or be sent for by such immigrant.

"Second. For the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read and write, as required by the foregoing section, the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on numbered uniform pasteboard slips, each containing five lines of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. These slips shall be kept in boxes made for that purpose and so constructed as to conceal the slips from view, each box to contain slips of but one language, and the immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made. Each immigrant shall be required to draw one of said slips from the box and read, and afterwards write out, in full view of the immigration officers, the five lines printed thereon. Each slip shall be returned to the box immediately after the test is finished, and the contents of the box shall be shaken up by an inspection officer before another drawing is made. No immigrant failing to read and write out the slip thus drawn by him shall be admitted, but he shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him, as now provided by law. The inspection officers shall keep in each box at all times a full number of said printed pasteboard slips, and in the case of each excluded immigrant shall keep a certified memorandum of the number of the slip which the said immigrant failed to read or copy out in writing."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this bill is intended to amend the existing law so as to restrict still further immigration to the United States. Paupers, diseased persons, convicts, and contract laborers are now excluded. By this bill it is proposed to make a new class of excluded immigrants and add to those which have just been named the totally ignorant. The bill is of the simplest kind. The first section excludes from the country all immigrants who can not read and write either their own or some other language. The second section merely provides a simple test for determining whether the immigrant can read or write, and is added to the bill so as to define the duties of the immigrant inspectors, and to assure to all immigrants alike perfect justice and a fair test of their knowledge.

Two questions arise in connection with this bill. The first is as to the merits of this particular form of restriction; the second as to the general policy of restricting immigration at all. I desire to discuss briefly these two questions in the order in which I have stated them. The smaller question as to the merits of this particular bill comes first. The existing laws of the United States now exclude, as I have said, certain classes of immigrants who, it is universally agreed, would be most undesirable additions to our population. These exclusions have been enforced and the results have been beneficial, but the excluded classes are extremely limited and do not by any means cover all or even any considerable part of the immigrants whose presence here is undesirable or injurious, nor do they have any adequate effect in properly reducing the great body of immigration to this country. There can be no doubt that there is a very earnest desire on the part of the American people to restrict further and much more extensively than has yet been done foreign immigration to the United States. The question before the committee was how this could best be done; that is, by what method the largest number of undesirable immigrants and the smallest possible number of desirable immigrants could be shut out. Three methods of obtaining this further restriction have been widely discussed of late years and in various forms have been brought to the attention of Congress. The first was the imposition of a capitation tax on all immigrants. There can be no doubt as to the effectiveness of this method if the tax is made sufficiently heavy. But although exclusion by a tax would be thorough, it would be undiscriminating, and your committee did not feel that the time had yet come for its application. The second scheme was to restrict immigration by requiring consular certification of immigrants. This plan has been much advocated, and if it were possible to carry it out thoroughly and to add very largely to the number of our consuls in order to do so, it would no doubt be effective and beneficial. But the committee was satisfied that consular certification was, under existing circumstances, impractical; that the necessary machinery could not be provided; that it would lead to many serious questions with foreign governments, and that it could not be properly and justly enforced. It is not necessary to go further into the details which brought the committee to this conclusion. It is sufficient to say here that the opinion of the committee is shared, they believe, by all expert judges who have given the most careful attention to the question.

The third method was to exclude all immigrants who could neither read nor write, and this is the plan which was adopted by the committee and which is embodied in this bill. In their report the committee have shown by statistics, which have been collected and tabulated with great care, the emigrants who would be affected by this illiteracy test. It is not necessary for me here to do more than summarize the results of the committee's investigation, which have been set forth fully in their report. It is found, in the first place, that the illiteracy test will bear most heavily upon the Italians, Russians, Poles, Hungarians, Greeks, and Asiatics, and very lightly, or not at all, upon English-speaking emigrants or Germans, Scandinavians, and French. In other words, the races most affected by the illiteracy test are those whose emigration to this country has begun within the last twenty years and swelled rapidly to enormous proportions, races with which the English-speaking people have never hitherto assimilated, and who are most alien to the great body of the people of the United States. On the other hand, immigrants from the United Kingdom and of those races which are most closely related to the English-speaking people, and who with the English-speaking people themselves founded the American colonies and built up the United States, are affected but little by the proposed test. These races would not be prevented by this law from coming to this country in practically undiminished numbers. These kindred races also are those who alone go to the Western and Southern States, where immigrants are desired, and take up our unoccupied lands. The races which would suffer most seriously by exclusion under the proposed bill furnish the immigrants who do not go to the West or South, where immigration is needed, but who remain on the Atlantic Seaboard, where immigration is not needed and where their presence is most injurious and undesirable.

The statistics prepared by the committee show further that the immigrants excluded by the illiteracy test are those who remain for the most part in congested masses in our great cities. They furnish, as other tables show, a large proportion of the population of the slums. The committee's report proves that illiteracy runs parallel with the slum population, with criminals, paupers, and juvenile delinquents of foreign birth or parentage, whose percentage is out of all proportion to their share of the total population when compared with the percentage of the same classes among the native born. It also appears from investigations which have been made that the immigrants who would be shut out by the illiteracy test are those who bring least money to the country and come most quickly upon private or public charity for support. The replies of the governors of twenty-six States to the Immigration Restriction League show that in only two cases are immigrants of the classes affected by the illiteracy test desired, and those are of a single race. All the other immigrants mentioned by the governors as desirable belong to the races which are but slightly affected by the provisions of this bill. It is also proved that the classes now excluded by law, the criminals, the diseased, the paupers, and the contract laborers, are furnished chiefly by the same races as those most affected by the test of illiteracy. The same is true as to those immigrants who come to this country for a brief season and return to their native land, taking with them the money they have earned in the United States. There is no more hurtful and undesirable class of immigrants from every point of view than these "birds of passage," and the tables show that the races furnishing the largest number of "birds of passage" have also the greatest proportion of illiterates.

These facts prove to demonstration that the exclusion of immigrants unable to read or write, as proposed by this bill, will operate against the most undesirable and harmful part of our present immigration and shut out elements which no thoughtful or patriotic man can wish to see multiplied among the people of the United States. The report of the committee also proves that this bill meets the great requirement of all legislation of this character in excluding the greatest proportion possible of thoroughly undesirable and dangerous immigrants and the smallest proportion of immigrants who are unobjectionable.

I have said enough to show what the effects of this bill would be, and that if enacted into law it would be fair in its operation and highly beneficial in its results. It now remains for me to discuss the second and larger question, as to the advisability of restricting immigration at all. This is a subject of the greatest magnitude and the most far-reaching importance. It has two sides, the economic and the social. As to the former, but few words are necessary. There is no one thing which does so much to bring about a reduction of wages and to injure the American wage earner as the unlimited introduction of cheap foreign labor through unrestricted immigration. Statistics show that the change in the race character of our immigration has been accompanied by a corresponding decline in its quality. The number of skilled mechanics and of persons trained to some occupation or pursuit has fallen off, while the number of those without occupation or training, that is, who are totally unskilled, has risen in our recent immigration to enormous proportions. This low, unskilled labor is the most deadly enemy of the American wage earner, and does more than anything else toward lowering his wages and forcing down his standard of living. An attempt was made, with the general assent of both political parties, to meet this crying evil some years ago by the passage of what are known as the contract-labor laws. That legislation was excellent in intention, but has proved of but little value in practice. It has checked to a certain extent the introduction of cheap, low-class labor in large masses into the United States. It has made it a little more difficult for such labor to come here, but the labor of this class continues to come, even if not in the same way, and the total amount of it has not been materially reduced. Even if the contract-labor laws were enforced intelligently and thoroughly, there is no reason to suppose that they would have any adequate effect in checking the evil which they were designed to stop. It is perfectly clear after the experience of several years that the only relief which can come to the American wage earner from the competition of low-class immigrant labor must be by general laws restricting the total amount of immigration and framed in such a way as to affect most strongly those elements of the immigration which furnish the low, unskilled, and ignorant foreign labor.

It is not necessary to enter further into a discussion of the economic side of the general policy of restricting immigration. In this direction the argument is unanswerable. If we have any regard for the welfare, the wages, or the standard of life of American workingmen, we should take immediate steps to restrict foreign immigration. There is no danger, at present at all events, to our workingmen from the coming of skilled mechanics or of trained and educated men with a settled occupation or pursuit, for immigrants of this class will never seek to lower the American standard of life and wages. On the contrary, they desire the same standard for themselves. But there is an appalling danger to the American wage earner from the flood of low, unskilled, ignorant, foreign labor which has poured into the country for some years past, and which not only takes lower wages, but accepts a standard of life and living so low that the American workingman can not compete with it.

I now come to the aspect of this question which is graver and more serious than any other. The injury of unrestricted immigration to American wages and American standards of living is sufficiently plain and is bad enough, but the danger which this immigration threatens to the quality of our citizenship is far worse. That which it concerns us to know and that which is more vital to us as a people than all possible questions of tariff or currency is whether the quality of our citizenship is endangered by the present course and character of immigration to the United States. To determine this question intelligently we must look into the history of our race.

Two hundred years ago Daniel Defoe, in some very famous verses called the "True-born Englishman," defended William III, the greatest ruler, with the exception of Cromwell, whom England has had since the days of the Plantagenets, against the accusation so constantly made at the time that he was a foreigner. The line taken by Defoe is the highly characteristic one of a fierce attack upon his opponents. He declared in lines which were as forcible as they were rough that the English-speaking people drew their descent from many sources; that there was no such thing as a pure-blooded Englishman, and that King William was as much an Englishman as any of them. The last proposition, in regard to the King, whose mother was a Stuart, was undoubtedly true. It was also superficially true that Englishmen drew their blood from many strains; but the rest of the argument was ludicrously false if the matter is considered in the light of modern history and modern science.

For practical purposes in considering a question of race and in dealing with the civilized peoples of western Europe and of America there is no such thing as a race of original purity according to the divisions of ethnical science. In considering the practical problems of the present time we can deal only with artificial races—that is, races like the English-speaking people, the French, or the Germans—who have been developed as races by the operation during a long period of time of climatic influences, wars, migrations, conquests, and industrial development. To the philologist and the ethnologist it is of great importance to determine the ethnical divisions of mankind in the earliest historic times. To the scientific modern historian, to the student of social phenomena, and to the statesman alike the early ethnic divisions are of little consequence, but the sharply marked race divisions which have been gradually developed by the conditions and events of the last thousand years are absolutely vital. It is by these conditions and events that the races or nations which to-day govern the world have been produced, and it is their characteristics which it is important for us to understand.

How, then, has the English-speaking race, which to-day controls so large a part of the earth's surface, been formed? Great Britain and Ireland at the time of the Roman conquest were populated by Celtic tribes. After the downfall of the Roman Empire these tribes remained in possession of the islands with probably but a very slight infusion of Latin blood. Then came what is commonly known as the Saxon invasion. Certain North German tribes, own brothers to those other tribes which swept southward and westward over the whole Roman Empire, crossed the English Channel and landed in the corner of England known as the Isle of Thanet. They were hard fighters, pagans, and adventurers. They swept over the whole of England and the Lowlands of Scotland. A few British words like basket, relating to domestic employments, indicate that only women of the conquered race, and not many of those, were spared. The extermination was fierce and thorough. The native Celts were driven back into the Highlands of Scotland and to the edge of the sea in Cornwall and Wales, while all the rest of the land became Saxon.

The conquerors established themselves in their new country, were converted to Christianity, and began to advance in civilization. Then came a fresh wave from the Germanic tribes. This time it was the Danes. They were of the same blood as the Saxons, and the two kindred races fought hard for the possession of England until the last comers prevailed and their chiefs reached the throne. Then in 1066 there was another invasion, this time from the shores of France. But the new invaders and conquerors were not Frenchmen. As Carlyle says, they were only Saxons who spoke French. A hundred years before these Normans, or Northmen, northernmost of all the Germanic tribes, had descended from their land of snow and ice upon Europe. They were the most remarkable of all the people who poured out of the Germanic forests. They came upon Europe in their long, low ships, a set of fighting pirates and buccaneers, and yet these same pirates brought with them out of the darkness and cold of the north a remarkable literature and a strange and poetic mythology. Wherever they went they conquered, and wherever they stopped they set up for themselves dukedoms, principalities, and kingdoms. To them we owe the marvels of Gothic architecture, for it was they who were the great builders and architects of mediæval Europe. They were great military engineers as well and revived the art of fortified defense, which had been lost to the world. They were great statesmen and great generals, and they had only been in Normandy about a hundred years when they crossed the English Channel, conquered the country, and gave to England for many generations to come her kings and nobles. But the Normans in their turn were absorbed or blended with the great mass of the Danes and the still earlier Saxons. In reality they were all one people. They had different names and spoke differing dialects, but their blood and their characteristics were the same. And so this Germanic people of one blood, coming through various channels, dwelt in England, assimilating more or less and absorbing to a greater or less degree their neighbors of the northern and western Celtic fringe, with an occasional fresh infusion from their own brethren who dwelt in the low sea-girt lands at the mouths of the Scheldt and Rhine. In the course of the centuries these people were welded together and had made a new speech and a new race, with strong and well-defined qualities, both mental and moral.

When the Reformation came this work was pretty nearly done, and after that great movement had struck off the shackles from the human mind the English-speaking people were ready to come forward and begin to play their part in a world where the despotism of the church had been broken, and where political despotism was about to enter on its great struggle against the forces of freedom. Let me describe what these English people were at the close of the sixteenth century, when the work of race making had been all done and the achievements of the race so made were about to begin. I will take for this purpose, not words of my own, but the brilliant sentences of one of the greatest of modern English writers:

> In those past silent centuries, among those silent classes, much had been going on. Not only had red deer in the New and other forests been got, preserved, and shot; and treacheries of Simon de Montfort, wars of Red and White Roses, battles of Crecy, battles of Bosworth, and many other battles been got, transacted, and adjusted; but England wholly, not without sore toil and aching bones to the millions of sires and the millions of sons these eighteen generations, had been got, drained, and tilled, covered with yellow harvests, beautiful and rich possessions; the mud-wooden Ceasters and Chesters had become steepled, tile-roofed, compact towns. Sheffield had taken to the manufacture of Sheffield whittles; Worstead could from wool spin yarn, and knit or weave the same into stockings or breeches for men. England had property valuable to the auctioneer; but the accumulate manufacturing, commercial, economic skill which lay impalpably warehoused in English hands and heads, what auctioneer could estimate?
> Hardly an Englishman to be met with but could do something—some cunninger thing than break his fellow-creature's head with battle-axes. The seven incorporated trades, with their million guild brethren, with their hammers, their shuttles, and tools; what an army—fit to conquer that land of England, as we say, and to hold it conquered. Nay, strangest of all, the English people had acquired the faculty and habit of thinking, even of believing; individual conscience had unfolded itself among them; conscience, and intelligence is its handmaid. Ideas of innumerable kinds were circulating among these men: witness one Shakespeare, a wool comber, poacher, or whatever else, at Stratford, in Warwickshire, who happened to write books—the finest human figure, as I apprehend, that nature has hitherto seen fit to make of our widely diffused Teutonic clay. Saxon, Norman, Celt, or Sarmat, I find no human soul so beautiful these fifteen hundred known years—our supreme modern European man. Him England had contrived to realize. Were there not ideas—ideas poetic and also puritanic, that had to seek utterance in the notablest way? England had got her Shakespeare, but was now about to get her Milton and Oliver Cromwell. This, too, we will call a new expansion, hard as it might be to articulate and adjust; this, that a man could actually have a conscience for his own behoof, and not for his priest's only; that his priest, be who he might, would henceforth have to take that fact along with him. One of the hardest things to adjust. It is not adjusted down to this hour. It lasts onward to the time they call "glorious revolution" before so much as a reasonable truce can be made and the war proceed by logic mainly. And still it is war, and no peace, unless we call waste vacancy peace. But it needed to be adjusted, as the others had done, as still others will do.

This period, when the work of centuries which had resulted in the making of the English people was complete, and when they were entering upon their career of world conquest, is of peculiar interest to us. Then it was that from the England of Shakespeare and Bacon and Raleigh, and later from the England of Pym and Hampden and Cromwell and Milton, Englishmen fared forth across the great ocean to the North American Continent. The first Englishmen to come here settled on the James River, and there laid the foundation of the great State of Virginia. The next landed much farther to the north. I will again borrow the words of Carlyle to describe the coming of this second English migration:

But now on the industrial side, while this great constitutional controversy and revolt of the middle class had not ended, had yet but begun, what a shoot was that that England, carelessly, in quest of other objects, struck out across the ocean, into the waste land, which it named New England. Hail to thee, poor little ship Mayflower, of Delft-Haven; poor common-looking ship, hired by common charter party for coined dollars; calked with mere oakum and tar; provisioned with vulgarest biscuit and bacon; yet what ship Argo, or miraculous epic ship built by the sea gods, was other than a foolish bumbarge in comparison? Golden fleeces or the like these sailed for, with or without effect; thou, little Mayflower, hadst in thee a veritable Promethean spark; the life spark of the largest nation on our earth, so we may already name the transatlantic Saxon nation. They went seeking leave to hear sermon in their own method, these Mayflower Puritans; a most honest indispensable search; and yet, like Saul the son of Kish, seeking a small thing, they found this unexpected great thing. Honor to the brave and true; they verily, we say, carry fire from heaven, and have a power that themselves dream not of. Let all men honor Puritanism, since God has so honored it.

At the period of these two English settlements, and just about at the same time, the Dutch settled at the mouth of the Hudson and the Swedes upon the Delaware. Both, be it remembered, were of the same original race stock as the English settlers of Virginia and New England, who were destined to be so predominant in the North American colonies. At the close of the seventeenth century and during the eighteenth there came to America three other migrations of people sufficiently numerous to be considered in estimating the races from which the colonists were derived. These were the Scotch-Irish, the Germans, and the French Huguenots. The Scotch-Irish, as they are commonly called with us, were immigrants from the north of Ireland. They were chiefly descendants of Cromwell's soldiers, who had been settled in Ulster and of the Lowland Scotch, who had come to the same region. They were the men who made the famous defense of Londonderry against James II, and differed in no essential respect either of race or language from the English, who had preceded them in America. Some of them settled in New Hampshire, but most of them in the western part of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. They were found in all the colonies in a greater or less degree, and were a vigorous body of men, who have contributed very largely to the upbuilding of the United States and played a great part in our history. The German immigrants were the Protestants of the Palatinate, and they settled in large numbers in western Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. The Huguenots, although not very numerous, were a singularly fine body of people. They had shown the highest moral qualities in their long struggle for religious freedom. They had faced war, massacre, and persecution for nearly two centuries, and had never wavered in their constancy to the creed in which they believed. Harried and driven out of France by Louis XIV, they had sought refuge in Holland, in England, and in the New World. They were to be found in this country in all our colonies, and everywhere they became a most valuable addition.

Such, then, briefly, were the people composing the colonies when we faced England in the war for independence. It will be observed that with the exception of the Huguenot French, who formed but a small percentage of the total population, the people of the thirteen colonies were all of the same original race stocks. The Dutch, the Swedes, and the Germans simply blended again with the English-speaking people, who like them were descended from the Germanic tribes whom Cæsar fought and Tacitus described.

During the present century, down to 1875, there have been three large migrations to this country in addition to the always steady stream from Great Britain; one came from Ireland about the middle of the century, and somewhat later one from Germany and one from Scandinavia, in which is included Sweden, Denmark, and Norway. The Irish, although of a different race stock originally, have been closely associated with the English-speaking people for nearly a thousand years. They speak the same language, and during that long period the two races have lived side by side, and to some extent intermarried. The Germans and Scandinavians are again people of the same race stock as the English who founded and built up the colonies. During this century, down to 1875, then, as in the two which preceded it, there had been scarcely any immigration to this country, except from kindred or allied races, and no other, which was sufficiently numerous to have produced any effect on the national characteristics, or to be taken into account here. Since 1875, however, there has been a great change. While the people who for two hundred and fifty years have been migrating to America have continued to furnish large numbers of immigrants to the United States, other races of totally different race origin, with whom the English-speaking people have never hitherto been assimilated or brought in contact, have suddenly begun to immigrate to the United States in large numbers. Russians, Hungarians, Poles, Bohemians, Italians, Greeks, and even Asiatics, whose immigration to America was almost unknown twenty years ago, have during the last twenty years poured in in steadily increasing numbers, until now they nearly equal the immigration of those races kindred in blood or speech, or both, by whom the United States has hitherto been built up and the American people formed.

This momentous fact is the one which confronts us to-day, and if continued, it carries with it future consequences far deeper than any other event of our times. It involves, in a word, nothing less than the possibility of a great and perilous change in the very fabric of our race. The English-speaking race, as I have shown, has been made slowly during the centuries. Nothing has happened thus far to radically change it here. In the United States, after allowing for the variations produced by new climatic influences and changed conditions of life and of political institutions, it is still in the great essentials fundamentally the same race. The additions in this country until the present time have been from kindred people or from those with whom we have been long allied and who speak the same language. By those who look at this question superficially we hear it often said that the English-speaking people, especially in America, are a mixture of races. Analysis shows that the actual mixture of blood in the English-speaking race is very small, and that while the English-speaking people are derived through different channels, no doubt, there is among them none the less an overwhelming preponderance of the same race stock, that of the great Germanic tribes who reached from Norway to the Alps. They have been welded together by more than a thousand years of wars, conquests, migrations, and struggles, both at home and abroad, and in so doing they have attained a fixity and definiteness of national character unknown to any other people. Let me quote on this point a disinterested witness of another race and another language, M. Gustave Le Bon, a distinguished French writer of the highest scientific training and attainments, who says in his very remarkable book on the Evolution of Races:

Most of the historic races of Europe are still in process of formation, and it is important to realize this fact in order to understand their history. The English alone represent a race almost entirely fixed. In them the ancient Briton, the Saxon, and the Norman have been effaced to form a new and very homogeneous type.

It being admitted, therefore, that a historic race of fixed type has been developed, it remains to consider what this means, what a race is, and what a change would portend. That which identifies a race and sets it apart from others is not to be found merely or ultimately in its physical appearance, its institutions, its laws, its literature, or even its language. These are in the last analysis only the expression or the evidence of race. The achievements of the intellect pass easily from land to land and from people to people. The telephone, invented but yesterday, is used to-day in China, in Australia, or in South Africa as freely as in the United States. The book which the press to-day gives to the world in English is scattered to-morrow throughout the earth in every tongue, and the thoughts of the writer become the property of mankind. You can take a Hindoo and give him the highest education the world can afford. He has a keen intelligence. He will absorb the learning of Oxford, he will acquire the manners and habits of England, he will sit in the British Parliament, but you can not make him an Englishman. Yet he, like his conqueror, is of the great Indo-European family. But it has taken six thousand years and more to create the differences which exist between them. You can not efface those differences thus made, by education in a single life, because they do not rest upon the intellect. What, then, is this matter of race which separates the Englishman from the Hindoo and the American from the Indian? It is something deeper and more fundamental than anything which concerns the intellect. We all know it instinctively, although it is so impalpable that we can scarcely define it, and yet is so deeply marked that even the physiological differences between the Negro, the Mongol, and the Caucasian are not more persistent or more obvious. When we speak of a race, then, we do not mean its expressions in art or in language, or its achievements in knowledge. We mean the moral and intellectual characters, which in their association make the soul of a race, and which represent the product of all its past, the inheritance of all its ancestors, and the motives of all its conduct. The men of each race possess an indestructible stock of ideas, traditions, sentiments, modes of thought, an unconscious inheritance from their ancestors, upon which argument has no effect. What makes a race are their mental and, above all, their moral characteristics, the slow growth and accumulation of centuries of toil and conflict. These are the qualities which determine their social efficiency as a people, which make one race rise and another fall, which we draw out of a dim past through many generations of ancestors, about which we can not argue, but in which we blindly believe, and which guide us in our short-lived generation as they have guided the race itself across the centuries.

I have cited a witness of the highest authority and entire disinterestedness to support what I have said as to the fixed and determinate character of the English-speaking race. Now that I come to show what that race is by recounting its qualities and characteristics, I will not trust myself to speak, for I might be accused of prejudice, but I will quote again M. Le Bon, who is not of our race nor of our speech:

Inability—

He says—

to foresee the remote consequences of actions and the tendency to be guided only by the instinct of the moment condemn an individual as well as a race to remain always in a very inferior condition. It is only in proportion as they have been able to master their instincts—that is to say, as they have acquired strength of will and consequently empire over themselves—that nations have been able to understand the importance of discipline, the necessity of sacrificing themselves to an ideal and lifting themselves up to civilization. If it were necessary to determine by a single test the social level of races in history, I would take willingly as a standard the aptitude displayed by each in controlling their impulses. The Romans in antiquity, the Anglo-Americans in modern times, represent the people who have possessed this quality in the highest degree. It has powerfully contributed to assure their greatness.

Again he says, speaking now more in detail:

Let us summarize, then, in a few words the characteristics of the Anglo-Saxon race, which has peopled the United States. There is not perhaps in the world one which is more homogeneous and whose mental constitution is more easy to define in its great outline. The dominant qualities of this mental constitution are from the standpoint of character a will power which scarcely any people except perhaps the Romans have possessed, an unconquerable energy, a very great initiative, an absolute empire over self, a sentiment of independence pushed even to excessive unsociability, a puissant activity, very keen religious sentiments, a very fixed morality, a very clear idea of duty.

Again he says:

But above all it is in a new country like America that we must follow the astonishing progress due to the mental constitution of the English race. Transported to a wilderness inhabited only by savages and having only itself to count upon, we know what that race has done. Scarcely a century has been necessary to those people to place themselves in the first rank of the great powers of the world and to-day there is hardly one who could struggle against them.

Such achievements as M. Le Bon credits us with are due to the qualities of the American people, whom he, as a man of science looking below the surface, rightly describes as homogeneous. Those qualities are moral far more than intellectual, and it is on the moral qualities of the English-speaking race that our history, our victories, and all our future rest. There is only one way in which you can lower those qualities or weaken those characteristics, and that is by breeding them out. If a lower race mixes with a higher in sufficient numbers, history teaches us that the lower race will prevail. The lower race will absorb the higher, not the higher the lower, when the two strains approach equality in numbers. In other words, there is a limit to the capacity of any race for assimilating and elevating an inferior race, and when you begin to pour in in unlimited numbers people of alien or lower races of less social efficiency and less moral force, you are running the most frightful risk that any people can run. The lowering of a great race means not only its own decline but that of human civilization. M. Le Bon sees no danger to us in immigration, and his reason for this view is one of the most interesting things he says. He declares that the people of the United States will never be injured by immigration, because the moment they see the peril the great race instinct will assert itself and shut the immigration out. The reports of the Treasury for the last fifteen years show that the peril is at hand. I trust that the prediction of science is true and that the unerring instinct of the race will shut the danger out, as it closed the door upon the coming of the Chinese.

That the peril is not imaginary or the offspring of race prejudice, I will prove by another disinterested witness, also a Frenchman. M. Paul Bourget, the distinguished novelist, visited this country a few years ago and wrote a book containing his impressions of what he saw. He was not content, as many travelers are, to say that our cabs were high priced, the streets of New York noisy, the cars hot, and then feel that he had disposed of the United States and the people thereof for time and for eternity. M. Bourget saw here a great country and a great people; in other words, a great fact in modern times. Our ways were not his ways, nor our thoughts his thoughts, and he probably liked his own country and his own ways much better, but he none the less studied us carefully and sympathetically. What most interested him was to see whether the socialistic movements, which now occupy the alarmed attention of Europe, were equally threatening here. His conclusion, which I will state in a few words, is of profound interest. He expected to find signs of a coming war of classes, and he went home believing that if any danger threatened the United States it was not from a war of classes, but a war of races.

Mr. President, more precious even than forms of government are the mental and moral qualities which make what we call our race. While those stand unimpaired all is safe. When those decline all is imperiled. They are exposed to but a single danger, and that is by changing the quality of our race and citizenship through the wholesale infusion of races whose traditions and inheritances, whose thoughts and whose beliefs are wholly alien to ours and with whom we have never assimilated or even been associated in the past. The danger has begun. It is small as yet, comparatively speaking, but it is large enough to warn us to act while there is yet time and while it can be done easily and efficiently. There lies the peril at the portals of our land; there is pressing in the tide of unrestricted immigration. The time has certainly come, if not to stop, at least to check, to sift, and to restrict those immigrants. In careless strength, with generous hand, we have kept our gates wide open to all the world. If we do not close them, we should at least place sentinels beside them to challenge those who would pass through. The gates which admit men to the United States and to citizenship in the great Republic should no longer be left unguarded.

O Liberty, white Goddess, is it well
To leave the gates unguarded? On thy breast
Fold Sorrow's children, soothe the hurts of fate,
Lift the down-trodden, but with hand of steel
Stay those who to thy sacred portals come
To waste the gifts of freedom. Have a care,
Lest from thy brow the clustered stars be torn
And trampled in the dust. For so of old
The thronging Goth and Vandal trampled Rome,
And where the temples of the Cæsars stood
The lean wolf unmolested made her lair.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (S. 2672) concerning tonnage tax;

A bill (S. 3013) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine engineer service, and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve; and

A bill (H. R. 4698) to provide an American register for the steamer Matteawan.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 365) to fix the date of discharge of Thomas Johnson; and

A bill (H. R. 3715) for the relief of Capt. W. J. Kountz.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. PUGH. I ask that the House bill on the tariff, with the amendment of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, be laid before the Senate for the sole purpose of enabling me to address the Senate upon the amendment reported as a substitute by the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Chair lays the bill before the Senate. It will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase the revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency.

Mr. PUGH, Mr. President, when my present term in the Senate expires on the 4th of March, 1897, I will have been a member of this body sixteen years. During that time I have been in personal and political association with representative men of all parties distinguished for more or less ability and learning. I have served on high committees with these representatives. I have heard and taken some part in the great debates on important national questions, especially the economic questions of tariff and currency. It must be conceded that the debates on the tariff and currency questions in the two last Congresses and the present session have never been excelled in ability and learning by any lawmaking body in the world.

All these opportunities and means of acquiring information to qualify the people and their representatives, aided by the American press as a powerful auxiliary in the undertaking, have been enjoyed by every voter in the United States who can read and understand the English language. Here we are to-day with about 70,000,000 of people, advanced in the highest civilization and increasing rapidly in number, and in all things requiring the use of money, with a system of government certainly equal to any the highest human capacity has ever originated and administered; blessed with natural advantages, unsurpassed in quality and inexhaustible in quantity, with human capacity, intelligence, energy, skill, and courage not equaled and certainly not surpassed by any population in the world, and supplied with marvelous inventions to aid in the great work of development and progress in agriculture, manufacturing, mechanics, and in transportation and commerce.

With all these wonderful advantages, agencies, and instrumentalities to promote and insure all forms of improvement and progress, why is it that the greatest ability, intelligence, statesmanship, and largest experience of which we justly boast in this great country present the spectacle to the world of confessed inability to understand so as to deal wisely and satisfactorily with present conditions? Who has shown a willingness, what party dares in this crisis to take the risk of formulating and presenting and advocating any specific remedy for the terrible evils that are now causing apprehension, uneasiness, and discontent all over this country? The universal inquiry is, what is the matter? Tell us what you think is the cause of existing troubles. Explain how it is that our people have never had such experience in the history of this country. Who is to blame, or is anybody to blame? Whenever there is any attempt to respond to any of these questions, the air is filled with contradictions and disapproval, and every suggestion is met with counter statements, charges, crimination and recrimination, and so the matter stands. What shall I say is the matter, and what shall I say is the remedy? From the beginning of our troubles, I have never had any doubt about their cause or its inevitable effects, or the remedy. The cause is manifestly the insufficient supply of money, and the lack of circulation and equal distribution of the money now in existence. In a word, it is inherent in our present inadequate and congested currency system. We are in the midst of the experiment to establish in this country the English system of finance.

The question of the quantity and character of money needed by the people in any country in their trade and commerce has always been and will never cease to be the subject of irreconcilable controversy. The parties to such a controversy make the conflict irrepressible between capital and labor. I can express an opinion, however, that will not be questioned, and that is that the people of the United States, according to number, resources, and the advantages I have mentioned, need more money and can make better use of more money than the people of any other country in the world. I have no doubt that the people of the United States can profitably employ double the quantity of money per capita that can be so employed by the same number of people in any other like area of country in the world. Take the character of our people and the character and geographical area of our country as I have described them and compare them with the same number and the same area of country anywhere in the world, and I challenge a denial of my statement that the people of the United States, in their trade and commerce and the development and maintenance of their resources and industries and means of transportation, require more money and can make more use and better use of double the quantity of money now in existence than any like number of people in any other country in the world, and they have less money according to the demand, capacity, and opportunities to use it than any other country in the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Alabama please suspend for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to place before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, such will be taken as the sense of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. PUGH. With a country superior in area and four times the productivity of the whole of Europe, we can not claim one-sixth the amount of gold now in existence in Europe. It has always surprised me why so much is said about per capita supply of currency. It is an invention of money owners and money lenders to mislead and deceive the people. Take present conditions in this country for illustration. It is estimated in round numbers that there is in existence in the United States say $600,000,000 in gold, $600,000,000 in silver, $346,000,000 in greenbacks, $150,000,000 in Sherman Treasury notes, and $207,000,000 in national-bank bills, all aggregating over $1,900,000,000. Put the per capita at $25 if you please, which is an extravagant estimate, it is intended by this deceptive rule to make the people believe that there is in actual circulation among the people in each State, accessible to the people, enough money to give $25 to each man, woman, and child. That the people in each county in every State in the Union have $25 for each man, woman, and child. What is the fact? Where is the $600,000,000 in gold? How much of it is in actual active circulation among the people? How many people have a single gold piece? Who sees any gold, and who handles any gold except the banks as a checking basis, clearing houses in settlement of balances, and bond syndicates. Gold has never been in general use; is not capable of being put into circulation among the people. Pierpont Morgan controls more gold than a million of workingmen in New York. It has never been and can never be made the money of the people, and that explains the persistent demand of its owners to make it the single standard of value and the only redemption basis of all currency. It insures contraction of currency and monopoly of prices. Then take the greenbacks. I doubt whether more than $300,000,000 have been saved from destruction. And since they have become a part of the endless chain to draw gold out of the Treasury they are and will continue to be hoarded in the Treasury and held by gold gamblers, and have practically lost most of their usefulness in circulation among the people. They have become the prize sought by gold speculators, and have nearly disappeared from use as money in circulation, and are being employed mostly in keeping up the raid on the gold reserve in the Treasury.

It may therefore be reasonably estimated that $900,000,000, made up of silver and silver certificates and the bills of national banks and some greenbacks, constitute the entire volume of our circulating medium that goes into markets and makes prices and serves the current use of money. If I am substantially right in my estimates, the deceptive and misleading test of sufficiency of the money supply by the per capita amount in existence would give the real quantity in actual circulation at about $13 per capita, certainly not over $15. And the truth is that in the Southern States, having no large cities where banks exist, the per capita would not reach $3. More than half the money in the Southern States at the $3 per capita is in the banks, and a large amount in actual use among the people is borrowed by them from the banks or money lenders at high rates of interest. The remarkable discussion of the currency question has been fruitful of surprises, and not the least among them is the contention of the gold advocates that the quantity of money or currency in existence or circulation is not an important or influential factor in the trade and commerce of the country and takes no part, or but an immaterial part, in fixing or regulating the prices of property, labor, and commodities.

This manifest absurdity is one of the necessities to which the advocates of gold as the only sound standard and redemption money are driven in the struggle to support their financial system. It is the gravamen of the present controversy about what is the best system of finance. If it makes no difference what is the amount of money in a country, it follows necessarily that the $600,000,000 of gold reported officially as being in the United States will serve all the purposes of a standard of values, and as a redemption basis for the support of an additional supply of sound money it is utterly useless, as there is no necessity to increase the quantity of money beyond the $600,000,000 in gold now in the United States. As the contention of the sound-money gold advocates is too glaring an absurdity, they move up a little and plant themselves on what they declare to be the crucial test of their sound-money system, and that is that gold shall be the only standard of all values and the only primary, irredeemable money, and that all other forms of currency, whether silver or paper, whether issued by the Federal or State governments, or by banks, State or national, shall be only secondary money and must be a representative of gold, and the equivalent of gold, because redeemable only in gold. The accuracy of the foregoing definition of the only financial system now recognized and sought to be enforced in the United States by the Cleveland Administration can not be questioned.

In opposition to the gold standard and gold redemption system of finance now being enforced in the United States, it is proposed and urged that Congress shall first restore silver to the same right of coinage that gold has by existing law by reenacting the coinage act of 1837 that President Jackson approved, and thereby reestablish the only true bimetallic system.

The foregoing statement defines and makes clear and unmistakable the financial issue upon which the people of the United States are now divided and terribly in earnest in the struggle of the respective parties for what each believes to be the better system.

It must be understood and kept constantly in view that the primary and paramount question is as to what shall constitute the coin standard and legal-tender redemption money of the United States. Shall coin standard and redemption legal-tender money be composed of only one metal, or shall it be composed of two metals? Shall we have gold only, or shall we have gold and silver as standard and redemption legal-tender money?

When the coin basis is established as it was by the coinage laws of the United States prior to 1873, the next and the secondary question as to our paper currency redeemable in both gold and silver without discrimination can be more easily adjusted. The question that overshadows all others is, shall the United States have a narrow, contracted, coin basis, made of gold metal, that is scarcer and harder to find and the least capable of being coined into pieces that can be used in circulation, and shall this one metal be made the only support for all the currency to be supplied to the people, and can no more currency be issued and put into circulation than can be redeemed in this one metal?

I am able to form no stronger conviction on any subject than that I have formed and cherished for many years, that no greater calamity could befall this splendid country than to keep it on gold as the only standard and redemption money, and to subject the people of the United States to the use of only such an amount of paper currency and silver coin as would correspond with our supply of gold, in which alone it is all to be redeemable. The people of the United States will never submit to such a calamity if they are capable of self-government.

The most important question that has arisen during my service in the Senate, and the most important and far-reaching question that can arise in the next Presidential election, is the money question, now absorbing public attention in this country and in Europe. There is no subject with which the people and those who seek to represent them and those chosen to represent them ought to be more familiar than with the functions and value of money. In greater or less amounts money is employed in every human pursuit, and contributes materially to its success. Money is indispensable in every human pursuit and undertaking. For this reason the acquisition of money, money making, employs more human effort and a greater variety of human agencies than anything else. It is inexplicable why the problems of finance have so long baffled all degrees of human capacity, experience, and intelligence, and judging the progress and improvement in finance, as evidenced by existing financial conditions in Europe and the United States, the world has advanced but little from where it was in the beginning, when money as a standard of value was substituted in the place of barter. The impossibility of reaching a permanent solution of what seems to be the simple rules and principles of finance grow out of the great disparity between labor and capital as parties to the irrepressible conflict, in ability, opportunity, and means of investigation, to form opinions. It is an interminable and irrepressible conflict between opposing public and personal interests. My duties and responsibilities as a representative have required me to make finance and currency and the functions of money a study to the extent of my ability. I have read standard authors, heard and participated in the great debates in the Senate of the United States, in which all the learning upon this subject seemed to have been exhausted. I have read messages of Presidents, the reports of Secretaries of the Treasury, and after all this labor and opportunity to qualify myself to come to proper conclusions I find myself entangled by a most inexhaustible mass of perverted, and in numerous instances fabricated, history, interwoven and supported by the most plausible reasoning and misleading argument, requiring an amount of skill to discover error and expose it not generally possessed by people who have to labor and those not disposed to apply themselves to reading and study. A great number of such well-meaning people save themselves from the labor and trouble of making up their own opinions by accepting the advice of some one who is no better informed, but acts under the influence of his class or considerations of some personal advantage.

In this connection, I will call attention to a most remarkable state of things. Three years ago there was not a Democratic voter in Alabama or a Democratic newspaper who would not have resented any prediction that at any time in the future, under any circumstances, they would be found opposing the restoration of silver to free coinage and supporting the single gold standard. There was universal agreement and the most perfect harmony upon the question of finance prevailing in the Democratic party of Alabama and all the Southern States. While this is conceded to be an undeniable fact, it is claimed that those Democrats who now oppose free coinage and advocate the gold standard had the right to change, and it was their duty to change their opinions when additional information and additional reflection satisfied them that they had been in error, and seeing they were wrong they gave up silver and took to gold. This is all conceded, but how long will it be before they will make another change? How old must their opinions become before the authors of them can be accepted as standard authority on finance? For fifteen or twenty years, while the new Democratic converts to the single gold standard were advocating and struggling for free silver coinage in the Democratic party, the Republicans in Congress and their public speakers and newspapers in the country were flooding the country with every one of the identical facts and arguments these new converts are now parading and urging as the grounds for their conversion to the gold standard within the last two years.

I heard all these arguments by Republicans in the Senate for the last fifteen years. They were all made and published broadcast against the passage of the Bland-Allison Act seventeen years ago, and since then the Democratic party in State convention in 38 States declared for free-silver coinage, and in 1892 elected a Democratic Congress pledged to the passage of a free-coinage bill. How was it possible that a majority of the Democratic people and their Representatives in Congress in 1892 were so widely mistaken in the pledges of the Democratic party when Mr. Cleveland was last elected? If the Democratic party knew that Mr. Cleveland was for the gold standard, why elect a Senate and House to pass a free-coinage bill? Who believes there would have been any gold-standard Democrats to-day in Alabama, or elsewhere in the South, if Grover Cleveland had sent a message to Congress recommending that silver be restored to free coinage?

But at last this is a Government of the people, and they must take care of it, if they intend to take care of themselves.

As I have stated, there is no public question in which the people are more interested than that of money. How money shall be created and furnished to the people, in what kind and quantity, and how distributed. A financial system is made up necessarily of a trunk or body and branches. Like a tree, it must have a trunk or body to produce and support the branches. The trunk or body of the system is the standard of value and the redemption basis that supplies the limbs with nourishment and produces and supports the fruit of sound currency. The fundamental and primary question with which the people of the United States are now dealing relates to the body or trunk of the tree of finance. The first and paramount question is, shall thet runk or body of our system of finance be composed of two metals or only one metal? Shall the basis of the system be made up of gold and silver or of gold only? After we have decided the first and paramount question as to the composition of our coin standard of value and redemption support of other currency, then the next troublesome question is how shall our coin, our primary and standard money, be supplemented with additional and representative currency in sufficient amounts to meet the legitimate demands of the people in their trade and commerce. All the power that exists to decide these questions is vested in the Government of the people, State and Federal.

When the States framed and ratified the Constitution of the United States, they reserved all power over the subject of money except what they granted to the Federal Government and prohibited to themselves. The only power to create and define the value and functions of money is vested in the Federal Government by the language "That Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate its value," and the States prohibited to themselves "The power to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts." Congress alone can coin money and regulate its value. Congress alone can create money. Money is the creature of law. The State can make nothing but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts. Paper can not be coined for any purpose, and therefore it can not be coined into money. It is manifest that nothing was intended to be coined into primary irredeemable legal-tender money but gold and silver.

When the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted, no country or Government in the world was using gold alone as primary money or had made gold the single standard of value. Every country and Government in Europe had been for centuries in the equal use and allowed the free equal coinage of both gold and silver as primary money and the only standard of value. The universal use and coinage of both gold and silver was founded on the experience of each and every country and Government in Europe, acting alone and independently, without any international agreement. Without reference to degrees of intelligence or differences in commercial conditions, relations, or necessities, it has so happened that every Government in the world had failed to adopt and had never proposed the adoption of the single gold standard of value. Every country and Government on the globe that had adopted but one metal as their standard of value chose silver instead of gold, and have been for centuries in the sole use of silver instead of gold as their primary standard and redemption money.

Under these circumstances and conditions and in the face of this history, our forefathers adopted both gold and silver as primary standard money, without discrimination or limitation in coinage. The first exercise of the power to coin money and regulate its value was by members of Congress, many of whom had aided in framing the Constitution of the United States, and on the recommendation of Hamilton as Secretary of the Treasury, and the approval of Jefferson and Washington, the First Congress made 371¼ grains of pure silver and 412½ grains of standard silver a standard dollar, worth 100 cents, and declared that this silver dollar should be the unit of value in the United States. At that time the United States was just born into existence and had no experience of its own, and of course had to act on information furnished by the world's history and experience in finance. This law of the First Congress went into operation in 1792.

What reasons induced Hamilton and Jefferson to recommend and the First Congress of the United States to pass the free coinage law of 1792? In the report of Hamilton, as Secretary of the Treasury, which Jefferson approved, it is stated that—

> To annul the use of either gold or silver as money is to abridge the quantity of the circulating medium and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full circulation with the evil of a scanty circulation. On the whole, it seems most advisable not to attach the unit to either of the metals, because this can not be done effectually without destroying the office and character of one of them as money and reducing it to the situation of mere merchandise, and this would probably be a greater evil than any occasional variations in the unit from the fluctuations in the relative value of the metals.

This report states the reasons, which are as sound to-day as in 1791, why both gold and silver should be admitted to free and unlimited coinage at a fixed ratio, and these reasons are:

1. If you admit only one metal to coinage, you necessarily abridge the quantity of the circulating medium, and the quantity of the circulating medium is determined by the unrestricted coinage of both metals and decides whether we are to enjoy the benefits of a full circulation or suffer the evils of a scanty circulation.

2. "To abridge the quantity of the circulating medium by limiting coinage you give rise to all the objections which can arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full circulation with the evils of a scanty circulation."

Here then are unqualified opinions of Hamilton and Jefferson, expressed under the gravest responsibility and most mature deliberation that there are benefits to be derived from a full circulation of both metals and that evils would follow the scanty circulation of only one metal. And the report sustains the proposition that free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver is an indispensable predicate of a bimetallic system of finance. But it is urged on the authority of Hamilton and Jefferson that if both gold and silver are admitted to free and unlimited coinage it must be done on a ratio fixed upon the relative commercial value of the two metals as bullion in the bullion markets. But under what conditions is this relative commercial value of the two metals as bullion to be ascertained and fixed by the law? At that time no government or country in the world was on the single gold standard. At that time every government and country in Europe granted the right and privilege of free unlimited coinage to both gold and silver.

So that the relative commercial value of the two metals in 1792 was fixed on the universal free and unlimited coinage of both metals everywhere in the world, except in the Orient, where silver alone was coined and used as money. The commercial ratio can only be fairly ascertained on the basis of the free and unlimited coinage of both metals. When the relative commercial value of the two metals is ascertained and fixed by law on a full and fair trial and experience of free unlimited coinage, as was done in 1792, Hamilton and Jefferson agreed that it would be a greater evil to even abridge the coinage of one metal than would follow from the occasional variations in the relative value of the two metals, as you can not even abridge the coinage of one metal without "effectually destroying the office and character of the other as money and reducing it to the situation of mere merchandise." Why is it that this axiomatic truth can be utterly denied and disregarded in formulating a bimetallic system of finances?

That is precisely what happened by the treatment of silver by our own Government from 1873 to the present hour. And it is precisely what is now being demonstrated by the present financial administration. The wise men who acted under the responsibility of passing the first law of the United States on the subject of money coinage well understood that the fundamental principle of money is that the value of each dollar in any country depends absolutely on the number of dollars in circulation in that country, whether they be gold, silver, or paper. The value of money and of everything else is regulated by the law of supply and demand. There may be, and is, greater variation in the demand for other things, but the demand for money is always constant and never ceases. The demand for money is "equal to the sum of the demands for all other things," as all the products of hand and brain are constantly offered in exchange for money.

It is an important fact that the Constitution of the United States is silent on every form of money except gold and silver, and all the express power of Government to deal with money as a legal tender is limited to gold and silver. There is no power anywhere to make gold or silver anything else than primary irredeemable and legal-tender money. Gold and silver are not issued as money on the credit of the Government. There is nothing behind gold and silver with which to compare it as money; it is money per se.

There is not a word in the Constitution that indicates the grant or existence of any power in Congress to make anything else money but gold and silver. Upon the principle of strict construction, always a rule of Democratic faith, there is no grant of power to Congress to charter banks, and the party has often so declared in national convention. The power to charter banks and to make anything else but gold and silver representative currency redeemable in coin has never been exercised by Congress with the support of the Democratic party.

It is most remarkable that after the United States have had a hundred years' growth and has developed into the proportions of a giant, and is attracting the admiration of the world, that our twelve millions of voters and their representatives should be seriously discussing the question of limiting the power of Congress to the coinage of only one metal as money, and driving the other metal, which we produce in our own country in greater quantity than anywhere else in the world, out of our coinage laws never to be restored, and the fabulous superstructure of wealth made up of the property, labor, and productions of seventy millions of people contracted in value to the standard of one metal that is produced in the least quantity in our own country, and that is the least capable of being handled and circulated among the people in their trade and commerce. But, incredible as it is, the claim is made that the Democratic party, State and national, is preparing, under the leadership of one man, to go back on its whole history, confess that it has been in error for a hundred years, and in solemn convention dedicate itself to the support of the gold standard and the policy of financial contraction. If such a revolution in the cardinal principles of the Democratic party on a subject of such vital and far-reaching importance ever becomes a success, it will be the most remarkable event in political history.

It can not be denied that the bimetallic system of finance established by the First Congress on the approval of Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton was founded on the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver as standard money, and on the recognition of the theory that such coinage of both metals was a necessary constituent element in bimetallism, and that any limitation or discrimination in favor of either metal would degrade the other metal to the condition of mere merchandise and effectually destroy its money functions.

This bimetallic system of finance, consecrated by the deliberate sanction of Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, and the unanimous vote of the First Congress, is now sought to be restored by at least 9,000,000 voters in the United States, who are unfortunately divided and distributed among different national parties so organized as to be dominated and neutralized in their numerical strength by the machinery of national conventions. When this system of bimetallism was put in operation it was soon discovered that a mistake had been made in fixing the ratio between gold and silver at 15 to 1, instead of adopting the French ratio of 15½ to 1. The American ratio of 15 to 1 was an overvaluation of silver as compared with gold to about 3 cents in the dollar, and this difference between the American and French ratio operated against an increase in the United States of the quantity of metallic money expected to be obtained from the coinage of both metals.

Gold was not taken to our mints because a loss would be sustained on it of over 3 cents on the dollar, which could be avoided by taking the gold bullion to the French or other foreign mints, where the ratio was more favorable to gold than in the United States. President Jefferson in 1806 issued an order suspending the coinage of standard silver dollars on information furnished by the Director of the Mint that as fast as our standard silver dollars were coined they were taken up and exported by brokers to make the 3 cents overvaluation of silver in the bullion market in the United States. The fact of the loss of our standard silver dollars by being exported is established by the order of Mr. Jefferson suspending their coinage. It seems strange that gold was not taken to our mint because it was undervalued in the ratio, and was carried to foreign mints to be coined at its full value with silver under the coinage laws of France, and that at the same time that gold was going abroad for an apparent good reason that our standard silver dollars, as fast as they were coined, were gobbled up by brokers to be carried away with gold to foreign countries; and to put an end to this loss of our standard silver dollars Mr. Jefferson ordered their coinage to be suspended. The fact is, we got but little increase in our supply of either gold or silver from the coinage of our own mint.

It is an undisputed fact that the United States Bank, then in operation, from the beginning of its existence, waged war upon any increase in our supply of specie currency composed of either gold or silver, and from the first day our mint was open to the coinage of gold and silver until the last charter of the United States bank expired in 1835 that bank employed all its power to prevent the circulation of gold and silver money and force both out of our country and thereby contract the supply of coin money so as to secure the monopoly of furnishing currency to the people. The causes I have mentioned produced the effect from 1792 to 1834 of scarcity in our supply of specie. There was but one mint in the United States, and that at Philadelphia, until 1835, when a bill was introduced to establish three branch mints, one at New Orleans, another in North Carolina, and another in Georgia, for the convenience of the miners of gold in North and South Carolina, and Georgia, which was vigorously opposed by Mr. Clay and the friends of the United States Bank.

As late as 1834, the amount of gold mined in the United States did not exceed one million and a half per annum; and at that time three-fourths of the gold and silver furnished to the entire world came from South America. On account of the scarcity of coin money in the United States, Congress resorted to the enactment of laws to invite foreign coin into our country by making it legal tender, and these laws continued in operation until 1857, when they were repealed. Under our laws legalizing foreign coin at least $110,000,000 of foreign silver came into circulation in the United States, and with our subsidiary coins of half and quarter dollars and dimes we had more silver money in circulation in the absence of the coinage of our standard silver dollars, caused by the undervaluation of silver bullion, in 1834 than we now have in the United States, according to population. Suppose the coinage law of 1792 had fixed the ratio at 15½ to 1, like it was in France and like the average ratio was in Europe, who can discover any reason why the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver would not have continued to this day without any substantial variation in the value of the bullion of the two metals in the markets of the world?

The effect of the ratio of 15 to 1 in the law of 1792 and the effect of the change of the ratio to 16 to 1 in the law of 1834 was perfectly natural and legitimate on the plainest principles of finance. No bullion owner would carry his gold or his silver to the mint to be coined into money when his bullion was worth more uncoined than it would be when coined. To induce the owners of gold and silver bullion to take it to the mint to be coined into money, the ratio must be so fixed by law as to approximate substantially the bullion value of each metal when established on the unrestricted right of each metal to go into the mints to be coined into money. The ratio can not be fairly established when one metal has the unrestricted right of coinage into money and the other is mere merchandise, with no right of coinage into money.

The whole theory of bimetallism is founded absolutely on the unrestricted right of free and unlimited coinage and indiscriminate use of both metals. Free and unlimited coinage into money of both metals is an unalterable law of bimetallism. What is the unquestioned cause of the wide difference in the bullion value of gold and silver? It is that gold bullion can be now taken to the mints of the United States by its owners and coined into money. If any person owns 22.33 grains of pure gold he can take it to any mint and have it coined into a standard dollar with one-tenth alloy, making 25.8 grains of standard gold worth 100 cents. This right that the owners of gold bullion have to take it to the mints and have it coined into money free of expense makes the gold bullion as valuable to its owners as it is when coined into money. Stop the coinage of gold and take away the right of its owners to have it coined into money free of charge, and how much would gold bullion be worth as mere merchandise with all the demand for it as money taken away by law? Without the right to be coined into money there would be no demand for it except by jewelers and manufacturers for use in the arts, but when gold bullion can be coined into money, as soon as it is turned out of the mint the whole world joins in the scramble to get it.

Look at the spectacle presented in this country and Europe of the ferocious passion for gold. No such powerful combinations and instrumentalities were ever before employed in the world's history as are now at work to get possession of gold. How are we to account for this wild hunt for gold? It is certainly on account of its greatly increased value. It is because it is the only metal that can be coined into money, that is the only standard of all values of all things, and is the only money that has the right of being the redemption basis of all the currency that can be furnished to the people in their trade and commerce. With the quantity of gold limited by nature, and this one metal being the only standard of all values of all things, and the only money in which all currency that goes into circulation must be redeemable, who can tell how high this single standard of all values is to be raised? Who can estimate the purchasing power of gold when the demand for it and the scramble to get it absorbs the highest capacity, all the energies and activities of the world?

Will any honest man, with ordinary capacity and intelligence, deny that this extraordinary value and power have been imparted to gold by giving it the sole right of coinage into money, and, as money, making it the only standard of all values and the only redemption basis of all the currency permitted to circulate among the people, while at the same time excluding and denying to silver the right of any coinage, and placing it in the position of mere merchandise and degrading the silver money allowed to remain in existence and circulation as legal tender subsidiary money—that is, money under gold and dependent on gold for its soundness, and without being saved by this dependent relation to gold from the humiliation of being classed as "fifty-cent dollars."

When at any time in the history of any country in the world, where gold and silver had the same equal right of free and unlimited coinage at a fixed ratio, has silver bullion or silver money been worth less than gold, or had less purchasing power than gold in the markets of the world. And to-day in gold-using countries where silver is excluded from coinage over two billions of legal-tender silver coins are in circulation side by side with gold, and having less silver in the coins than in the silver dollars of the the United States; and, also, in the face of the undeniable fact that silver was never dropped out of the coinage laws of any country in the world because silver bullion or silver money was worth less than gold as bullion or money. Silver has never failed on any theater to maintain its parity with gold when both metals had the same right of coinage.

When I hear an advocate of the gold system of finance make the assertion that a restoration of silver to the same right of coinage now enjoyed by gold would give the people a debased currency, worth no more as money than silver is now worth as bullion without any right of coinage, I feel bound to discredit his sincerity or his ability to present and discuss the question understandingly. It is a self-evident proposition, founded on undeniable history, experience, and common sense, that silver bullion is worth only 50 cents in the dollar, for the plain reason that it is mere merchandise and has no right to be coined into money. If the deprivation of the right of coinage into money put the price of silver bullion down to 50 cents in the dollar, how can it be questioned that the restoration of the right of coinage will produce the same effect it has always produced in every country in the world?

When the owner of silver bullion is given the same right the owner of gold bullion now has to take his bullion to the mint and have it coined into standard legal-tender money, it is as certain as any human event can be that the parity between the two metals will be as completely restored as it has ever heretofore existed on terms of equality in coinage. But to assert that when both metals enjoy the same right of coinage into money that one of the metals will be worth no more as money than it is now selling for as bullion, when both are legal-tender 100-cent dollars, possessing the same purchasing power, is trifling with the common sense and common honesty of the people.

But the complaint is made that you are making by law 50 cents' worth of silver belonging to a miner worth a dollar to be put in circulation by the miner as a hundred-cent dollar free of charge for coining.

This is precisely what is now done by law for the miner of gold, and nothing more is asked to be done for the miner of silver. If you deprive the gold miner of the right of coinage, you strike down the price of his bullion below 50 cents on the dollar, as gold is not used as much in the arts as silver. It is the money function that creates universal demand for both metals and makes both equally valuable. But why not change the ratio from 16 to 1, so as to put a dollar's worth of silver bullion at present prices in a standard silver dollar?

Let us see how such a demand can be granted. What must be done and how must such a change operate? In the first place, any change in the ratio will require the recoinage of every silver coin in the United States, aggregating over $600,000,000. Secretary Carlisle states that it would take ten years to recoin our present supply of silver, and during the ten years not a dollar of our present stock of silver could be used in circulation. Then, again, if you make the ratio 32 to 1, just double what it is now, you strike down $300,000,000 worth of our present stock of silver, now legal-tender money, with the same purchasing power as gold. You make a debt payable in silver at 16 to 1 by contract payable in silver at 32 to 1, thereby doubling the amount of silver demanded by the contract when the debt was created. Then, again, how is the one-tenth alloy in our silver coins to be eliminated? It is utterly impracticable to change the ratio. If silver is ever restored to coinage, it will be at the ratio of 16 to 1, and the enemies of free silver coinage know it.

When you hear any man advocating the free coinage of silver on a change of ratio, put him down for the gold standard. If you are opposed to free coinage at 16 to 1, you will certainly act with the gold party, if you act at all. Then, again, how about an international agreement? The gold-standard nations of Europe are circulating as legal-tender silver over two billions of silver coins side by side with gold. If these nations were required to change their ratio and put as much silver in their coins as now amounts to a dollar's worth in gold, there would be a loss on the present value of their silver coins of one billion of money now equal to gold in debt-paying and purchasing power. So, away with all this nonsense about 50-cent dollars and a change of ratio.

But the Democrats who have been converted to the gold cure in the Cleveland infirmary have lately discovered that Andrew Jackson was an enemy of silver coinage and put this country on the gold basis by the act he approved in 1834 raising the ratio between gold and silver from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1, intending thereby to stop the coinage of silver dollars and have no bullion carried to the mints to be coined into dollars but gold. On this supposition Jackson was the most extreme contractionist who ever lived. He struck down the Bank of the United States and retired all its circulation, and he knew that we had but one mint at Philadelphia to coin gold and $1,500,000 was all the gold then annually mined in the United States, and that all the world was dependent on South America for gold. And how is it explained, on the supposition that Jackson favored the gold standard and opposed the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1, that among the last acts of his last Administration he approved the coinage law of 1837 which every friend of silver coinage in the United States is now struggling to have reenacted? I challenge the production of a single sentence ever uttered by Jackson or a single act of his on the currency question that Mr. Cleveland would approve. No two Presidents were wider apart on the question of finance than Andrew Jackson and Grover Cleveland.

Remember that the contention is that the establishment of the gold basis was the intentional and desirable effect of the coinage acts of 1834 and 1837, which were allowed to remain in operation with the effect intended, and that for the purpose of stopping the coinage of silver dollars and putting the country on the gold basis the act of 1873 was wholly unnecessary and harmless. I can name Democratic Representatives in the House and Democratic members of Mr. Cleveland's Cabinet, who, until 1893, were clamorous advocates of the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 and are now parading and perverting history since 1834, all the time in full view, to justify their sudden conversion to the English system of finance.

If it be true that the country was on the gold basis with the English system of finance for forty years prior to 1873, why is it that all knowledge of such a financial condition entirely escaped Senator R. M. T. Hunter, who during most of this time represented the great State of Virginia as Democratic chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate.

The following is his report to the Senate in 1853, the very time the financial system was in full operation with the approval of Jackson and the Democratic party:

But the mischief would be great indeed if all the world were to adopt but one of the precious metals as the standard of value. To adopt gold alone would diminish the specie currency more than one-half; and the reduction the other way, should silver be taken as the only standard, would be large enough to prove highly disastrous to the human race. Indeed, a reference to the history of the precious metals and the general course of human production can scarcely fail to convince us that there has been a constant tendency to appreciate their value as compared with the residue of the property of the world, and that every extraordinary increase of the supply of the precious metals of which we have any account has exercised a highly beneficial effect upon human affairs.

When contracts are made by a standard which is gradually contracting, the advantages are on the side of capital as against labor, and productive energy is cramped by receiving less than a fair share of the profits of its enterprise. Before the inventions of substitutes for payments in coin, and before the increased supply of specie from the discovery of America, human history is full of the strifes between debtor and creditor, and human legislation is rife with experiments to limit the encroachment and engrossing power of capital. So much is the value of currency affected by the facility with which it may be counted and its convenience of transportation, that there will always be difficulty in supplying the place of small notes with anything but silver or that of large notes with anything but gold. We require, then, for this reason, the double standard of gold and silver; but above all do we require both to counteract the tendency of the specie standard to contract under the vast increase of the value of the property of the world. And what harm can arise from any probable increase of the precious metals, if both are allowed to swell the volume of currency? On the contrary, a more beneficial event for the trade, the industry, the moral and political condition of the world could scarcely be imagined.

Of all the great effects produced upon human society by the discovery of America, there were probably none so marked as those brought about by the great influx of the precious metals from the New World to the Old. European industry had been declining under a decreasing stock of the precious metals and an appreciating standard of value; human ingenuity grew dull under the paralyzing influences of declining profits, and capital absorbed nearly all that should have been divided between it and labor. But an increase of the precious metals in such quantities as to check this tendency operated as a new power to the machinery of commerce.

I shall have to ask the indulgence of the Senate to allow me to conclude my remarks to-morrow.

ADJUSTMENT OF CLAIMS WITH ARKANSAS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Cuban resolutions. It is not necessary to make a motion. I call up the report.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to state to the Senator from Ohio that I think two weeks ago to-day I secured the floor for the purpose of having considered the bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas, which I had been trying to get considered for a long while. At the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], I agreed to let the bill go over until the 16th of the month, at 2 o'clock, to-day, and by unanimous consent it was made the unfinished business for that hour, as the RECORD shows. I hope the Senator from Ohio will give me an opportunity to have the bill considered. I have been waiting and waiting, and I am very anxious to have it disposed of in some way or other, either passed or defeated.

Mr. SHERMAN. How long a time will it probably take to act upon the bill?

Mr. BERRY. I think we can get through with it in one day perhaps.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that his bill is the unfinished business, and it ought to remain such.

Mr. BERRY. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. But perhaps he will not think it advisable to go on with it until the Cuban question is disposed of.

Mr. BERRY. If I could have assurance that the Cuban question would end in any reasonable time. As a matter of course I do not wish to antagonize the conference report. I do not wish to put myself in that position at all, but I simply wish to have an understanding as to some time when the bill shall be considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to agree to the Senator's bill retaining its place as the unfinished business; but as the conference report is a privileged question, and such reports usually occupy but little time, I must insist now that it shall be taken up. However, so far as I am concerned, I will do all I can to secure a hearing for the bill the Senator from Arkansas has in charge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Ohio asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. CHANDLER. Retaining its position.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; retaining its place.

Mr. BERRY. Very well; I can not object to that, but I do hope Senate bill 502 will be acted upon when the Cuban matter is disposed of, or if the debate on the Cuban question is prolonged, that it can be laid aside, so that I may have one day for the consideration of this bill. We can dispose of the bill in one day, between 2 o'clock and the usual hour of adjournment, I think; but of course I do not wish to antagonize the conference report.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Chilton,	Hill,	Roach,
Allison,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Sherman,
Bacon,	Cullom,	McMillan,	Smith,
Baker,	Daniel,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Teller,
Bate,	Dubois,	Morrill,	Tillman,
Berry,	Elkins,	Nelson,	Turpie,
Brice,	Frye,	Pasco,	Vest,
Burrows,	Gear,	Peffer,	Vilas,
Call,	Gordon,	Perkins,	Walthall,
Cannon,	Gorman,	Platt,	White.
Carter,	Harris,	Proctor,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Pugh,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Ohio asks that the unfinished business, Senate bill 502, be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the report of the committee of conference with reference to the resolutions regarding Cuba. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1230) to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans;

A bill (S. 1716) for the relief of W. H. Ferguson, administrator of the estate of Thomas H. Millsaps; and

A bill (S. 1804) to authorize the First National Bank of Sprague, Wash., to change its location and name.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5382) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis Railroad Company to extend its line of railroad into the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

WAR IN CUBA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the resolutions relative to the war in Cuba.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized as being entitled to the floor upon the pending question, which is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I had supposed that my colleague [Mr. PUGH] would proceed with his argument until it was closed, but it appears that he is not physically able to go further with it to-day; and as is customary with myself I will come in now for the purpose of filling up the time until some one who is more interesting is ready to proceed, or some subject that is better entitled to public attention has been called in the Senate.

I supposed when we entered upon the investigation of this matter in regard to Cuba it would be very becoming in us to go slowly and deliberately, but at the same time that when we had set our faces in a certain direction—the direction indicated by the resolutions passed by both Houses—we would persist in our action until we came to some final conclusion, because it is scarcely fair to ourselves, to Cuba, to Spain, or to the people of the United States that we should keep a subject in anxious agitation before the Senate for any considerable length of time, particularly one that attracts such grave attention and is in itself so very important as this subject must be admitted to be.

The resolutions of the Senate and of the House, adopted by an almost unanimous vote, with the exception perhaps of a mere verbal criticism, mean exactly the same thing; and there is, therefore, no substantial ground for any controversy between the two Houses as to the wording of the resolutions that we shall adopt. Personally I am entirely satisfied with either form of expression, believing that there is no substantial difference between the resolutions of the House and the Senate upon this subject.

I am more particularly of that view because neither the House nor the Senate has undertaken to reach any conclusion which in its effect upon the Government of the United States would be in the slightest degree mandatory. We have halted deliberately and purposely and wisely within the domain of opinion, without reaching the domain of mandate or enactment, in this matter. We have thought that it was our right and our duty to respond to the voice of the American people as it has been presented here in various memorials and petitions from State legislatures and from communities and from societies, some of them political, some religious, some commercial, and from the very large number of people of the United States, who, being perfectly aware of the situation of affairs in Cuba—being perhaps as well (or even better) advised on that subject as the Senate and the House—have thought that it was their privilege to present their views to the Congress of the United States in the form of petitions and memorials.

When the people of the United States unite, as has been done here very largely in the presentation of their opinions formulated in memorials and resolutions and petitions, we have the right to believe that they have taken a sincere and a sedate view of the question; that they know what they are talking about; and that the views and wishes they express in regard to Cuban independence and Cuban belligerency and the conduct of the war in Cuba are justified by their own examination into the facts.

Amongst the memorials which have been sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate I find one from the general assembly of the State of New York, which, for the moment, I can not lay my hand upon. I can, however, state the substance of it. It is that the general assembly of the State of New York memorialize Congress that we shall recognize the existence of belligerency in the Island of Cuba. Another memorial I am informed has come from the State of Mississippi. The precise form of it I am not able to recall—I do not think that I have even heard it read. I will ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] if I am mistaken in regard to a memorial having come from the legislature of his State on the subject of Cuba?

Mr. WALTHALL. There was such a memorial presented last Friday.

Mr. MORGAN. Coming from the legislature of Mississippi?

Mr. WALTHALL. From the legislature.

Mr. MORGAN. What was the purport of it, if the Senator will tell me?

Mr. WALTHALL. I can turn to it in a moment. Here it is, in the RECORD of Friday's proceedings.

Mr. MORGAN. It is as follows:

Concurrent resolution. Memoralizing the President and the Congress of the United States to grant belligerent rights to the Cuban Republic, and asking our Representatives and Senators in the Congress to vote for securing the same.

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of Mississippi, That we extend our sympathy to the Cuban people in their struggle for freedom and independence, and we call on the Congress and the President of these United States and request them to grant belligerent rights to the Cuban Republic, and ask our Representatives and Senators in the Congress to vote for securing the same, and that the secretary of state be instructed to transmit a copy of the resolution to the President and Congress.

Passed the house January 29, 1896.

JAMES F. McCOOL,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the senate February 10, 1896.

J. H. JONES,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 24, 1896.

A. J. McLAURIN, Governor.
J. L. POWER, Secretary of State.

There is a memorial coming from an extreme Southern State, a very close neighbor to Cuba. That memorial has been well considered. That is no claptrap. That is no suddenly formed opinion. That is not an opinion which is without foundation in justice and in fact. It comes from a great State that is entirely willing to make its contribution of whatever may be needed for the purpose of sustaining the attitude of the Government of the United States whenever it is taken upon this question. You will observe that in the resolutions of the Senate and of the House and in the report that is now the subject of discussion we have not gone anywhere near the extent that has been gone by the general assembly of Mississippi. Now, here is the memorial of the general assembly of New York:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY,
Albany, January 13, 1896.

On motion of Mr. Warner:

Whereas a condition of civil war exists between the Government of Spain and the Government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and

Whereas the struggle for independence and for republican institutions by the Cubans has awakened in the people of the United States a deep sympathy for their cause and a hope that they may succeed in their momentous contest:

Resolved (if the senate concur), That we participate in the deep interest which is felt for the success of the people of Cuba in their struggle to establish their liberty and independence.

Resolved, That the President and Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, petitioned to extend to the insurgents of Cuba a formal recognition of their rights as belligerents.

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be duly certified by the clerk and forwarded to the President and presiding officer of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

By order of the assembly.

A. E. BAXTER, Clerk.

Mr. HILL. Did the senate concur?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know.

Mr. HILL. It does not seem to have done so.

Mr. MORGAN. It reads "by order of the assembly."

Mr. HILL. I will state that the legislature is composed of the assembly and the senate. The senate does not seem to have concurred.

Mr. MORGAN. This is a memorial of the house of representatives.

Mr. HILL. Of the assembly.

Mr. MORGAN. That means the house of representatives.

Mr. HILL. It would be analogous to the house of representatives; but there is a senate and an assembly.

Mr. MORGAN. They are the direct representatives of the people.

Mr. HILL. Both are elected at the same time.

Mr. MORGAN. Both are elected at the same time and comprise one general body of legislative authority. The people, therefore, of the great State of New York, which has the control—I might say the domination—of the commercial and financial power of the whole United States, in a certain sense, and perhaps of the whole Western Hemisphere, in a pretty large sense, have disrobed themselves of their fears and apprehensions. They have stepped forward in answer to this plea of the people of Cuba for independence and for recognition, and for justice, and have expressed themselves in that State through at least one of the houses—through the popular house—in favor of the attitude that a great many gentlemen in the House and the Senate of the Congress of the United States think ought to be taken—that is to say, direct, immediate recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Following that come some memorials from a mass meeting of citizens of Pawtucket, R. I., favoring the recognition of the belligerency of Cuba; a memorial from a public meeting held in Delaware, without any indication of the number of persons who were assembled, to the same effect; a letter from the secretary of the St. Louis Merchants' Exchange, favoring Cuba's belligerency; a memorial from the American Protective Association, favoring the acknowledgment of the independence of Cuba; a memorial from Joe Hooker Post, No. 21, Grand Army of the Republic, Mount Vernon, Ohio, in favor of granting belligerent rights to Cuba; resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., asking Congress to grant belligerent rights to the people of Cuba, now struggling for their freedom; a petition of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Colorado in favor of the Cuban insurgents; a resolution of the Board of Trade of La Crosse, Wis., urging the recognition of Cuban belligerency; a resolution of the Rutland Board of Trade, of Vermont, urging Congress to recognize the belligerency of Cuba; a resolution of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., favoring the recognition by Congress of Cuba; a resolution from the Board of Trade of Kansas City, favoring the granting of belligerent rights to the people of Cuba; another resolution from the Board of Trade of Kansas City, requesting Congress to grant belligerent rights to the people of Cuba, largely signed; a resolution of the Board of Trade of Indianapolis, in favor of Cuban independence; a resolution favoring the recognition of Cuban insurgents, which was offered in the Senate by the Senator from Nebraska; a memorial from the A. P. A. of Nebraska, favoring the granting of belligerent rights to the Cuban patriots; resolutions indorsing the cause of Cuba passed by the Ministerial Association of Harrisburg, Pa. I shall read that for the purpose of getting before the Senate some idea of the sentiment of the religionists of this country on this subject. It is as follows:

Resolutions indorsing the Cuban cause, passed by the Ministerial Association of Harrisburg, Pa., Monday, October 28, 1895.

Whereas life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are the essentials for the maintenance of all that appertains to man; and

Whereas the monarchical tendencies of European powers have always tended to persecute and enslave America and Americans; and

Whereas, for the complete emancipation of American institutions guaranteeing the freedom and permanent establishment of a government "for the people, of the people, and by the people," our fathers were forced to have recourse to arms to break the yoke of British tyranny; and

Whereas the Monroe doctrine proclaims an edict dear to every American heart, "America for Americans"; and

Whereas the patriotic sons of Cuba find themselves to-day in the identical position which actuated our forefathers to strike for liberty; and

Whereas the despotism, the oppression, and the excessive burdens forced upon Cuba by Spain to maintain an oligarchy in Europe and an extravagant, expensive, and unnecessary retinue in Cuba, to the detriment and political enslavement of a liberty-loving people, we find the stroke for liberty by the Cuban people to be patriotic and praiseworthy in every way; and

Whereas the Spanish authorities have not been able to crush out what was called a band of robbers, but have been taxed to their utmost ability by placing thousands of troops in the field and marshaling the aid of all other countries to deprive the Cuban patriots of the necessary resources to contend sucessfully with them; and

Whereas in the face of all of these difficulties the patriots have been able to increase their armies, organize and maintain a provisional government, and defeat the enemy upon many battlefields, they are entitled to belligerent rights under the usage and customs of international courtesies: Therefore

Be it resolved, That this ministerial association indorse and extend our sympathies to the Cuban cause, and hereby petition to the President and Congress of the United States to grant to Cuba belligerent rights and the recognition of her provisional government, thereby emphasizing the spirit and the letter of the Monroe doctrine, and that every American be allowed, without let or hindrance, to have commercial intercourse with the Cuban patriots, furnishing commodities or munitions of war without being subjected to the espionage and arrest by our officials or the military or naval despotism on the part of Spain.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives as our prayer in behalf of the independence of Cuba: Further be it

Resolved, That a copy be sent to the Cuban junta at New York, to be forwarded to the President of the Provisional Government, showing our appreciation and support in behalf of their noble cause.

H. C. C. ASTWOOD, Chairman.
W. H. MARSHALL.
WM. P. LAWRENCE.

In that memorial which comes from that body of ministers of the Christian gospel, there is presented in a condensed form nearly all that can be said on this subject so far as our rights, duties, and sympathies coincide in moving us to action. It contains also a statement in concise form of those facts which are undeniable to the whole American intelligence, a denial of which would shame any man who seeks to make it.

Resolutions were presented also from the city council of St. Augustine, Fla., favoring a recognition of Cuba; resolutions in the nature of a memorial of the city council of West Tampa, Fla., favoring recognition of the independence of Cuba; resolutions of sympathy with Cuba adopted by citizens of Quincy, Ill.; memorial from the city council of Tampa, Fla., favoring the recognition of Cuba; resolutions of a mass meeting of citizens of the city of Des Moines, Iowa, praying Congress to recognize the freedom of the people of Cuba; resolutions of George A. McCall Post, No. 31, Grand Army of the Republic, of West Chester, Pa., favoring the recognition by this country of belligerent rights to Cuba; resolutions adopted by the city council of Jacksonville, Fla., in favor of the recognition of the Cuban revolutionists as belligerents; resolutions of Nassau Camp, No. 104, United Confederate Veterans, of Fernandina, Fla., favoring the recognition by the United States of the Cuban revolutionists as belligerents; resolutions of the Ohio Normal University, expressing sympathy for the Cuban insurgents; resolutions of the students and teachers of the Normal University of Ada, Ohio—the same place, I suppose—in favor of Cuba, and signed by other persons; resolutions of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., requesting Congress to recognize the belligerent rights of Cuba; resolutions of 149 citizens of Fairfield, Iowa, praying for the recognition of the Cuban revolutionists; resolutions of citizens of Newark, N. J., expressing for Cubans who are struggling for independence their sympathy. These resolutions were passed by a mass meeting assembled in Newark on the 13th of December, 1895.

Then follows a memorial of citizens of Pueblo, Colo., expressing sympathy for the Cuban insurgents. A large mass meeting seems to have been held for the purpose of getting up that expression. Then follow a petition of citizens of Fremont, Nebr., asking recognition of Cuban belligerents; resolutions adopted at Providence, R. I., December 20, 1895, asking Congress to recognize now the belligerent rights of the Cuban revolutionists; resolutions of citizens of Akron, Ohio, in favor of the recognition of Cuban belligerents; resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held at Kansas City November 20, 1895, favoring recognition of Cuban belligerents; petition of the Houston Typographical Union, No. 87, favoring recognition of Cuban insurgents; memorial of the students and teachers of the Ohio Normal University, at Ada, Ohio—an additional one; resolutions of the National Grange of Patrons of Husbandry, favoring the acknowledgment of Cuban belligerency and extending sympathy to the Cuban cause; petitions of citizens of Madison, S. Dak., praying the Congress of the United States to grant to the Cubans belligerent rights; resolutions of a mass meeting of the people of Newark, N. J., recommending that belligerent rights be accorded to Cuba; petition from the Twenty-eighth Ward of the city of Philadelphia, praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; resolutions of sympathy with Cuban insurgents from the Federation of Labor.

Here are petitions from the people of Florida demanding belligerent rights to Cuba, largely signed; here is a petition from citizens of Minerva, Ohio, to the same effect, largely signed, headed by the question, "Shall Cuba be free?"; here are memorials from citizens of Florida, urging the Government of the United States to grant the Cuban combatants the rights of belligerents; a petition of citizens of Ashland County, Ohio, in favor of the recognition of Cuban independence; a petition praying for a speedy recognition of belligerency in favor of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom by the citizens of Hobart, N. Y.; a petition of the citizens of Oregon, favoring the recognition of the independence of Cuba, extensively signed; a petition of citizens of Chicago, Ill., praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for liberty, largely signed; a petition of sundry citizens of Akron, Ohio, in addition to those heretofore submitted; the petition of Amethyst Council, No 40, of Amethyst, Colo., A. P. A., for the recognition of the Cubans as belligerents.

Mr. President, I also hold here a mass of petitions signed by 1,688 individual citizens from all over the United States. It would seem that almost every county in the United States is represented in this wide reach and range of petitions.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I am authorized to say that in the House of Representatives petitions and memorials from various parts of the United States to the same effect were presented, sufficient to fill a large box. There had been presented there many times the number that have been presented in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. We are all of us familiar with the methods by which a great many of these petitions come to us and are gotten up in all parts of the country. I do not know whether it is so in this case, but I presume it will be found by anybody who looks at these petitions that they are all upon printed headings sent out from a single source and signed and returned. The spontaneity of petitions of this kind comes not from the country at large, but from New York or Washington.

I do not suppose that the Senator from Ohio had strictly the right to refer to anything that occurred in the House of Representatives, but I have no doubt that what he states is true; that this deliberate plan, this whole proceeding prepense, has gone on and that petitions have gone to the other House just as they have come here.

Mr. MORGAN. In reply to what the Senator from Maine assumes or presumes in regard to these petitions, I will hand him this package of petitions, memorials, and resolutions and let him see how many of them are written in that way.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will send them to my desk I shall be very glad to look at them.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can investigate to see whether or not anybody has been putting up a fraud on the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in this matter.

Mr. FRYE. It is just exactly as easy to get remonstrances signed as it is to get petitions signed, and they are ordinarily obtained in the same way. I should like to inquire of my colleague if he has ever heard of a remonstrance being presented to Congress against the recognition of Cuban belligerent rights?

Mr. HALE. Yes. I will tell my colleague that I have had hundreds of letters from business men all over the country——

Mr. FRYE. I am not talking about letters.

Mr. HALE. They are to me of much more force and effect than these cut and dried petitions. I have had—and I am glad my colleague has brought me out on that point—hundreds of letters from business men all over the country, which I did not think it worth while to put before the Senate, protesting against this whole crusade.

Mr. FRYE. But there never has been presented a remonstrance on the subject to either House of Congress by anybody.

Mr. HALE. Letters are the best form of remonstrances that can be brought before Congress—earnest expressions of opinion of business and conservative men all over the country.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it has got to be the habit, and I think it is a very evil one, too, of men who are called business men—men who own estates and property—setting themselves against Congress and against the public sentiment of the people of the United States, widely, universally, and sincerely expressed, in private communications to Congress for the purpose of keeping down any legislation that might cost them a little money or a little disturbance of their peace or their business relations. I know we are in the presence of such difficulties as that; but men who thus seek privately to influence Senatorial action and are not willing to come out with their public protests and memorials and avow what they propose to have us do and to act upon are not much in the way of an enemy, when the American people happen to have one.

What chance, Mr. President, have the few representatives of these Cuban insurgents, who are denounced as robbers, as pirates, as mulattoes, as negroes, as Spaniards and dagos, and as a contemptible, low crowd by the high authorities, the ministerial authorities of Spain present in this Government, to manufacture sentiment to influence the people of the United States or the Senate or the House of Representatives? None whatever. They have neither the money nor the means with which to do it. There is no indication in that mass of petitions of any false presentation of sentiment. I doubt not that every man who signed those petitions—and they are signed with pen and with pencil, and some of them signed with a cross mark—honestly expressed to the people of the United States what his convictions were. The Senator from Maine probably does not think that the legislature of New York or the legislature of Mississippi have gotten up any bogus representations here to us or have been operated upon by some spasm of indignation or patriotism to cause them to lay before us an earnest admonition and request to grant belligerent rights and also independence to the Island of Cuba.

The Committee on Foreign Relations had not supposed until this very moment that they were being dealt with improperly in the presentation of this great mass of petitions, and in all sincerity they have acted upon them as if they came voluntarily from the American people and expressed their honest views.

I brought these forward merely to show the amount of pressure that had been brought upon the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate, and in connection with that, to show how conservative and careful had been the action of that committee. Notwithstanding this very great pressure, and notwithstanding the gratification we could have given to hundreds and thousands, if not millions, of the people of the United States by being prompt and urgent in our response to their demands, we have gone as slowly and as patiently as it was possible for us, with a decent respect for the opinions of mankind, to the step in this direction which we have taken at last.

Not only that, but we were told in the debate the other day that the Spanish minister here had sent a paper or a memorandum of some kind before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate which had not appeared anywhere in the papers in this case. There was such a paper sent to us, and it has not appeared. It was a memorandum sent by the Spanish minister through our Secretary of State, for the purpose of advising us of the situation of affairs in Cuba, with a view to get us to delay our action upon assurances from that minister that the steps which had already been taken in Cuba for the suppression of the rebellion were about to become successful. Any Senator who desires to do so is entirely at liberty to read it. So it is a matter of no consequence at all, except that, notwithstanding this great pressure of petitions and memorials to which I have just referred, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations hesitated, stopped in their movements for a month or more, to see whether or not the Spanish minister was correct in his view of the progress of the efforts in Cuba to suppress this insurrection and rebellion. Therefore we have not come before the Senate of the United States or before the country without opinions deliberately formed, and without a careful investigation of every fact within our reach connected with this very delicate and very important subject. We have neither been asleep, nor have we been too hasty.

We have tried to control our action by a profound regard for the rights of Spain and the rights of the Government and the people of the United States, and a profound respect for the Senate of the United States. So that when we should come in here with our final action we should be able to present some scheme or project of action upon which both Houses could unite and which would present the views of the American people at this moment of time upon this great question, saying nothing about what progress we might make in our views upon further developments in either direction—either in favor of the revolutionists there or in favor of the Government of Spain—but confining ourselves, as we thought it our duty to do, to the situation as it appeared to be presented in the facts at the moment of our report.

Now, I trust that after this, Mr. President, there will not be anything more said or even thought in respect of the action of the committee to the effect that it has either been inconsiderate, or that it has been hasty, or that it has been too slow. I believe we have acted as dutifully as it was possible for a committee to do.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. HALE. I have not been present during the entire time of the Senator's remarks, and I do not know whether or not he has referred to the statement of the Spanish minister, which, to the surprise of some of the Senate, was brought before the body on Friday. If he has not, before he closes I hope he will explain to us what in some respects was a mystery.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, on Thursday referred to the Spanish case, which nobody outside of the committee before that had heard of, and stated that the committee did not have it before them; that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had communicated with the State Department and had learned the Spanish case from some statement of the Spanish minister, and had told the committee what it was. On the next morning the junior Senator from Massachusetts corrected the Senator from Ohio, and stated that he had had no personal communication with the Department, but that the case as made out for the Spanish Government by the Spanish minister had been presented to the committee, and had been read to them by my colleague [Mr. FRYE], upon which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], the third member of the committee, who appeared upon the scene, rose in his place and stated that the resolutions which had been reported from the conference committee had never been before the Committee on Foreign Relations and had never been approved by them.

Now, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the fourth member of the committee, has arisen to more explanations. Before he sits down I hope he will state to the Senate whether the Committee on Foreign Relations, which the Senate trusts as a conservative committee to present this whole case to this body, did have the statement of the Spanish minister, because members of the committee complained bitterly that the Spanish minister had appeared and appealed to the country through the newspapers, but had not approached the committee through the proper channels. I hope the Senator will not leave the floor before stating, if the Spanish minister did through the State Department send a statement to the committee, why it was that in some way or other the committee did not report that fact to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the notes of the Reporter will show that it has not been ten minutes since I stated that whole thing to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I have just stated to the Senator that I was not present here all the time, and did not hear all he had said.

Mr. MORGAN. I can not keep the Senator from Maine in his seat, of course, but I suppose I must go back and repeat what I have said for his satisfaction.

Mr. HALE. Then I will ask the Senator to explain—for I do not think he has done that to the satisfaction of the Senate, although I was not here—why it was, if the committee had that document, had that statement, and had that case, it did not at some time, before it was unwarily disclosed to us by the Senator from Ohio, report it to the Senate, and give us the benefit of it?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine is a lawyer, and he knows it is very seldom that an affidavit or a statement made on a motion for a continuance is offered in evidence on a final trial.

Mr. HALE. But this is not the case of a new trial. The Senate has never decided this case, and Congress has never decided it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wish to say that what the Senator from Maine has said is not a correct statement of what I either said or did.

Mr. HALE. Did not the Senator say——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not engage in any wrangle about it. I will refer to the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. Certainly we understood the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to state that the Spanish case had been brought out by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who had been in communication with the State Department, and who had told the committee what it was. The next day the Senator from Massachusetts himself rose in his place and corrected the Senator from Ohio and stated that the case of the Spanish minister was brought to the entire committee. I listened in vain, Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. If I can get the floor long enough to make an answer to a question that is a good deal longer than my speech, I will try to do it, and try to satisfy the Senator from Maine about this business before I get through.

Spain was anxious to delay action in the Senate of the United States. Spain was afraid, I suppose, that this grave body would get into a tantrum, and finding an opportunity, would launch forth some very belligerent declarations in regard to Cuba. And so the minister from Spain sent a memorandum to the Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, setting forth, according to what he thought, a proper view of the situation in Cuba as well as in Spain. Mr. Olney, so far as I know (I know nothing about it; the chairman of the committee can correct me if I am mistaken about it), concluded that it was his duty to send that paper to the Senate committee. I do not know whether it was called for or not. But at all events the paper came to the Senate committee. It was not sent in in any official form. The original paper which was submitted by the Spanish minister to the Secretary of State was sent to the committee. I was not there when the paper arrived, nor was I there when it was being read, being detained from the committee by some fortuitous matter. I came in just about the time of the close of the session, and the chairman called my attention to the fact that a paper from the Spanish minister had been read, and it being in the hands of the clerk of the committee, I asked leave to glance over it, as it was going right back to the State Department; and I looked it over. The only impression it made upon me at the time was that it was a plea for continuance, for postponement, on the part of Spain.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. MORGAN. I have it here.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to ask the Senator about the text of the memorandum; but was any indication ever given to the Senate by the Committee on Foreign Relations that that committee had had any such paper——

Mr. MORGAN. There was no occasion for it.

Mr. HALE. Or that there was any case on the other side until it was unwarily brought out by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MORGAN. Ah, there is no use for the Senator from Maine to attempt to cast suspicion upon the integrity of the Committee on Foreign Relations in a matter of this kind.

Mr. HALE. I do not attempt to cast suspicion upon the integrity of the committee, but I do say that there is a general feeling that the committee itself has not communicated to the Senate any information whatever upon which it has based its action, and it never was more illustrated than it was on Friday, when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], in his seat, said that the resolutions reported by the committee of conference had never been approved by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN. I have the floor on this question, and I am going to keep it until I get through with it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can prevent me from asking a question——

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine is endeavoring to raise a case of surmise and suspicion against the Committee on Foreign Relations, that they have concealed from this body some fact that bears upon the condition of the case as stated by Spain. I will read the paper and comment on it as I go along, for the purpose of showing that nothing has been withheld here that Spain contended for at all. Nothing has been attributed to Spain that she does not admit, except perhaps in some casual remark by a Senator. But nothing in the way of facts has been presented on this floor in behalf of the committee that Spain does not admit.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad at this late day to have the Senator bring in the paper he has.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a late day. The paper was sent back to the State Department because the Secretary of State required it to be done. He did not communicate to us a copy of it, as I think he should have done. He should have left it with the committee instead of keeping it as a state paper which he would not communicate. So on last Saturday I wrote to the Secretary of State and asked him for a copy of the paper. His reply to me was that he would consult the Spanish minister and, if he consented to it, I might have a copy.

Mr. HALE. Did he consent?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. Mr. Olney says:

MY DEAR SIR: The Spanish minister says he has no objection to your reading the inclosed as part of your speech to the Senate on the Cuban resolutions. I accordingly send it to you.

There Spain, through her minister, seems to have some closer relation to the Secretary of State than has the Committee on Foreign Relations. He can send a paper up through the Secretary of State to be read in our committee room and withdrawn and carried back to the files of the State Department and kept there, not communicated; and when I asked that the paper might be sent here the Secretary says, "I will confer with the Spanish minister, and if he consents to it I will let you have a copy."

The committee did not keep a copy of the paper, as perhaps they might have done and as perhaps they ought to have done, because they regarded it precisely in the light in which it was intended to be considered, as a petition on the part of Spain for further time, that we would delay action until Spain got ready to have some very favorable report made by the Senate of the United States in her behalf. There is added to this a paper dated the 11th of January, 1896, marked "Confidential." I do not believe that paper was before the committee, but I am not certain of it:

SIR: In reply to a telegram addressed to the governor-general of Cuba, in which I asked Gen. Martinez Campos some questions whose answers I have not been able to inclose in my memorandum of yesterday for the short time I had at my command, I have received the following answer:

"The so-called insurgent government has no fixed residence. They came to the Villas and have returned to Camaguey. One hardly knows where they wander about as soon as a column of the army goes in their persecution. They do not live nor reside in any inhabited place, and do not exercise any act of civil government."

That is all true, no doubt—all true. How many places of habitation did the government of the confederacy have during the Revolutionary war in the United States? Nine different places to which they resorted, escaping from the British in one quarter to find protection in another.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Continental Congress moved back and forth from place to place.

Mr. MORGAN. Not merely the executive government, but the whole Congress moved backward and forward until they had nine habitations in the United States. The British Government could not chase them down sufficiently to capture them. Where was our Government when this Capitol was set afire and burned to the ground by the British who came across the Atlantic Ocean? A fugitive in Virginia. What was its local habitation then? Does this gentleman expect to make a point upon the people of Cuba because they are compelled in the exigency of their situation to change their government from place to place? Yet the truth is, as is shown by reports made and published in the Evening Star from Captain Mannix, who visited the place on two occasions, that there has been from the outbreak of the revolution a permanent capital in Cuba, at Cubitas, on the top of the mountains at the eastern end of the island. It has never been changed, it has never been attacked, and it has never been approached by the Spaniards. It is the place from which justice is administered and the civil law is executed in its protection of the rights of property, life, and liberty.

So the complaint of Martinez Campos, which is contained in the telegram that he sent to Mr. Dupuy de Lôme, is merely that the insurgent government has no fixed residence. "They came to the villas and have returned to Camaguey." What does he mean by "returned to Camaguey"? He means they came to the villas for the purpose of executing their orders and administering justice, as Mr. Mannix explains, through the prefects and subprefects of the different districts of Cuba. When they had gotten through with the establishment of civil government and their inspection of the offices of civil government there, they returned to Camaguey. Camaguey is the capital province of Cuba, and Cubitas is the town, the village, if you please, in which that government is established, and has been from the beginning. The Spaniards have never dared even to attempt to attack it.

That seems to have been a necessary part of the programme which Mr. Dupuy de Lôme wants to lay before the Government of the United States in order to satisfy us that it would never do for us to recognize the belligerency of a government which is scattered about as that is from place to place.

If the establishment of a government as a civil government depends upon the place where it is obliged to be in order to escape from capture, then, of course, those men can never establish civil government until they have first conquered and driven the Spaniards out.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator read that most interesting account of the peregrination and wanderings of the correspondent of the Evening Star in trying to find this nebulous capital, in which he entirely failed?

Mr. MORGAN. Captain Mannix?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that the name—Captain Mannix?

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator believe that there exists at the place which he has named anything that is in the form of a representative government?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. HALE. Does he believe that at this place, at this small village which the correspondent either did not find or barely found, there exists any such legislative body, any such judicial tribunal, any such head of the army and the navy as existed at Montgomery, and afterwards at Richmond, in the Confederacy, or as existed all through the war of the Revolution, at the time of the rebellion, if you call it so—the war against Great Britain? Does the Senator believe that any such condition exists in Cuba to-day, or has existed for the last year?

Mr. MORGAN. I supposed I had the floor for the purpose of explaining this paper and making some remarks upon it. But I find I am here only for the purpose of answering questions like a school child at a kindergarten.

Mr. HALE. It is not my fault if the Senator appears like a school child who ought to be questioned. It is not my fault——

Mr. MORGAN. No; I will come at the Senator about that and put him on his answer to questions. When he got up here he asked me if I had read an article published in the Evening Star, in which its correspondent had wandered all through Cuba and had failed to find the capital.

Mr. HALE. Or barely found it.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir. In the first question the Senator put to me he said Captain Mannix had failed to find it. Then, when he found that Captain Mannix, whose story he read just as well as I have, did find it, and not only found it, but afterwards returned to it and was treated with great hospitality and kindness while he was there, and had to march for miles on foot, meeting with many guards, in order to get there—when he found that he says perhaps Captain Mannix found it, and if he did it was some miserable little village or place, one, perhaps, that a decent government had not any right to be at.

Mr. HALE. I took the Senator's words about a village. It is a very small place. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a small place.

Mr. HALE. With that interruption, I am not going to worry the Senator any longer.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator does not worry me. He is worrying——

Mr. HALE. I had the honor to address the Senate on the subject a few days ago, and I welcomed interruption. I was interrupted by several Senators.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not care about discussing that matter. If the Senator will just let me have a little breath of time to say a word or two together, it will be all right.

Mr. HALE. I do not think that any Senator can prevent the Senator from Alabama from occupying——

Mr. MORGAN. I will prevent interruption by refusing to let the Senator interrupt me.

Mr. HALE. I will not interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. MORGAN. Do not do it any more. If the Senator does, I will call him to order.

Mr. CHANDLER. While the Senator from Alabama takes a breath, will he allow me to make a statement about Cubitas?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not only is the statement of the Senator from Alabama correct, but it is to be borne in mind that Captain Mannix described fully, when he went to Cubitas, exactly how he went, what train he took; that he went to Matanzas. He describes the whole physical conformation of the country after he reached the interior village, where is the capital. He describes his return from it, and he afterwards described another visit which he literally made there.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, a second visit.

Mr. CHANDLER. And that the Spanish Government, with that information in their hands, have not taken the capital and never have dared to try to take the capital is very good evidence that the insurgents, whether or not they need to have a capital to entitle them to recognition as belligerents, have a capital, and that even all the Spanish troops in Cuba can not reach and capture it.

Mr. MORGAN. Gomez and Maceo have come nearer to capturing Habana than the Spanish Crown has ever come to capturing Cubitas.

Mr. CHANDLER. The insurgents have been within a half dozen miles of Habana, and there is no evidence that the Spanish troops have been within 50 miles of Cubitas.

Mr. SHERMAN. The insurgents have been within 10 miles of Habana within a few days.

Mr. MORGAN. That so great a man and so great a general as Campos, in reply to the telegram of the minister, could state no better reason than that for discarding the existence of a civil government in Cuba is something which to me is very surprising. Why did he not say a Cuban Government does exist; it has its prefects and subprefects, its collectors of taxes, its judicial organization? Why did he not say that it is supreme over the military, and that Gomez and Maceo hold their commissions to-day signed by Cisneros and countersigned by the secretary of war, combining together, the civil and military authority, all of the elements of a republic except a navy? They have not any navy because they have no money to buy ships and no chance to build them. The mere fact that Gen. Martinez Campos should say no more against the Government of Cuba than he has said in this dispatch is enough to convince any sincere man, it seems to me, of the actual existence of that Government in Cuba.

More than that, that government is not a stranger to Cuba. It is the same government, headed by the same men, Cisneros as president, Gomez as commander of the army, which capitulated in 1878, hauled down the flag of the lone star of Cuba upon terms and conditions made with Spain which recognized, expressly recognized, their existence at that time as a republic. When they went out as a republic they yielded up their sovereign authority, as they claimed it, into the hands of the monarchy of Spain. When it is found, as will be demonstrated even more fully than it has been, and beyond the power of all denial, that Spain has broken every covenant in that capitulation, when Cisneros comes back to the head of the civil government and Gomez comes back to the head of the war establishment, and they hold a convention for the purpose of establishing a constitution which is now printed in the records of Congress, sent to us by the Secretary of State—when that has been done, it is too late for General Campos or any person else to say that a government does not exist in the Island of Cuba on the part of the revolutionists which has power over life, liberty, and property; and to-day when any private citizen of the United States, of Spain, of Cuba, or of any other government comes within the purview of its power he is bound to yield his obedience, because it is at least a government de facto.

If an American citizen in the heart of the province of Camaguey should lend or give a thousand dollars to this provisional government, or this government de facto, for the purpose of carrying on the war and the Spanish monarchy after the war was over should arrest him on the island and try him for that as an act of treason or as a breach of their laws against the insurrection the Government of the United States would be bound to thrust its arm in and say, "Stop, you can not try this citizen and condemn him for obedience to a government de facto established in Cuba which you did not have the power at the time to overthrow." That is the situation, stated in a very brief way, but in a concise and perspicuous one, I trust, so that there can be no doubt left about it. That government is powerful enough to protect any man who is within reach of its influence, even though he enters its armies and takes the oath of allegiance to it, because he can not refuse to do it if he is conscripted or if enlistment is demanded of him.

The Spanish minister then goes on to state his reasons why we should not recognize the belligerency of the Cubans. He lays them out in extenso at an early day in the month of January; I do not recall the date. What does he say about it?

Sugar does not pay direct taxes. The especial tax on manufacture was abolished. The only tax now paid by sugar is 75 cents per ton on exports, with the name of "load permit."

If the crop could be entirely lost, and the average exportation of 600,000 tons were absolutely impossible, the loss for the treasury would be $450,000. This is less than 1 per cent of the war expenses.

The insurgents do not occupy any part of the country permanently.

That means the men in arms, of course, the insurgents. They "do not occupy any part of the country permanently." General Washington's army did not occupy any part of this country permanently while the Revolutionary war was going on. His army was operating from Quebec down to Savannah, back and forth, oftener chased than chasing. The people, however, who lived in the country were some of them hostile to the Government of Great Britain and some were friends to it. They were divided up into parties that were called Whig and Tory, in some communities about equally divided, and in some the Tories had the ascendency. They were not called the insurgents. It was the army led by General Washington that was called the army of the rebellion, the insurgent army. They moved about, of course, as military necessity required, from place to place. They had no great forts that they could fortify and remain in, and the Cubans would not take Morro Castle and agree to hold it as against a fleet, because they have not the powder and ammunition to do it with. They could not do it. That is not their style of fighting. Their campaign is not suited to any such exigency. He says:

The insurgents do not occupy any part of the country permanently. If they would occupy a well-known one the army would be there immediately.

That is to say, they will not sit down and let the Spaniards come up and cut their throats, and that is a very bad thing to do.

As they are all mounted and are continually changing horses it is easier for them to outmarch the troops.

We know that is so.

Their tactics has always been not to engage in a fight, and to destroy all the cultures and to attack the small towns garrisoned only by a very small force of militia.

Legitimate warfare, proper, good tactics.

If there are more than 20 soldiers they never approach the blockhouses. Only when their forces greatly outnumber those of the army a part of them stands to fight to better allow the others to follow their usual tactics.

That is from General Campos, an extract from that same dispatch. That is a serious complaint for General Campos to make against the Cubans, but the Cubans were whipping him with those tactics all the time. They drove him off the island, and they sent him 15 miles with his chief of staff at nighttime on foot through the morasses of Cuba, after they had whipped the army and driven it until he could not find it. I do not wonder that he complained at it. But, Mr. President, the complaints have been getting louder and louder from that day to this, and these Cuban tactics, it seems, are too much for the power of the Spanish army. He says:

Please consider this letter as a complement of my memorandum, and accept the assurance of my highest consideration.

E. DUPUY DE LÔME.

Now, here comes the memorandum:

The situation in the Island of Cuba, considered on a military point of view, is unchanged, and probably, taking only in consideration the final result of the war, has been bettered by the raid of the two Cuban leaders, Maximo Gomez and Maceo.

The advance of the command of those two men to the Province of Matanzas and Habana and to the limits of Pinar del Rio has been prepared with the intention of producing a theatrical effect and to impress the public opinion in the United States.

Mr. President, that is tragedy; they have been slain, and it has not been played with puppets either. That theatrical effect about which Mr. Dupuy de Lôme speaks has been a very severe effect upon the military situation of Spain in Cuba. He says:

It is probable also that has been planned—and in this they have utterly failed—with the desire of producing an uprising in some of the larger towns of the most thickly populated part of the island.

A month's time has revealed that they did not fail in that. Maceo went down in Pinar del Rio and came back with an army at present estimated at an increase of 10,000 soldiers, more than half of them following Maceo in the hope of getting guns from the hands of the Spaniards or their dead comrades when they were killed in battle.

The reports of the press and of interested persons have presented the insurgents as a victorious army marching toward the capital of the island, and they have even considered the possibility of the investment of Habana.

They might well have done so. Circumstances have been strongly tending in that direction.

Nothing further from the truth—

Says the minister, and yet we hear by every mail that comes from Habana of the burning of railroad stations, the breaking up of the trains, and the destruction of the railroad lines within 7, 8, 10, and 15 miles all around Habana.

To understand the war in Cuba it is necessary to bear in mind the nature of the soil—the nature of the soil and the kind of warfare that is only possible there. The commander-in-chief of the Spanish forces had to comply with the moral duty of every government to protect as much as possible the private property. The army has been scattered to garrison the sugar estates, and has been successful to a great extent in preventing the burning of the buildings and the destruction of the machinery. The rest of the forces have been in constant persecution of the insurgents, preventing them to remain in a place, obliging them to wander about, and succeeding in having engagements, which have never been decisive, because the policy of the enemy has been to disband at the approach of the forces of the army.

Now, mark this—

The war against the insurgents in Cuba can only be compared with irregular guerrilla wars and Indian wars, in which only by mere chance it is possible to deal a severe and decisive blow.

The same war, with the same guerrilla bands, that drove Napoleon out of Spain; the same tactics—Spanish tactics—applied to the Spanish army by these poor vagrant Cubans of whom he speaks.

The peace can only be attained by the constant persecution of the bands, by preventing them from establishing themselves in a part of the country, by lessening their number, by constant engagements, and by discouraging them, diminishing their resources and proving them that—

"To them" I suppose he meant—that they can not succeed, because the greater and better part of the country not only is not with them, but against them.

That is a dolorous outlook for a man who is going to conquer that country in a few short months. How long are we to wait here until Spanish tactics and Spanish power can provide for Spanish authority in Cuba, against this declaration that "peace can only be attained by the constant persecution of the bands, by preventing them from establishing themselves in a part of the country, by lessening their number, by constant engagements," etc.? If that is the only chance to get peace in Cuba, good-bye to peace in that island; it will never be realized except when the Spanish power has consented to the independence of the people.

This fact—

He says—

has been completely demonstrated in the actual campaign. The insurgents, it is true, have gone from one place to another, and have traversed a large part of the island, but in doing so they have not been gaining ground, but changing the field of their operations.

The two principal leaders of the Cuban rebels, the Dominican Maximo Gomez and the mulatto Antonio Maceo, are now in the province of Habana, but, although to follow them it has been deemed necessary to withdraw an important number of troops from Puerto Principe, Santa Clara, and the western province of Santiago de Cuba, nothing has occurred there, showing not only that they have no means at their disposal, but also that the country at large is not in their favor.

And yet no single public meeting has ever been held in the Island of Cuba during this revolution outside of Habana to indicate that the people, as they call them, of Cuba are in favor of the monarchy and against the Republic.

It seems that this ought to be the moment to show sympathy and give support when the attention of the Spanish commander-in-chief has been called near the political and business capital of the island.

What does this mean? It is a suit to us, a petition to us, not merely that we should delay the action demanded of us by the people of the United States in their petitions and memorials and by these legislatures, but it is a moment that ought "to show sympathy and give support when the attention of the Spanish commander-in-chief has been called near the political and business capital of the island." That is to say, it is a confession that Gomez has been driven into Habana, and that is the critical moment at which the Government of the United States ought to give its support and express its sympathy for Spain as against the Cubans. They become the petitioners, they become the solicitors of our interference, and Spain to-day is angry with the people of the United States only because we have not expressed for them outward and open sympathy and issued proclamations and done all else to drive them from our coasts when they applied here for shelter against Spanish persecution. No words could more plainly express what is demanded of us than is contained in that paper. He proceeds:

The present advance is not difficult to explain. Maximo Gomez and Maceo had an engagement, if I well remember, on the end of November, in the State of La Reforma, near the line dividing the Province of Puerto Principe from the Province of Santa Clara. The commander of the Spanish troops defeated what he thought was the main body of the enemy, and went in the persecution of him in the region known as Camaguey; then Maceo and Maximo Gomez, taking advantage of the nature of the soil, pushed in two bodies to the west, leaving the Spanish columns and lines to their rear guard. It was the beginning of the raid that has brought so much destruction to property and that has so greatly influenced the public opinion and the press.

There he confesses that Gen. Martinez Campos was outwitted and defeated, in fact, in his purpose by Maceo and Gomez, and he laments that that is the cause of the destruction of the large amount of property in the Habana district and also down in Pinar del Rio:

Nothing is easier, although unfortunate, than what has been done by the two Cuban leaders. They are at the head of a few thousand men, in their great majority negroes, mounted, without commissary department to delay their movements. They meet or disband, according to the necessities of the occasion, marching continually, stealing and changing horses, avoiding the regular army, running and disbanding when the soldiers reach them, exchanging only a few shots, to reform again, sending marauding parties to destroy the cane fields.

A new description, a new history, of Francis Marion of the American Revolution. We did not find any fault with Francis Marion's tactics. We looked at the splendid results achieved by that gallant and devoted man, and his name will go down to history among the most splendid lights of the American military family.

It is well to say that nothing is easier than to burn the sugar cane. It has always been in Cuba a current proverb that a negro with a box of matches can prevent the gathering of the total sugar crop. The destruction has been confined, with very few sad exceptions, to the cane fields, a thing that has been impossible to prevent, as everybody familiar with the condition of the island well knows. They have not dared to approach the buildings and plantations that were protected by detachments of the army or volunteers, nor have they, in all the time that the revolution has lasted, tried to attack or hold any town of medium importance. Not a single town or village has risen in their favor, raising the rebel flag, although the bulk of the bands has passed sometimes at a near distance.

As it has been said above, the military situation of the island has not changed. The insurgents have not gained ground.

At the beginning of the military operations, after the arrival, late in December, of the third army corps of the 25,000 men to the Island of Cuba, and when the dry season was well settled, the insurgent chiefs have made a bold raid with the intention, that has not been concealed, of influencing public opinion abroad. That is all. They know that they can not succeed, and their only hope is founded, directed by the Junta of New York, in what they most desire—in the possibility of bringing difficulties in the relations of Spain and the United States. The Junta has not succeeded, although it has tried to; they have not been able, although engaged continually in it, to violate the neutrality laws that they have never obeyed, and now they look for an indirect intervention to help them in a fight that they can not win because they are a small minority.

The insurgents have ridden through the provinces of Matanzas—

Listen to this—

The insurgents have ridden through the provinces of Matanzas and Santa Clara and nothing else—

That was in January—

destroying a great deal of property of noncombatants, not only of the supporters of the Government, but also of foreigners. The excuse for such acts of unnecessary vandalism is that they want to cut the resources of the Spanish Government. This reason is too preposterous. The tax derived from sugar in the Island of Cuba can sustain an army of over 100,000 men in campaign only for a comparatively short time.

Therefore it is preposterous. That is all they had—their sugar and tobacco—for exportation, to get money with, and I have always understood that any belligerent power not only would, but that it had the right to destroy the resources of the enemy by burning up his crop or whatever else he had that would contribute to his strength.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was done on both sides in our civil war.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course it was.

The real reason of the destruction is to punish the landowners for their loyal support to the Spanish Government, which represents peace, freedom, and civilization in the island—and at the same time to drive to their ranks the many laborers that will be left without the means of subsistence, and to prevent the desertion in their ranks that were anticipated the moment that many thousands of men that have been driven to their ranks by the crisis brought about by the low prices of sugar in the last years would be offered honorable means of gaining a salary.

Well, I really enjoy reading such words coming from the pen of a Spaniard. "Peace, freedom, and civilization in the island"—

The rebel bands that have been presented to the American public as an army have been near Habana. They have not been able to attack or even to surround the city, and it seems absurd even to consider it, remembering that to the present moment they have not even tried to hold a place where to establish what they call their government. They have destroyed the railroads in Matanzas, but these have been immediately repaired and are running, and have brought part of the troops by which they have immediately been surrounded. They are so now, and by enough forces to give us the hope that they will be compelled to fight, and that their retreat to a more favorable field for the operations of guerrilla bands will be prevented.

I suppose that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] would be delighted with a resolution passed by the Senate of the United States that the Cuban forces should stop and fight and should not run any more into the swamps, like Marion did. That would suit exactly. That is the sort of support we could give to Spain down there that would be of material assistance.

If the military situation has not changed, and to a certain point is better, the political also is not changed. The rebels, to answer the request of their sympathizers abroad, have formed what they name a government, and have written a constitution for the only purpose of printing it in the New York papers. But that government has no place where to reside; it has been wandering from one place to another in the fastnesses of the mountain of Najasa. They have no regular functions; there is no civil government; they do not exercise any jurisdiction in fact. The only one is that exercised by the rebel bands that wander about without a place where to rest. The direction of the rebellion is on the field and chiefly by the organization that with the name of "Junta" resides in New York, and is composed of individuals who have adopted the American nationality and sworn allegiance to the American flag.

It is said in Cuba that the actual war has been imported against the will of a large majority of the country. Everything has been planned abroad; for years political clubs established in the United States and in some countries of South America have collected funds and prepared the uprising, and when a law giving a large measure of self-government to the island, accepted and voted even by the Cuban deputies of the Home Rule party, was passed, when they were losing all hopes of having followers in Cuba, the war was imported by leaders that are mostly foreigners or colored men, and that were nearly all of them abroad.

The insurrection has spread, and it is not a wonder, taking into consideration the class of men that form its ranks. Out of a few young and enthusiastic men who have joined the ranks of the rebels, only what would be called in all countries old demagogues are at the head of the revolution. Not only they have not established a government, but they will not be able to form one, even if it were possible that the Island of Cuba would be separated from Spain.

The advance of the bands of Gomez and Maceo has brought close together all the political parties of the island deciding to support the Spanish Government, because even the most liberal and radical in the Home Rule party know that order and law are impossible in the present condition of the island without Spain.

In this revolution the negro element has the most important part. Not only the principal leaders are colored men, but at least eight-tenths of their supporters. The black population of the island forms a little more than one-third of the 1,600,000 Cubans, but they are strong and numerous in the eastern part, and the result of the war, if the island could be declared independent, will be a secession of the black element and a black republic on that part of the island.

The revolutionary organization that from New York has directed the present uprising has been mistaken in its appreciation of the forces of Spain. They did not imagine that Spain could send in a short time a large army with such facility and in Spanish bottoms. At the same time they have not been able to suppose that Spain could have, as she has and will have, the necessary money to sustain what she is bound to sustain, the integrity of her territory. They could not understand the unanimous and stanch determination of the political parties and of everybody in Spain to sacrifice the last man and the last dollar to prevent a bad minority of people without standing in the island to oblige the large majority to accept, against their will, a change of government that will bring the total destruction of an island that is to-day the richest territory of the Spanish-speaking nations in America.

In all what is said—

I suppose "that" is meant—

in favor of a few thousand rebels; all is forgotten about the large majority of Cubans loyal to Spain and ruined by the revolution; nothing is said of the hundreds of thousands of citizens born in Spain, but who have lived since childhood in Cuba, and by their economy and thrift have built the foundation of the riches of the island; nothing of the foreigners that want to be protected against their deliverers.

The insurgents have not shown that they can succeed; they have not established a government and will not be able to establish one. It is the opinion of everybody that in a very short time the main body of the insurgents, which is in a critical position, will be dealt with; but if the chances of war should make necessary the increasing of the Spanish forces, it is not idle to state that according to the latest orders of the war department of Spain, the 1st of January, 1896, the roll call of the standing army in Spain was over 83,000 men; and at the same time that in the system of mobilization that has brought to Cuba three army corps of 25,000 men each, 43 battalions of 1,000 men have not been touched, and can be sent at a moment's notice.

The Cuban insurgents are, and represent, a small minority of the people of the island; they do not occupy permanently any town or part of the territory; the principal feature of the revolution is a radical war; they have not a civil government established, and no civil and judicial jurisdiction is exercised; the revolution has been started from abroad, is maintained by foreign aid, and its last and only hope is to be supported by foreign intervention, obtained by a systematic misrepresentation of facts.

Now, I have read the whole of that miraculous and mysterious paper, and I have shown that it is what I claimed it to be, a mere petition for delay. And the Senate granted it by giving the delay, by waiting to see whether or not the conjectures of the minister from Spain would be realized in the near future or how the tide would turn.

Very soon after this was handed in, the Spanish Government, despairing of any conquest of the insurrectionists of Cuba through the powers of Martinez Campos, who was the greatest man, both in a military sense and in the sense of being a great statesman, that Spain has produced perhaps in a century, finding that he could not accomplish the result of the conquest of Cuba, recalled him and sent Weyler in his place. They threw the sword of extermination into the scale by sending Weyler to Cuba, and they determined that Cuba should feel the blade that leaves nothing to grow after it has struck.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will it be convenient for the Senator from Alabama to go on now, or does he desire that the Senate shall adjourn so that he may finish his argument to-morrow?

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield as soon as I mention one more fact which I wish to go into the RECORD this evening.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

Mr. MORGAN. The senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], in his speech in opposition to this resolution and in opposition to the independence and the belligerent rights of Cuba, delivered in the Senate last week, relied almost entirely and based his argument upon an alleged dispatch that was received from the premier of the Spanish Government. He read it at large with an attentive, respectful, almost religious presentation, and after he had gotten it upon record he based his argument upon it to show the magnanimity of the Spanish Government, to show the grounds of their action in Cuba, and to show their relations with the Government of the United States.

Now comes out the declaration of Mr. Castillo that he wrote no such dispatch and was not responsible for it. The Senator from Maine was overreached; he mistook the Spaniard; the Spaniard, it appears, had neither mercy nor consideration in his heart for the poor people of Cuba. These poor mulattoes, negroes, vagabonds, described by the Spanish minister, Dupuy de Lôme, have no recognition at the court of Spain; never have had and never will have; and they quarrel with any American citizen, particularly with any Southern man who was raised in a negro community, who has been the owner of slaves, because he stands up on the floor of the Senate of the United States and demands for them all the rights of men. The Senator from Maine, when he presents these questions to the Senate of the United States, negatives that demand. He is not willing that they should be free men in Cuba, and I take it for granted that he is not willing they should be free men here, unless by some hook or by some crook they can be made to vote the Republican ticket.

I will close, Mr. President, at this place, retaining the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me a moment to obtain the consideration of a bill for the benefit of a private soldier.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

MICHAEL RYAN.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1816) for the relief of Michael Ryan.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to revoke the order dishonorably discharging Private Michael Ryan, Company I, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, on September 20, 1865, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the military service of the United States as of that date.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 17, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

BREAKWATER IN MARQUETTE BAY.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 140) directing the Secretary of War to make a survey and submit an estimate for a breakwater in Marquette Bay.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to report to Congress, as soon as possible, a survey of a proposed breakwater, not less than 500 nor more than 1,000 feet in length, extending into Marquette Harbor, or bay, in Lake Superior, from the southeast corner, or headland, of Presque Isle, together with an estimate of the cost of such breakwater.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOOKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

FOG SIGNAL ON NORTH PIER OF MENOMINEE HARBOR, WISCONSIN.

Mr. STEPHENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5363) making appropriation for a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of establishing a fog signal at the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope we will have the report read or some explanation of the bill made.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. CORLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5363) making an appropriation for a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin, respectfully report the same back and recommend that the bill do pass.

Your committee believe, from the correspondence had with the Treasury Department and which is made a part of this report, that the interest of commerce and navigation demands the establishment of a fog signal at the point named.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., February 6, 1896.

SIR: The letter from your committee of February 5, 1896, inclosing H. R. bill No. 5363, for a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin, has been received.

In reply I have to say that the matter was referred to the Light-House Board, which reports that the following estimate was submitted by it:

Menominee light and fog-signal station, Michigan:

Establishing a fog signal at Menominee light station, Green Bay, Lake Michigan, Michigan $5,000

NOTE.—The increase in the number and size of vessels frequenting the harbor makes the establishment of a fog signal here necessary to the safety of navigation. (See page 183, Book of Estimates, 1896-97.)

The proposed appropriation has, therefore, the approval of the Board.

Respectfully, yours,

S. WIKE, Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE, House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this bill makes an appropriation. Without taking the time necessary to explain why, I shall have to object unless the bill is amended by striking out "the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the same is hereby appropriated," and that is all there is of it. I will have to object unless the gentleman recasts his bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, one word. I have no objection if the gentleman from Michigan will so amend his bill as to authorize this work, as other bills ordinarily passed. I have no objection to that.

Mr. STEPHENSON. All right.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take that up later. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read?

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2912) granting to the Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, its lessee in perpetuity, the right of way over a part of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian Reservation, in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Kansas, and to the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Illinois, as lessee in perpetuity of the railroad lines and property of said Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company, the right of way for the railroad of said Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company as so leased, 100 feet in width, 50 feet on each side of the center of the track, as existing and located on and since the 7th day of April, A. D. 1895, through the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian Reservation, in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, and over the allotments in severalty of certain Indians thereon, commencing upon the allotment of Sidney Perry, at the southeast corner of said reservation, and extending northwestwardly to a point 1,274 feet west of the east line of the allotment of Stephen Story, in the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 26, township 1 north, of range 18 east, in Richardson County, Nebr.: Provided, That this grant is upon condition that the grantees hereof shall, within —— days after the approval of this act, pay to said allottees, or their heirs, or to a parent or guardian of any minor allottee or heir, or to the Indian agent at the Pottawatomie and Great Nemaha Agency, for their use, at the rate of $25 per acre for the land hereby granted; and the receipts of any such persons, acknowledged in the manner provided for the acknowledgment on instruments conveying real estate in the State where said land is located, filed with the officer keeping the public record of land titles in the county in which said land is located, shall be evidence of such payment.

SEC. 2. That at any time hereafter when the encroachments of the Missouri or Great Nemaha rivers shall make it necessary for the grantees named in this act, their successors or assigns, to acquire other right of way through any part of such reservation, the allottees in severalty of allotments thereon, or their heirs, are hereby authorized individually to grant and convey right of way to the said railroad companies over their respective allotments in the ordinary manner provided for the acquisition of title to real estate in the above-named States, respectively, or the said grantees may proceed against such allottees, or their heirs, as the owners of the several allotments, to condemn such right of way in the manner prescribed by the laws of such respective States as then existing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the report will be read.

The report (by Mr. FISCHER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2912) to authorize the Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, its lessee in perpetuity, the right of way over a part of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservations in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, submit the following report:

The Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company owns an important right of way along the Missouri River in the States of Iowa and Nebraska, running through the Sac and Fox and Iowa reservations and across certain allotted Indian lands. The right of way and track have been leased to the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, who now use the same and over which a large quantity of freight and passenger traffic and the United States mails are daily carried.

The encroachments of the Missouri River, by changing its bed and by the caving in of its banks through the constant action at high water, have been such in recent months as to absolutely force the relocation of the right of way and track of said railroad farther inland and across certain allotted Indian lands on said reservation. The allottees of these lands and the railroad companies have agreed upon a new right of way now occupied by the latter, and one that is believed and hoped will be free from all encroachments in the future. This was necessary, or the company could not have continued its business as heretofore. The agreement is to the effect that the railroad company is to pay the allottees $25 per acre for lands actually taken, the Indians granting across said lands a right of 100 feet, or 50 feet on either side of the main track, for ordinary railroad purposes. The agreement is entirely voluntary, and the Indians are entirely competent to contract. The agreement upon the part of the allottees and the railroad company is as follows:

"The undersigned allottees or heirs of allottees of tracts of land as below described upon the Sac and Fox and Iowa reservations, in Doniphan County, Kans., and Richardson County, Nebr., and upon which there has recently been located and built part of the line of railroad of the Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company, Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company lessee, such location and building having been forced by the sudden encroachment of the Missouri River upon the line of said railroad as before located and operated, hereby state, the adults in person and the minors by parent, that we believe that $25 per acre is a fair and just price for the lands so taken and all damages to us upon such allotments, and that we are willing that a title to a strip 100 feet wide, being 50 feet on either side of the center of the track as now located, and as much wider as may be necessary in case required by cuts and fills, shall be granted to the said railroad company and its lessee by the proper authority of the United States of America upon there being paid or secured to us in such manner as such authorities may deem proper the said sum per acre for any land so granted."

In a letter of date January 6, 1896, from the Hon. Charles F. Manderson, formerly a United States Senator from the State of Nebraska, and a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to Senator ALLEN, he says:

"The $25 per acre provided to be paid is really more than the land is worth, but if any information is desired by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs as to the value of the lands it will be found in the files of the Indian Bureau in letters from Agent Pinson, dated April 23, 1895, April 30, 1895, and a letter from the Indian Bureau to the agent dated March 29, 1895. From these letters it will appear that the sum of $25 per acre had been determined upon as a fair price for the lands before the agreement was signed by the allottees."

Your committee finds that it is highly important and necessary to the public service, as well as to the interests of the parties concerned, that this bill should be considered and promptly passed. The committee recommends that the bill be amended, as follows:

In line 24, section 1, insert in the blank space found in said line, between the words "within" and "days," the word "ninety."

In line 34 of section 1, after the word "payment," at end of said line, insert:

"Provided further, That said company shall first file with and secure the approval of the Secretary of the Interior to the map of definite location of the road as the same was located on the 7th day of April, 1895."

In line 1 of section 2 strike out the word "when" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Whenever it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of the Interior that."

In line 14 of section 2 add the following:

"Provided, That said company shall first file a map of definite location of the location of the relocated line as provided for in section 1 of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STRODE of Nebraska, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CHATTAHOOCHEE RIVER.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6996) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot bridge across the Chattahoochee River at or near the city of Columbia, Ala.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Columbia, a municipal corporation under the laws of Alabama, its successors or assignees, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge for the passage of vehicles of all kinds, animals, and foot passengers across the Chattahoochee River at or near the city of Columbia, so as to connect with Georgia on the opposite shore: Provided, That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may be built as a drawbridge, or with unbroken and continuous spans, and it shall give a clear headroom of not less than 55 feet above high-water mark, as the same shall be fixed and determined by the Secretary of War: And provided also, That if said bridge shall be constructed as a drawbridge the same shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and the best navigable point, and with drawspans giving a clear width of waterway of not less than 100 feet on each side of the pivot pier; and said draw shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats: Provided further, That whatever kind of bridge is constructed the owners thereof shall maintain thereon, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals as may be prescribed by the Light-House Board.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States passing over said bridge than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the public highways leading to said bridge; and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and approaches for postal telegraph purposes; and said bridge shall be so constructed and operated as not to interfere with the navigation of said river.

SEC. 3. That said municipal corporation shall have the right to charge and collect a reasonable rate of toll, to be approved by the Secretary of War, not exceeding the rate limited by the law of Alabama.

SEC. 4. That the bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be located and built under and subject to such regulations for the security of the navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the proposed bridge, and a map of the location, giving for the space of one-half mile above and one-half mile below the proposed location the topography of the banks of the river, the shore lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject. And until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War, no work upon the bridge shall be commenced; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 6. That Congress hereby expressly reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMBASSADOR BAYARD.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent of the House to fix upon the hour of half past 1 o'clock on Wednesday next for consideration of the resolutions in regard to certain speeches of Ambassador Bayard, which resolutions have been for some time on the Calendar.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The gentleman proposes to fix half past 1 o'clock on Wednesday?

Mr. HITT. Half past 1.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. What time will be allowed for debate?

Mr. HITT. Oh, I suppose the time for debate will be very liberal, whatever the House seems disposed to desire. It is with the view of having discussion on both sides at a fixed time that I make this request.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, these resolutions are very important, and I think there should be opportunity for the fullest debate.

Mr. HITT. There will not be any restriction.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. With that understanding, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that half past 1 on Wednesday be fixed for the consideration of the resolutions indicated by him?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LIMITS OF THE PORT OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. NOONAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1230) to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans shall be, and the same are hereby, extended so as to include that portion of the parish of Jefferson on the west bank of the Mississippi River lying between the upper line of the parish of Orleans, west bank, the west bank of the said river to a point opposite the upper boundary line of the parish of Orleans, east bank, a line drawn thence back 4,000 feet, perpendicular to said river, and a line drawn thence parallel to the Mississippi River until it intersects said upper parish boundary line, west bank; and so as further to include that portion of the parish of St. Bernard lying between the lower boundary line of the parish of Orleans, east bank, the east bank of the Mississippi River to a point 3 miles below said lower boundary, a line drawn thence back 4,000 feet parallel to said lower boundary line, and a line drawn thence parallel to the Mississippi River, until it intersects said lower boundary line of the parish of Orleans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, has that bill been reported by a committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read?

Mr. MEYER. I should like to have the report read, Mr. Speaker.

The report (by Mr. NOONAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1230) to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans, beg leave to report as follows:

The present port limits of the port of New Orleans present a geographical absurdity. They include the parish of Orleans, with which the city is coterminous, and a strip of the parish of Jefferson, east bank, 3 miles front on the river, extending back to Lake Pontchartrain. This last-mentioned slice was added in 1888 for the purpose of taking into the port the terminus of the Tazan and Mississippi Valley Railroad. The parish of Orleans lies on both banks of the Mississippi River, but not on immediately opposite banks. For instance, on the east bank the parish fronts about 13 miles on the river; on the west bank it fronts about 23 miles on the river; but only about 4½ miles of these two sides of the parish and port are opposite each other, so that the port stretches out in two long wings, one on the east bank, 8½ miles long, and one on the west bank, 18½ miles long. The wing on the east bank is opposite the parish of Jefferson, west bank, and the wing on the west bank is opposite the parish of St. Bernard. These two portions of these adjacent parishes, while not legally within the port limits, are physically and commercially within the port, and ought to be legally in the port.

The present bill proposes to square up the port, so to speak, and to put both sides of the Mississippi River within the commercial limits of this great center of commerce at the sea end of the Mississippi Valley, within the limits of the port of New Orleans.

The commerce of New Orleans has flowed over and beyond her municipal limits. This has happened several times in her history. More than forty years ago the port limits were extended on the right bank from the then upper limits of the city to the then upper limit of the city of Carrollton. This extension then made took into the port limits three additional municipal governments situated in the parish of Jefferson, those of the city of Jefferson, the city of Lafayette, and the city of Carrollton. In process of time these three cities were absorbed by and were merged into the city of New Orleans and the parish of Orleans. Another extension on the upper right bank was made by special act in 1888, by which the limits were pushed 3 miles more up the river into the parish of Jefferson.

No extensions of the port have ever been made on the west bank of the river nor on the east bank below the ancient limits of the city. The overflow of commerce has at last reached these two localities, and hence the bill now reported. It proposes to push the port limits on the east bank 3 miles below the lower limit of the city into the parish of St. Bernard, just as the act of 1888 pushed them, on the same bank, 3 miles above into the parish of Jefferson.

It further proposes to push the port limits on the west bank from the upper limit of the parish of Orleans, west bank, to a point opposite the upper limit of the parish of Orleans, east bank.

Within the proposed extension on the lower east bank are situated the slaughterhouses and cattle market of the city of New Orleans and the very extensive terminals of the New Orleans and Western Railroad Company, called Port Chalmette, which has expended large sums in the construction of modern, improved, fireproof warehouses and compresses for the handling of cotton, of grain elevators, sheds, and wharves. This road is organized to build direct to Dallas, Tex., from New Orleans, but it appears that it is so situated and located as to operate as a practical belt road to all the lines of railway entering New Orleans, and that its extensive terminals are available to all these lines, and will largely cheapen the existing port charges on the handling of exports and imports.

Within the proposed extension of the upper west bank are situated the ferry and export and import terminal of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, the export terminal of the Southern Pacific Railway Company, and the towns of Gretna and Gouldsboro, the site of large cotton-oil mills and refineries.

Under the law as it stands now no ship can land at any of these terminals for any purpose without the special consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, and unless day and night inspectors are detailed at the expense of the ship. No ship can discharge at these places, even with such consent, anything but bulk cargo, such as salt, iron, coal, and similar articles. No package freight of any kind can be landed except within the limits of the port.

It seems absurd almost to deny to two great transcontinental carriers, like the Texas and Pacific railroads, the former of which was chartered by a special act of Congress, and a road that may in time become also a transcontinental carrier, the right to connect with shipping as soon as they reach tide water, but to compel them to ferry every pound of import package freight over the Mississippi River, and also to pay the useless burden of drayage from ship's side to cars before it is ferried; and to compel all ships that connect with them, carrying bulk cargo or going to receive cotton, grain, and other products, to do their business under expensive and delay-producing regulations to which the other commerce of the port is not subjected.

As stated above, all of the commerce that comes to these terminals on both banks of the river is necessarily part of the commerce of the city of New Orleans. It comes consigned to her merchants. It is sold on her exchanges, handled by her labor, loaned upon by her banks, and insured in her insurance companies.

Her growing commerce and that of the Mississippi Valley, of which she is the geographical and natural outlet, demand that no unreasonable restrictions should hamper them, and that they should have the largest limits within which to expand. This bill has the approbation of the Treasury Department. It has passed the Senate without a dissenting voice, and we beg leave to report favorably on it and recommend its passage.

Some local opposition to this bill has arisen in certain circles in the city of New Orleans. Its passage is advocated by the Cotton Exchange, the Maritime Exchange, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the Produce Exchange, and large numbers of prominent merchants engaged in the shipping business and in the exportation of grain, lumber, and cotton. It is opposed by a majority of the city council, the Sugar and Rice Exchange, the Board of Trade, and the Merchants and Lumbermen's Exchange. Large numbers of the individual members of these opposing exchanges have signified by telegrams and memorials their desire to see the bill pass. The press of the city of New Orleans is unanimously in its favor.

Your committee consider, however, that the question of this port extension is a matter of national importance rather than of mere local import. If, as we believe, it will have the effect of cheapening the handling of exports and imports, and of doing away with unnecessary burdens upon the commerce of the Mississippi Valley passing through the port of New Orleans, not only will that commerce be thereby benefited, but the city of New Orleans herself will be increased in prosperity by the larger volume of that commerce which increased and cheapened facilities will necessarily bring to her doors.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I should like to know in what position this bill leaves the balance of the territory that is now within the limits of the port of New Orleans?

Mr. NOONAN. It does not affect it. This extension merely complies with the requirements of the commercial interests of that city.

Mr. HOPKINS. My idea in making inquiry is this: It will be remembered that in the first days of the present session I secured the passage of a bill through the House extending the limits of the port of entry of Chicago. I found in my investigation that the port of New Orleans extended clear up and took in a great part of the State of Illinois. Now, when this bill is passed defining the limits of the port of New Orleans, as it does, what will become of the balance of the territory?

Mr. BOATNER. This bill does not extend the port of New Orleans in that direction. It extends it down the river.

Mr. HOPKINS. So that it leaves the territory north of New Orleans precisely as it is.

Mr. NOONAN. Yes, sir; it does not interfere with that at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, before the question is submitted to the House I desire to have read a protest in relation to this matter from the mayor and city council of New Orleans. The report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce correctly states that there is a difference of opinion on the part of the commercial bodies of the city of New Orleans as to the advantage and propriety of granting this extension. In view of this I will not consume the time of the House by reading or having read either protests or the memorials in favor of the project, because perhaps they might appear to balance each other, but I would like to have the House informed how the authorized representatives of the city regard the pending question and submit the resolutions of her council. They should receive the careful consideration of this body.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., January 24, 1896.

"Whereas there is now pending before the United States Congress an act extending the limits of the port of New Orleans so as to include the port of Chalmette in said port limit; and

"Whereas the adoption of said measure is in the interest of the New Orleans and Western Railway, and is inimical to the welfare and prosperity of our city; and

"Whereas the said representations have not been carried out; and

ESTATE OF THOMAS H. MILLSAPS.

Mr. TRELOAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1716) for the relief of W. H. Ferguson, administrator of the estate of Thomas H. Millsaps.

Webb, trustee, said bonds having been lost or stolen from the said W. H. Ferguson after assignment in blank and delivery by said H. Webb, trustee, to said Ferguson: Provided, That the said W. H. Ferguson shall first file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum equal to the amount of said missing bonds and the interest which would accrue thereon until the principal becomes due and payable, with two good and sufficient sureties, residents of the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of the lost or stolen bonds.

Mr. BLUE. Let us hear the report on this bill.

The report (by Mr. HANLY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1716) for the relief of W. H. Ferguson, administrator of Thomas H. Milsaps, submit the following report:

This bill is the same as H. R. 4763, now pending in the House and previously reported by this committee with a favorable recommendation.

Your committee therefore recommend that this bill be substituted for said House bill, and that said House bill lie on the table.

Mr. BLUE. Does the bill make any provision for a bond of indemnity?

On motion of Mr. TRELOAR, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

De Freest any pay or allowance for any period of time he was absent without leave and not in the performance of military duty, or to such time as he would have been discharged by limitation of time of enlistment or otherwise.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. HULICK. I ask consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3337) amending the act of June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to authorize the President to appoint an officer of the Navy or the Marine Corps to perform the duties of Solicitor and Judge-Advocate-General, etc., and to fix the rank and pay of such officer," and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act "to authorize the President to appoint an officer of the Navy or the Marine Corps to perform the duties of Solicitor and Judge-Advocate-General, etc., and to fix the rank and pay of such officer," approved June 8, 1880, is hereby amended by inserting in said act in lieu of the words "with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain in the Navy, or a colonel in the Marine Corps, as the case may be," the words "with the rank and highest pay of a captain in the Navy, or the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel in the Marine Corps, as the case may be": Provided, That this amendment shall take effect from July 19, 1892, the date on which the present incumbent entered on duty, and that the amount herein appropriated shall be payable from the appropriation "Pay of the Navy."

Mr. BLUE. What is the report on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. HULICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3337) to amend the act of June 8, 1880, establishing the office of Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, report:

The office of Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy was established by the act of Congress approved June 8, 1880, which reads as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, for the term of four years, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the officers of the Navy or the Marine Corps, a Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain in the Navy or a colonel in the Marine Corps, as the case may be. And the office of the said Judge-Advocate-General shall be in the Navy Department, where he shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and boards for the examination of officers for retirement and promotion in the naval service, and perform such other duties as have heretofore been performed by the Solicitor and Naval Judge-Advocate-General."

From a reading of this law it will be seen that the Judge-Advocate-General is to be selected from the officers of either the Navy or the Marine Corps, and is to have the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain in the Navy or of a colonel in the Marine Corps, as the case may be. Now, the effect of this statute is to give an officer of the Marine Corps who fills the position of Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy the pay of a colonel in the Marine Corps. After twenty years' service this officer receives $4,500 per annum, which, together with commutation for quarters ($60 per month), makes an allowance of $5,220.

From the enactment of this law up to the 5th day of June, 1892, the office of Judge-Advocate-General was filled by appointment of an "officer of the Marine Corps," and he received pay and allowances of $5,220 annually. But on the 5th day of June, 1892, a vacancy occurred in the office, and the President filled the vacancy by appointing "an officer of the Navy" as Judge-Advocate-General.

Thereafter, when the officers of the Treasury were called upon to adjust the pay of the Judge-Advocate-General thus chosen from the Marine Corps, they ruled that in accordance with the provisions of the act above referred to he was entitled only to the shore pay of a captain in the Navy, which, according to the act of July 15, 1870, is $3,500, making a difference between the pay of the first appointee and the second (the present incumbent) of $1,720 per annum.

The question was referred to the Court of Claims by the Secretary of the Treasury, by virtue of authority conferred upon him by law, and that court sustained the decision of the Treasury Department. It certainly was not intended that an officer taken from the Marine Corps to serve as Judge-Advocate-General should receive a compensation so much greater than an officer taken from the Navy should receive for performing the identical (same) services.

Under the law as it is now a Marine officer who has just graduated from the naval school is eligible to appointment to the office of Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, and would receive the pay of $4,570 per annum, while under the ruling of the Treasury Department a naval officer, no matter how long he may have been in the service, would receive only $3,500 per annum.

The proposed amendment will remedy this inequality, and will give to the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, when an officer of the Navy, $4,500 per annum, which is the pay of a colonel in the Marine Corps. There will still remain a discrepancy in the pay of each, as there is no allowance under existing law for quarters or commutation for naval officers.

This bill, while it will increase expenditures by $1,000 per annum, involves no increase of appropriation, the amount necessary to carry it into effect being payable from the appropriation "Pay of the Navy," a continuous appropriation. If passed it will give the incumbent of the office of Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, if a naval officer, $4,500 per annum, which falls short by $720 of the amount received by the late incumbent of that office or which will be received by any officer of the Marine Corps appointed thereto who has had the same length of service as the present incumbent. It does not per se increase the pay of the office, but, as was stated in report No. 2191 upon House bill 9932, Fifty-second Congress, which bill was similar to the one now under consideration, it corrects an error in the law and simply carries out its true intent

Hon. H. A. Herbert, when chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, submitted to Congress a bill providing that the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, when an officer of the Navy, should receive the sea pay of a captain in the Navy. This bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs (vide report No. 2191, Fifty-second Congress, second session), but failed of action owing to lack of time.

The present Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Navy are in favor of the person holding the office receiving the sea pay of a captain in the Navy.

The office of Judge-Advocate-General is one of great responsibility and requires a high order of talent to successfully perform the duties thereof.

By reference to article 14, page 7, of the United States Navy Regulations, the duties of that office are specifically set forth, to which reference is hereby made. The highest compensation that can be allowed under the present statute for the services of the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy are not greater than the responsible duties of the office demand.

Your committee, having fully considered the bill referred to them, the object of which is simply to carry out the intent of the original act to give the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy the sea pay of his grade, unanimously recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULICK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IMPROVEMENT OF FAIRPORT HARBOR, OHIO.

Mr. BEACH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 141) directing the Secretary of War to submit plans and estimates for the improvement of Fairport Harbor.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to report to Congress a resurvey of the port of Fairport, in the county of Lake and State of Ohio, with an estimate of the cost of such improvements as may be recommended by the engineers in charge.

Mr. LOUD. I wish to ask one question about this joint resolution before consent is given. I see that resolutions of this kind are becoming very frequent, and I wish to inquire what is the ultimate object of the action requested? I should like a frank answer.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I very gladly state the object of this measure. The engineers have concluded that the improvements which have been outlined heretofore should be abandoned, because they are not in the right line of such improvements. I have a letter here from the engineer in charge, Colonel Smith, stating that all this preliminary work has been done, that the maps are nearly completed, and that no expense whatever will attend the carrying out of this resolution.

Mr. LOUD. I understand that; but the ultimate effect is to bring the matter into such shape that the River and Harbor Committee can, under the law, make an appropriation for it during this Congress. Is not that the ultimate effect?

Mr. BEACH. There is no appropriation at all, I will state to the gentleman, carried by the bill. There is a large unexpended appropriation remaining on hand for this purpose; but they do not wish to expend it along the line heretofore proposed.

Mr. LOUD. Of course I can not object to the consideration of this bill in view of the fact that I have allowed others to go through; but I call attention to the fact that these matters are brought to our attention very frequently during this session.

Mr. BEACH. This bill has been before the committee and favorably considered. I am satisfied that it will meet their approval.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

STAMFORD, CONN., SUBPORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 880, and if consent is given I shall ask to substitute for the bill the Senate bill No. 494, constituting Stamford, Conn., a subport of entry.

The Senate bill was read at length.

Mr. HILL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute this bill for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman the engrossed bill?

Mr. HILL. No. I presume it is at the desk.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is that the engrossed bill is not here. The gentleman can make his request at another time when the bill is in the hands of a clerk.

HOMESTEAD LANDS, OKLAHOMA.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider House bill 3656 in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROUT. What is the bill referred to?

Mr. FLYNN. This is the Oklahoma homestead bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We ought to have the title of the bill stated.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserving the public lands for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on the motion?

Mr. LACEY and Mr. McRAE asked unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The resolution was then adopted, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the bill called up under the resolution by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all settlers under the homestead laws of the United States upon the public lands acquired by treaty or agreement from the various Indian tribes in the Territory of Oklahoma, who have or who shall hereafter reside upon the tract entered in good faith for the period required by existing law, shall be entitled to a patent for the land so entered, upon the payment to the local land officers of the usual and customary fees, and no other or further charge of any kind whatsoever shall be required from such settler to entitle him to a patent for the land covered by his entry: Provided, That the right to commute any such entry and pay for said lands, in the option of any such settler and in the time and at the prices now fixed by existing laws, shall remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the terms and provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, the bill which the House has so kindly decided to consider under the resolution just adopted relates exclusively to the Territory of Oklahoma. In view of the fact that the Department of the Interior has reported adversely on the bill, I invite a thorough consideration of its provisions, so that the House may fully understand what the proposition is before the vote is taken. I shall endeavor as briefly as possible to outline the situation which exists in Oklahoma, and to present some of the potent reasons why the full benefits of the homestead law should be conferred upon the settlers of that Territory, as they have been heretofore conferred upon the settlers of the surrounding States.

The first step looking to the creation of the Territory of Oklahoma was taken by Congress in 1889. In the geographical center of the then Indian Territory a tract of land comprising 1,887,800 acres was opened to homestead settlement. This legislation was had in the closing hours of the session, and Congress inadvertently failed to provide any legislation for the protection of the people who might go upon these lands. For more than twelve months nearly 100,000 people resided there without any form of civil government. They built cities and towns, they opened farms, and in a thousand ways illustrated to the world, in energy, in intelligence, and in marvelous progress, the highest qualities and possibilities of American citizenship. It is not extravagant for me to say that during this short period of time, under the inspiration of free homes, these first settlers of Oklahoma added twice the amount to the national wealth that is involved in the pending bill. They did more than this. They established in the center of a great domain, larger in area than the great Commonwealth of Missouri, the germs of another American State, which in a little more than half a decade has ripened into a Territory fully qualified for the responsibilities of Statehood.

It was not until May, 1890, that Congress passed the act providing for a Territorial government and fixing the boundaries of the new Territory. These boundaries included all the lands and Indian reservations in the old Indian Territory lying west of the reservations occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes. The large portion of the lands in the new Territory had been ceded to the United States by the treaties made with the Indians in the years following the late civil war, and only a few thousand Indians were in actual occupancy of the various reservations.

Most of these Indians were there by Executive order, and in no case were the lands held by a fee-simple title. The Indians had reached a degree of civilization which fitted them for citizenship and the Government entered upon this policy of settling them upon lands in severalty, and of opening up the surplus lands to white settlement. In pursuance of this policy Congress passed an act constituting what was known as the Cherokee Commission and duly authorizing said commission to make agreements with all the tribes within the limits of Oklahoma Territory. As the result of the work of this commission, agreements were made and ratified by Congress by which the following lands were ceded to the United States exclusive of lands allotted and reserved:

Reservations.	Acres.
Cherokee Outlet, Oklahoma	732,280 1,822,240 2,806,350
Pawnee, Oklahoma	169,320
Tonkawa, Oklahoma	68,950
Sac and Fox, Oklahoma	364,536
Iowa, Oklahoma	207,028
Pottawatomie, Oklahoma	256,896
Cheyenne and Arapahoe, Oklahoma	3,500,562
Kickapoo, Oklahoma	85,000
Wichita, Oklahoma	491,388
Total in Oklahoma	10,484,550

It will be seen that the lands affected by the provisions of the bill aggregate 10,484,550 acres. The following, which I quote from the Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shows the manner in which the lands are disposed of under the existing laws and the prices required to be paid by the settlers:

Sac and Fox and Iowa lands, Oklahoma, subject to disposal under section 7 of the act of February 13, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 759), which provides that each homestead settler before receiving a patent shall pay $1.25 per acre for the land taken by him.

Absentee Shawnee, Pottawatomie, and Cheyenne and Arapahoe lands, Oklahoma, subject to disposal under section 16 of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 1026), which provides that each homestead settler shall pay $1.50 per acre for the land taken by him.

Kickapoo lands, Oklahoma, subject to disposal under section 3 of the act of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat. L., 563), which requires each homestead settler to pay $1.50 per acre for the land settled upon.

Cherokee Outlet lands, Oklahoma, subject to disposal under section 10 of the act of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat. L., 640), which requires each settler before receiving a patent to pay the sum of $2.50 per acre for any land east of 97½° west longitude, $1.50 per acre for any land between 97½° and 98½° west longitude, and $1 per acre for any land west of 98½° west longitude, and interest upon the amount so to be paid for said land from the date of entry to the date of final payment at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

Tonkawa and Pawnee lands, Oklahoma, subject to disposal under section 13 of the act of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat. L., 644), which provides that each settler shall pay $2.50 per acre for the land taken by him, and interest upon the amount to be paid from the date of entry to the date of final payment at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

Wichita lands, Oklahoma, which, when opened to settlement, will be subject to disposal under the act of March 2, 1895 (28 Stat. L., 897), which requires each homestead entryman to pay $1.25 per acre for the land entered at the time of submitting his final proof.

Mr. Speaker, in the ratification of these agreements for the cession of the surplus lands to the United States, Congress departed from the homestead policy which guided its action in opening original Oklahoma. It gave the lie to the professions of all the political parties of this country which, in and out of Congress, have repeatedly resolved in favor of maintaining the homestead laws for the settlement and development of the public domain. These several acts require a continuous residence of five years on the part of the settler, and then exact from him a price which the whole experience in the settlement of the new States shows he is unable to pay. The bill under consideration requires the settler to live upon his claim for five years before he can obtain a title, to pay all the fees required by law, and allows him the privilege of commutation. In relieving him of the final payment it places him in a position to save himself and family from the loss of his home, which, in the case of a large majority, will surely come unless this bill becomes a law.

These lands in Oklahoma are covered by as worthy a class of men as ever settled upon the public domain, but they are now poor in purse. They are overwhelmed by the protracted financial depression and by the destructive climatic conditions which have lessened the agricultural productions of many sections of the country during the last two or three years. In a word, it is impossible for them to pay for the lands they occupy and, powerless to obviate the conditions by which they are surrounded, they appeal with confidence to Congress to treat them as other settlers have been treated in all the States of the West under the beneficent provisions of the general homestead law. More than 5,000 ex-soldiers who fought the battles of the Union reside upon these lands. They reside side by side with several thousand ex-Confederate soldiers struggling alike to repair their shattered fortunes by the establishment of useful and happy homes and in the building up of the institutions of civil and religious liberty which are the pride and glory of our wonderful civilization. It is for such men, for their families, for the education of their children, and for their homes, that I urge the passage of this bill.

But, sir, it may be said that the cost is too great. I answer no. The report of the Secretary of the Interior is misleading. It is destitute not only of every element of human sympathy, but of the substantial facts. With heartless indifference toward the present unfortunate condition of the pioneers of Oklahoma who occupy these lands, and apparently anxious to strike a fatal blow at all legislation in behalf of free homes, the Secretary would have Congress believe that more than $15,000,000 will be received from settlers under existing laws. He takes no account of the fact that there are now more than 7,000,000 acres of land in Oklahoma open to settlement, a great proportion of which will never be taken up for agricultural purposes. Much of this vacant land is within the limits of the reservations summarized in the Secretary's report, and should be deducted from his extravagant statement of prospective receipts. Nor does he mention the large amounts which will be paid into the Treasury for commutation of homesteads or the amounts paid under the laws now in force. Everybody but the present Secretary of the Interior knows that under the homestead law, as proposed in this bill, a large proportion of the settlers will, when times become better, voluntarily pay for their homes and secure a title to the same before the expiration of five years.

Take the number of commuted homestead entries made in the State of Kansas in the years 1885 to 1890, inclusive, and we have a fair illustration of the practical operation of the homestead policy in connection with this question of commutation. As shown by the records of the General Land Office, the number of homestead entries commuted to cash under section 2301, Revised Statutes, and the number of homestead entries commuted under section 2 of the act of June 15, 1880 (21 Stat., 237), with the number of acres disposed of and the amount paid for the same under each act, appear in the following table:

	Section 2301.			Section 2, act of June 15, 1880.
Year.	No.	Acres.	Amount.	No.	Acres.	Amount.

Thus it appears that from 1885 to 1890, inclusive, a period of only six years, 18,572 homestead entries were commuted in Kansas, upon lands adjacent to Oklahoma and not essentially different in character, embracing 2,350,557.83 acres, and yielding to the public Treasury the sum of $3,778,417.60. Now, sir, if we take a general survey of the free-home policy in all the public-land States we shall observe the same gratifying results. The following statements show the number of final homestead entries from the passage of the first homestead law in 1862 up to the close of the fiscal year of 1895, the number of acres, and the number of commuted homesteads.

Statement of the number of commuted homesteads under section 2301, Revised Statutes, and second section act June 15, 1880.

Year.	Number.	Year.	Number.

These figures show that in the country at large about one in five of all the final homestead entries have been actually commuted.

I have been unable to obtain all the official returns showing the amount of money already paid into the Treasury by the settlers of Oklahoma since the opening of the country. But I have the sum paid in the single year of 1894, amounting to $449,514.26. Here, again, the Secretary of the Interior ignores the facts in making the following statement:

As these lands have not been open to settlement for five years, very few have been able to make final proof thereon, and it is doubtful if many of them have availed themselves of the privilege of commutation. It is certain that the amount already paid by the settlers is so small as to form a very small proportion to the amount still due.

It is certain that between one and two millions of dollars have already reached the Treasury from the Oklahoma settlers, mostly paid under the privilege of commutation, nearly half a million in the year 1894. But the Secretary is not satisfied with this display of ignorance or misrepresentation. He proceeds in his report to say:

The proceeds from the sales of these lands are to be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians to recompense them for the cession of the lands. If homestead settlers are relieved from paying for them the Government will be obliged to make appropriations to recompense the Indians, unless the treaty stipulations are to be entirely ignored.

Mr. Speaker, so far as Oklahoma is concerned, there is no truth in this statement of the Secretary. If this bill becomes a law, not an additional dollar will have to be appropriated for the Indians, and no treaty stipulations will be violated. The Indians have already been paid, or their funds invested, and in no form or manner are they interested, nor can they have any objection to the passage of this bill. On the contrary, as they are now the owners of land in severalty, they will be largely benefited by the increased prosperity which will follow its enactment into law.

It may be said that this bill provides for a special donation to the Territory of Oklahoma. This is not a correct statement of the case. In many instances, from the foundation of the Government, Congress has made a free distribution of the public lands in large quantities to the people and to the States and Territories. At first land was given as compensation for military service. This was done by Virginia as early as 1776. Then it was granted to aid in the construction of wagon roads, canals, railroads, and internal improvements designed to open up the new sections of our country. This was followed by the passage of the homestead law of 1862, based upon the principle that by residing upon and cultivating the land for five years and that by sacrifice and labor adding to its value and to the national wealth full compensation is rendered by the individual settler to the body politic.

No greater act of justice and no policy better adapted to conserve the welfare and increase the prosperity of the great body of the people was ever enacted into law by the Congress of the United States. As an incentive to the development of the vast and varied resources of our common country, the material results of this policy have been enormous. In a little more than a quarter of a century ten States have been added to the Federal Union, and the homeseeker has led the march of empire into all the unknown regions of our great domain.

I have here a statement showing that the assessed valuation of States and Territories in which homestead entries were made increased in the decade from 1880 to 1890 from $7,826,373,028 to $10,582,771,261, being an advance of $2,756,398,233.

Unlike the condition of affairs in the older and manufacturing States of the East, this great increase of wealth in the public-land States shows a marvelous evolution from natural resources, made possible by the liberality of the original homestead policy.

Mr. Speaker, in passing this bill you only treat Oklahoma in a more or less degree as the people of the States have been treated in the past. On the 23d of June, 1836, during the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, an act was passed providing for the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands among the several States. This sum was then in the Treasury, amounting to $28,101,644.91, and under the terms of the act was distributed as follows:

Valuation from census of 1890.

State.	Value.	State.	Value.
Maine	$955,838.25	Maryland	$955,838.25
New Hampshire	669,086.79	Virginia	2,198,427.99
Vermont	669,086.79	North Carolina	1,433,757.39
Massachusetts	1,338,173.58	South Carolina	1,051,422.09
Connecticut	764,670.60	Georgia	1,051,422.09

Illinois	477,919.14	Arkansas	286,751.49
Michigan	286,751.49
Delaware	286,751.49	Total	28,101,644.91

The Senate Committee on Public Lands of the third session of the Fifty-third Congress, in Report No. 1043, in speaking of this subject, used the following language:

No part of it has ever been returned to the United States and never will be. The interests upon these several amounts, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the date of distribution to the present, would aggregate an enormous sum of money, and undoubtedly the States receiving the benefits of this distribution would regard it as a great hardship and injustice if they were now called upon to pay this debt or return the money with reasonable interest to the Government. As a matter of course, the repayment of the money will never occur, and it was never intended that it should.

Sir, when I recall this history of our public-land legislation, and the great liberality that has been practiced by Congress to all the States, I do not feel that I am asking too much for the constituency I have the honor to represent upon this floor. I will add, in passing, that in addition to the $28,101,644.91 distributed to the States mentioned, the sum of $9,292,453.89 has been paid to the States of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Indiana, Iowa, Illinois, Ohio, Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin, as 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of public and Indian lands, making a grand total of $37,394,098.80. I appreciate fully the unanimity with which this bill is supported on both sides of the House, and I am confident that its passage will be fully vindicated, not only by the experience of the past, but by the reestablishment of the homestead policy in reality as well asin name.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FLYNN. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Has the bill any effect on town sites, or does it relate exclusively to farming lands?

Mr. FLYNN. I am glad that the gentleman asked that question. It affects nothing whatever but farming lands. It is only the settlers who are most interested in the passage of this bill. They are mostly very poor. They are intelligent and honest, but their crops have failed and they are powerless to help themselves so far as paying for the land they occupy.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman permit another question? Is it not a fact that this Government has given to public corporations out of its domain much more land than is involved here, and would it not be equally as just to give it to its citizens for their homes?

Mr. FLYNN. I answer I think it would. But these grants were made before Oklahoma was opened. I will say that Congress has been fair to us in protecting the public-school system. The conditions in Oklahoma are different from what they are and were with reference to any other public lands opened to settlement. Great areas of land were settled in a single day in Oklahoma. The crack of a gun on a line of a certain reservation was the signal for thousands of people to flock onto the lands. They were represented to them as lands more fertile than those that Adam occupied in the Garden of Eden.

The truth is, the best lands in the valleys and along the waterways were taken up by the Indian allotments before the reservations were open to settlement. Some time in the future, when the Government shall provide for a system of irrigation, the lands reserved for settlement may be made more available for agricultural purposes than they now are. And I desire to express the hope that the time is not far distant when some practicable system of irrigation will be devised which will result in utilizing the fertile lands locacted in the semiarid sections of the country.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma how this bill may affect the land in Greer County, Tex., since the Supreme Court has this morning decided that Greer County is a part of the public domain—a part of Oklahoma?

Mr. FLYNN. If that decision has been made, and if Congress takes no further action, settlers in that county will be entitled to 160 acres of land without the payment of a dollar except the office fees.

Mr. CULBERSON. The gentleman understands the situation——

Mr. FLYNN. I understand that the the lands in Greer County have been mostly sold by the State of Texas to those settlers, and in my judgment Congress will have to enact new legislation for their protection. Under existing laws a settler on those lands would be entitled to only 160 acres.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, this bill has been sprung upon us, and the decision of the Supreme Court has also come very suddenly, and I will ask the gentleman if he is willing to accept the amendment which I send to the desk, and which I do not think will affect his bill at all, while it may save us a good deal of trouble?

Mr. FLYNN. I will hear the amendment.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of section 1 add the following:

"Provided, That the public-land laws of the United States are hereby suspended until further legislation by Congress, in so far as they may affect the territory hitherto known as Greer County, Tex."

Mr. FLYNN. I have no objection whatever to that amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then we have no objection to your bill.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Oklahoma to this point: It seems to me that that amendment is very sweeping. I think it would be proper enough to except Greer County from the operation of this bill——

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all the amendment does.

Mr. BLUE. I think not. I think it exempts Greer County from the operation of all the public-land laws. If you desire to exempt it from the operation of this bill, I think that is right enough, but if you propose to exempt it entirely from the public-land laws, that is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. FLYNN (to Mr. CULBERSON). Is not the only object of this amendment to get time to prepare the necessary legislation to protect those settlers?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLYNN. Then I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken more time than I intended in urging the passage of this bill. It is of transcendent importance to the people of Oklahoma. The future welfare of thousands of families depends upon the relief it affords. As I have said before, they have gone there to repair their shattered fortunes. With the relief which this bill gives they will emerge from the adverse conditions by which they are now surrounded, and will do their part faithfully and well in founding the institutions and developing the resources of the new State of Oklahoma.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands I reserved the right to oppose it if upon investigation I should come to the conclusion that it ought not to pass. Letters and petitions from Oklahoma have convinced me that the bill ought to pass, and I shall give it my support. The complications growing out of the Greer County decision made by the Supreme Court to-day make it not only important that the principle of giving free homesteads in Oklahoma Territory should be adopted, but the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] also ought to be adopted, so that the actual residents upon the lands in Greer County—where some of them have been living for twenty-five or thirty or even forty years, where they have established their homes and reared their families—may have an opportunity to secure a legal preference right as against nonresidents and outsiders.

The House may not fully understand the great danger to which these people are subjected at this time by reason of this decision. Notwithstanding the fact that the settlers in Greer County may have purchased from the State of Texas their homes and improvements and may have resided there for thirty or forty years, no preference is given them under existing land laws if some boomers can beat them to the Land Office and enter the lands first.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] was wrong in saying that they would be entitled to 160 acres each.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman from Oklahoma, I assume, only meant to say that every citizen who was entitled to make an entry under the homestead law would have the right to file on 160 acres of land, but unless this resolution or something like it is adopted they are in danger of being "entered out," to use a Western phrase, by persons who have no just claim whatever to those lands in Greer County and now held by the court to be public lands. It is important to see that the purchasers from the State of Texas and actual settlers should be fully protected by giving them a preference over all others.

Mr. Speaker, the valuation fixed upon all the lands in Oklahoma as now constituted, including the Cherokee Strip, would aggregate $15,058,462. Just exactly how much of the lands have been entered the Land Office is unable to say. Nor is the Department able to inform us how much has been paid on the lands which have been entered. The gentleman from Oklahoma has approximated it. He thinks it is about $3,000,000.

There are no official data that I have been able to obtain on that point. The commutation feature of the homestead law has been extended to that Territory, and I am informed that most of the men who are able to commute their homesteads and pay the Government price have already done so or will do so. The information coming to me is to the effect that the class of people who now inhabit these lands, which before they entered them they supposed to be very rich and valuable, have been disappointed in that expectation, and it is now a hard struggle for them to support their families and pay local taxes. They now realize that they could have obtained better lands in organized States and Territories under the homestead law without being required to purchase them.

Blizzard after blizzard, one trouble after another, short crops last year and the year before, have made it utterly impossible, it is said, for many of these deserving people to pay out their lands. So that, after all, the question now is whether we shall enforce the law against these settlers and drive them off on account of their inability to pay and allow others with more money to take up the lands or whether we will remit to them the unpaid portion of the agreed price.

This question involves, so far as the contracts are concerned, the right to a considerable amount of money due for such lands; but if the statements as to the condition of the debtors are true, and I believe them, then I undertake to say that this Government is too magnanimous to drive from their homes these poor people, who have entered in good faith and are willing to attest that good faith by actual residence for at least five years, because they can not pay the purchase money. I rather think we should revive the hopes of these settlers by releasing all claims for unpaid purchase money.

If these lands were to go to the original boomers and sooners who got possession of them under the disgraceful and unjust methods under which they were opened, there would be, in my judgment, very strong reason why this bill should not pass. But the professional land jumpers and those who were allowed special privileges under the laws and regulations then prevailing, and by which they first got upon the lands, held them only long enough to find some honest settlers who would buy their claims. Many of those now on the lands have been forced to spend all they have in defending against fraudulent contests or to purchase the claims of professional land jumpers. The many relinquishments and new entries show that much of this was done. I am told, and I believe it is true, that a large majority—perhaps nine-tenths—of the persons who occupy those lands now are honest, bona fide settlers desiring to acquire homes for actual residence and not speculation. So I think the bill ought to pass; and if passed, it certainly ought to carry with it the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. These lands are now held by virtue of purchase from the Government under the act opening Oklahoma to settlement, are they not?

Mr. McRAE. Under that act it was provided that those qualified to make entry under the homestead law might enter these lands by paying, in addition to the usual land-office fees, the price fixed by the Government for the alleged purpose of reimbursing it for the money paid to the Indians for their title.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. These people hold under purchase from the Government at the price of $1.25 an acre?

Mr. McRAE. Well, the price is not uniform; it is all the way from $1 to $2.50 an acre, I think. It depends upon the quality and location of the land. In the arid region, where I believe no considerable quantity of the lands has been entered, I think the price fixed was $1 or $1.25 an acre; out nearer the Indian Territory, where the land was more valuable, the price was $1.50, $2, and $2.50.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. In other words, the persons who now claim these lands hold them by purchase—not by homestead entry?

Mr. McRAE. Nobody except a person entitled to make homestead entry could acquire these lands; but in addition to complying with the terms of the homestead law as to residence and cultivation, the settlers were required to pay the Government the estimated and legal value, as I have already stated. It is both a homestead and a sale, or, in other words, they could only be sold for homesteads.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. What is the aggregate of the obligation of these people to the Government?

Mr. McRAE. That, as I have said, is impossible to state. If the lands were all sold at the price fixed, the amount would be $15,058,462. But they have not all been sold, and may never be, to persons who will reside upon them.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, keeping in view the facts just stated by my friend from Arkansas, this bill is a proposition to donate to these parties somewhere in the neighborhood of $15,000,000 by remitting to that extent their obligations to the Government upon these lands.

Mr. McRAE. It is proposed by this bill to release to such settlers as have entered the unpaid purchase money due from them, whatever the amount may be, upon the theory that they can not pay. But I believe it is true—in fact the records of the Land Office show—that all of the lands have not been entered; and some of those entered have been paid for in whole or in part. While the bill does involve a release to a class of settlers of a large amount of money due from them—I should say from three to ten million dollars—the question for us to determine is whether we will insist upon payment when it will result in the loss or incumbrance of the homes of almost all of them.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Is it just to those who have paid in full that we should now release others who have not paid? Would not justice require us, if we passed this bill, to make a refund to parties who have already paid?

Mr. McRAE. Those who have paid might complain, but there is no proposition to refund any money, and I hardly think there will ever be any refunded. We can not expect to do exact justice to all, but we must not, if we can avoid it, do manifest wrong to the poor fellows who can not pay because some have paid. If you test it by the contractual rights existing between these settlers and the Government, of course they are entitled to nothing unless they pay. But we are proceeding upon the theory that many of them can not pay for the lands. The Government will not allow them to sell or mortgage. What are they to do? The declared policy of the Government is to hold its lands for those who will reside upon them. These brave, honest settlers have met that requirement fully.

They have built their homes upon the lands and are cultivating them in spite of all the unfavorable conditions. Are we to take the lands away from them and give them to others who have money? My feelings go out for these homeless, moneyless men, and I submit that it is better to say to them, that as they have made homes and improvements upon, cultivated and now live upon the lands, that they may retain them under the homestead law free from all payment. We can not afford to have this class of people feel that we have given others the benefit of their labor. Others will go on the lands if you drive these people off, and they will get the benefit of all the work that has been done by the people you make move. Looking at it from the standpoint of public policy, and believing that the present settlers have acquired an equity in the lands by reason of residence, I am unwilling to insist upon the payment of the money when I believe it can not be made. It is a mere gratuity, I confess, but still looking at the question from all sides it seems to me that the best way to deal with it is to say to them that no more payments shall be required. The Territory is weak and poor and the taxes high. Let us grant the farmers this relief and in some measure aid them in the struggle of life.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Let me ask the gentleman if it has been the policy of the Government hitherto, when lands are held of this sort, to release the claims of the Government against the residents thereon?

Mr. McRAE. This is about our first experience with settlers upon lands acquired from the Indians and sold under the homestead law, but as a matter of fact we have extended the payments for these parties on two different occasions for the same reason that we now propose to release.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. These lands were originally acquired by purchase, and we paid for them from the Treasury of the United States, I believe.

Mr. McRAE. Yes, sir; and in much the same way we acquired all other public lands. But we paid more for some of these Indian lands than they were worth, and much more per acre than for other lands theretofore purchased.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I believe my friend stated that the Department did not recommend the adoption of this bill?

Mr. McRAE. The Department reported against the bill. The Commissioner says: "I am of the opinion that the contract between the Government and the settlers, and that between the Government and the Indians, as embodied in the existing statutes, should be adhered to and carried out in good faith. It follows, therefore, that this bill should not be passed." From his standpoint he is right——

Mr. PICKLER. What about the lands in Iowa and farther east—much better lands—which the people got free?

Mr. McRAE (continuing). The policy on the part of the Government since the passage of the homestead law has been to open up of all the public lands, except those purchased from the Indians, to settlement under the homestead law without purchase price. When this new policy of making the settlers pay for their lands was inaugurated, it was by the Indian Committee and not the Committee on Public Lands. I have never believed in it. I made several unsuccessful efforts to get certain military reservations opened free to our homestead settlers. Finally the change requiring payment was made and the same principle applied to both Indian and military reservations as the only way to get settlers upon such lands, but no one ever supposed that any of them would lose their lands on account of their inability to pay the price fixed. Mr. Speaker, time has demonstrated that those of us who favored the policy of opening them to settlement without payment were right.

The proposition involves a large amount of money to the settlers. There are hundreds and thousands of acres which the settlers must abandon if this legislation is not adopted, and the Government will get nothing unless another sale is made. I will admit for the sake of the argument that the Government can easily find men with money who will pay for the land. If you want to sell the public lands you can do so. The question is, Will you enforce the strict letter of their contracts for the money involved in them? There is no man here who is familiar with the conditions in Oklahoma who will insist upon such a policy.

These people come here and say to us, "We owe for the lands, but can not pay for them," and I am convinced that very few of the settlers are able to meet the other demands upon them for school and other taxes, to say nothing of paying for their homesteads.

So I hope that this bill will pass, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will be incorporated in it, because I know from the experience in Oklahoma and the Cherokee Strip the amount of trouble that will result to the people of Greer County unless some relief is afforded to them by legislation. The public land laws should be suspended until proper legislation can be enacted for them.

Mr. MILES. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Do I understand you to state that the amount of money involved in this transaction to the Government and which will be surrendered by the operation of this bill is something over $15,000,000?

Mr. McRAE. The exact amount, I will state to the gentleman, is $15,058,462, if the lands should all be sold at the present price.

Mr. MILES. Then the lands have not all been sold?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. There is quite an amount that has been sold and paid for.

Mr. McRAE. But the bill does not involve the refund of any money paid, and what have been sold should be deducted from the sum I mentioned.

I will insert for the information of the House a table furnished me by the Department, which may be of some value to members in connection with the subject of the value of the different lands in Oklahoma Territory.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Government paid, I believe, about $8,614,000 for these lands?

Mr. McRAE. I am not certain of the amount paid for it. But, as I have stated, the Government paid more for the lands than they were worth, if we consider it from the standpoint of dollars and cents.

Mr. MILES. If the Government paid eight million and some hundred thousand for the lands, how do you get the claim of the Government now up to fifteen millions?

Mr. McRAE. The lands were valued at so much per acre to the settlers, and this is the valuation which reaches over fifteen millions. I am certain as to this, but not as to the cost of it.

Mr. MILES. That is to say, the Government sold at a higher price than it paid for the land?

Mr. McRAE. Exactly.

The table to which I refer is as follows:

Reservation.	Area ceded, exclusive of allotted and reserved.	Price to be paid by settlers.	Amount that will be received from settlers under existing law.	Amount now paid.	Loss to United States if settlers are relieved from payment.

Mr. MILES. How much has been paid?

Mr. McRAE. I do not know; the gentleman from Oklahoma can perhaps state.

Mr. MILES. How much has been paid for these lands by these settlers who have not paid in full?

Mr. FLYNN. A little over $3,000,000; and let me say further, with the permission of the gentleman from Arkansas, that this bill authorizes any person residing upon these lands, who can do it, to pay out, after residing on them twelve months; and that there are millions of acres of land charged to the settlers at from a dollar to two dollars and a half an acre that no Indian or white man will ever take.

Mr. McRAE. Right here I will read all the information I have from the Department on that point.

It is not practicable—

Says the Commissioner—

without an extended search of the records to give the amount already paid by homestead settlers for these lands, as the moneys received therefor are not kept separate from the sales of other lands.

As these lands have not been open to settlers for five years, very few have been able to make final proof thereon, and it is doubtful if many have availed themselves of the privilege of commutation. It is certain that the amount already paid by the settlers is so small as to form a very small proportion to the amount still due.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the House seems disposed to pass this bill, but at the same time I think all the facts ought to be fully stated. Perhaps they have been stated with sufficient fullness already, but I will consume a little further time upon this bill, lest there might be criticism upon the passage of so important a measure without due and sufficient consideration.

The House, Mr. Speaker, is aware of the fact that there are upon the Calendar two bills; the Oklahoma free-home bill, which we are now considering under a resolution passed under suspension of the rules, and a general free-home bill, which has been reported by the committee, covering other lands in other States and Territories similarly situated. As for myself, I favor the passage of this special bill. I also favor the passage of the general bill, and I would vote for the passage of any special and particular bill applying to any one of the reservations situated similarly to these in the Territory of Oklahoma.

Originally the homestead law was something of a political question. That has disappeared. There were doubts upon the part of many as to whether the homestead law would work successfully or not. The first homestead bill that passed Congress was vetoed by Mr. Buchanan; but experience has taught us all, and I find no diversity of opinion upon the opposite sides of this Chamber as to the wisdom of the general homestead law.

I will here quote briefly from the report prepared by me on the general free-home bill:

The proposed bill does not involve any new and untried principle of legislation, but is only a return to the homestead law in its original form and purpose.

It will be proper to review briefly in this connection the history of the homestead act, which, after some years of discussion, finally became a part of the laws and marked a new epoch in the country's history when it finally became a law, May 27, 1862.

In 1852 the Free-Soil Democracy, in their platform at Pittsburg, declared the public lands to be a "sacred trust," and that they "should be granted in limited quantities free of cost to landless settlers."

In 1852 and until its final passage Hon. GALUSHA A. GROW, now again a member of this House, appeared as the champion of this great change in the land policy of the nation. A bill was lost January 20, 1859, in the House, by a vote of 91 to 95.

On February 1, 1859, a homestead bill passed the House by a vote of 120 to 76. February 17, 1859, it was taken up in the Senate by a vote of 26 to 23.

Mr. Slidell antagonized the bill in the Senate, and called up the bill for the purchase of Cuba in its stead.

The proposal to open free homes to the landless on the public domain gave way to a proposition to strengthen slavery by the purchase of more territory already fully occupied with slave labor. On a previous motion to postpone the consideration of the homestead bill the vote stood 28 to 28, and Vice-President Breckinridge gave the casting vote against the bill.

The bill was lost, but the agitation in its favor largely influenced subsequent political events.

March 6, 1860, Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, reported the Grow homestead bill favorably. March 12, 1860, it passed the House by a vote of 115 to 65.

In the Senate Mr. Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, reported a substitute requiring homestead settlers to buy their land at 25 cents an acre at the end of five years' settlement. Senator Ben Wade moved to amend by substituting the House bill. The motion was lost by a vote of 31 to 26. May 10, 1860, the Senate passed Senator Johnson's substitute by a vote of 44 to 8.

The House refused to concur, and a conference was ordered, and the conference committee, after twelve meetings, accepted the Senate substitute. As expressed by Mr. GROW, it was "a half loaf."

The conference report was adopted by a vote of 115 to 51 in the House, and 36 to 2 in the Senate. Mr. Colfax stated that the proposed cost of 25 cents an acre to the homesteader was equal to the average cost of the land to the Government.

Mr. Colfax and Mr. Windom announced that this bill was only the first onward step in the line of a new policy. But on June 23, 1860, James Buchanan, President of the United States, vetoed the bill, and it failed to pass over his veto, the vote in the Senate being 28 yeas and 18 nays, 8 votes less than a two-thirds majority.

Mr. Buchanan declared the bill to be unconstitutional. He said that 25 cents an acre was a mere nominal price, and that it was equivalent to giving the land away. He declared that Congress had no power to grant free homes on the public domain, or to grant land for use in the education of the people.

The land, he said, was like money in the Treasury, and was a sacred fund that could only be disposed of by being sold for cash or for land warrants. The Louisiana purchase was paid for out of the National Treasury and Congress had no more power to give it away than they would have had to give the money away that had been paid to Napoleon for its purchase. The proceeds of land sales he looked upon as a source of revenue long to be enjoyed by the nation.

He did not recognize the benefits that might result to the people at large by the transfer of an uninhabited wilderness into a populous and prosperous commonwealth.

The benefits to the old States by the addition of new taxpayers to the population did not seem to be appreciated by the President. The President did not realize that in this new homestead policy lay a germ of national growth of untold value, in which the old States would share the wealth to be added by the new members of the National Confederation.

The idea that an uninhabited public domain was a sacred trust which should be kept as a solitude until it could be sold for cash seems to have fully entered the mind of the Executive.

He was willing and desirous of paying $100,000,000 out of the funds in the Treasury for the purchase of Cuba, which would add new power to the cause of slavery, and he might well understand that a different result would follow the building up of new States in the West under a system of free homes.

When Hannibal was besieging Rome his camp near the city was sold at public sale in the forum, and in the darkest hours of 1861 and 1862 the homestead bill was considered almost within the sound of hostile guns.

Mr. Aldrich introduced the bill July 8, 1861, and it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

December 4, 1861, Mr. Lovejoy reported it favorably.

It was again referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On February 28, 1862, it passed the House by a vote of 107 to 16.

March 25, 1862, Senator Harlan reported it favorably in the Senate, with amendments, and it passed as amended May 5, 1862, by a vote of 33 to 7.

The two Houses agreed upon a conference, and on May 27, 1862, after the details were finally agreed upon, Mr. Lincoln added another chapter to the great history of his life by approving the bill.

From that until the present the general policy of the homestead law has been accepted without question. Occasional amendments and modifications have been made, but the bill in its substance has been unchanged.

There have been purchased from various countries, including the cession from the State of Georgia, very large areas of land. The Louisiana purchase cost 3⅘ cents per acre.

The purchase from Spain, in 1819, cost 17.1 cents per acre. In 1848 the Mexican purchase cost 4½ cents per acre. The Gadsden purchase of 1853 cost 34.3 cents per acre. Alaska cost 1.19 cents per acre. The Georgia cession cost 10.1 cents per acre. The average cost of these entire purchases amounted to 4.7 cents per acre.

The total amount expended in the purchase of lands up to 1880, the time when the last full report was made upon this subject, was $88,157,389.98. Sales have been made from this land, and expenditures incurred in surveys and in the distribution and management of the public lands. The actual net cost, up to 1880, of all the public lands, after deducting what had been received from the same, was $121,346,746.85, which includes balance of expense of administration. The net cost, therefore, per acre is 17⅞ cents.

The census of 1890 shows that these different purchases have been included in States and Territories, and that the assessed valuation of real and personal estate situated within the States and Territories thus purchased amounted to $23,583,339,104, and upon this magnificent domain electoral votes in the next electoral college will be cast to the number of 158, or a trifle more than one-third of the entire electoral vote of the Union. So that the public-land policy and the purchases in the United States have been greatly to the benefit of this country.

The following is a statement of the same by States and Territories:

In 1862 the homestead policy was first inaugurated by the enactment of the original law. It has been followed from that time until some of these recent purchases from the Indians.

It is claimed by the Secretary of the Interior that this bill ought not to pass, because the loss to the Government would amount to $15,058,462. But this estimate is a very excessive one. It includes all the land, good, bad, and indifferent, at the full price provided by law and not at its cost to the United States; it makes no reservation of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections; it takes no account of town sites nor of the allotments in severalty to the Indians, nor of the worthless land which is to-day unsold and may remain unsettled for many years; and the report of the Secretary shows that there is to-day still remaining unsold in that territory 7,073,901 acres, so that this $15,058,462 is a gross overestimate.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that these men were anxious to enter their homesteads under the existing laws, but we know full well that men without lands looking into the public domain always overestimate the desirability of the land which they are about to purchase and the advantages which will accrue to them by reason of settling in a new country.

I have here a list showing also the cash commutations in the past, and it is fair to infer that the commutations of homesteads will be as large in the future as they have been heretofore, and in the estimate made by the Secretary of the Interior he makes no allowance for the probabilities or absolute certainties of commutations that will be thus made, and does not take into consideration commutations that have been made under that act in the past in Oklahoma.

The Commissioner of the Land Office, at my request, has furnished a statement of commutations from 1881 to 1895, inclusive, which I will insert in my remarks.

It was not practicable to go back of 1881 because of the manner in which the records had been kept, as the other cash entries and homestead entries were all kept together:

Statement of the number and area of final homesteads from May 20, 1862, to June 30, 1895.

Year.	Number.	Acres.	Year.	Number.	Acres.
1862–1881	177,314	21,193,368.82	1890	28,080	4,060,592.77

1889	25,549	3,681,708.80

Statement of the number of commuted homesteads under section 2301, Revised Statutes, and second section act June 15, 1880.

Year.	Number.	Year.	Number.
1881	5,867	1890	6,107
1882	7,498	1891	3,945
1883	8,411	1892	2,925
1884	9,623	1893	3,186
1885	7,633	1894	2,333
1886	5,887	1895	2,311
1887	10,522

From this list I find that from 1881 to 1895, inclusive, there were 488,837 homestead entries made in the aggregate, comprising 64,828,208.97 acres. Of those entries there have been commutations to the amount of 100,610, making about one in five actually commuted in the past; and I understand that a full report from the Territory of Oklahoma will show larger commutations there than the average in the past in the country at large.

These men have entered upon the border lands of the arid region. Much of Oklahoma reaches beyond the safe and reliable line where rainfall is ample to raise a crop each year; and many of these settlers are in destitution.

From the reports we have received, Mr. Speaker, the probability is as to that region that a very large number, perhaps two-fifths or more, of these homesteaders will be compelled to relinquish their claims or be compelled to sell them to somebody in order to realize something by the sale of their improvements; and if unable to do this, they will be compelled to make commutation by borrowing the money to pay the debt to the United States, and then we would have a large area, practically the entire country, covered to almost, if not entirely, its full value by mortgages. These men in opening this country to settlement and creating a new commonwealth to be soon added to the sisterhood of States have gone through many hardships; and there is no reason why they should be made an exception to the rule which has existed since 1862, for thirty-four years, giving to settlers on the public lands permission to obtain their title by occupation and improvement in five years.

It makes no difference in principle what the land has cost the Government. The State of Iowa, that magnificent domain, perhaps the most fertile of any on the face of the earth, originally only cost the Government of the United States 3¾ cents an acre. Large bodies of that land was settled under the homestead laws twenty-five or thirty years ago which are now worth $35 to $50 per acre. Settlers there have gone through at least two grasshopper periods, through Indian scares, and the Spirit Lake massacre and all the other dangers and hardships that men undergo in all the early settlements, and to-day that land is in the highest cultivation and very valuable. But the settlers of every new country are compelled to pass through these hard experiences, and Oklahoma has been by no means an exception to the rule. It is true that Oklahoma cost more per acre in its purchase from the Indians than some other lands.

The highest cost price, I think, of any of the public domain in the United States purchased from any foreign Government is that which was purchased under the Gadsden treaty, and in the tarrantula Territory of Arizona, bordering on Mexico, it cost 34 cents an acre. In Oklahoma, however, the land cost more than that. But there is no reason why the man who takes a homestead under the Gadsden purchase should be better treated than the man who entered under the Oklahoma purchase, simply because the cost of Oklahoma was higher than the Gadsden purchase. Much of the land in Kansas and Nebraska was obtained by purchase from the Indians and opened up to homestead entry. In the Eastern States the Indians were moved by wars, and expensive wars at that. It was found cheaper to buy them off than to fight them. It is cheaper and better, as well as more humane, to furnish them with support than to kill them off. By our homestead system vast tracts have been opened to settlement and great strength has been given to the Government of the United States. In short, this policy has built up the West; it has settled the country west of the Missouri River, even into the arid belt beyond the one hundredth meridian, and many of the settlers in this region have gone into the arid land and are in suffering and want.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without abating one jot my faith in a general free-home bill, which I hope this Congress will pass before it adjourns, I am in favor of the passage of this bill or any separate bill for any one of these reservations that have been made subject to homestead entry; and I think that the homestead law is violated in spirit by requiring the homestead settler to buy the land after he has been compelled to comply with all the requirements of the old law. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, it is scarcely necessary for me to take any of the time of the House in support of the provisions of this bill. This bill simply carries out, in the interest of the settlers of Oklahoma, the true policy of the Government in the matter of homesteads. I do not wish to make a partisan speech or make any partisan reference. The policy of free homesteads to actual settlers is the policy now of the United States Government, and is the policy of the people of the country regardless of party. It has grown up to be essentially an American doctrine. The lands affected by this bill are lands that it is said cost the Government a larger sum of money than the public lands on an average; but that has never been a consideration with the Government in the matter of the granting of homesteads to actual settlers.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House have said something about the grants made by the Government in that same Territory to railroad lines. I am one of those who believe that no wiser act has ever been done by our Government than the giving to the railroads in that part of the country what are called land grants. I am not here to discuss the question of the abuses of the generosity of the Government, but here is a region rapidly becoming an important portion of the United States, filled with a most enterprising population, which, under existing law, would be put at a disadvantage as against the ordinary system and policy to the extent of a large number of millions of dollars. Now, I believe that the Government itself, the aggregation of the people of this whole country, will be better off, will be richer, five years from to-day by reason of the passage of this bill than if we exacted the price of these lands from actual settlers. Any other policy than this would destroy the hope of acquiring homes on the part of a great many of the people of that Territory; so I trust that the bill will be passed without further contention.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LACEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREE DELIVERY IN TOWNS AND VILLAGES.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5473) concerning delivery of letters in towns, villages, and other places where no free delivery exists.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever not less than 20 persons who receive their mail matter through the same post-office shall petition the postmaster at such office to appoint one or more letter carriers, who shall be at least 16 years of age, for the delivery of letters and other mail matter therefrom to the persons addressed, at their respective residences or places of business, and for the collection of letters and the conveyance and delivery of them to the post-office, said postmaster shall appoint a suitable number of letter carriers for that purpose, and it shall be their duty to report at least once a week to the postmaster appointing them the number of pieces delivered and collected by them and amount paid therefor.

SEC. 2. That at all places where the foregoing delivery and collections may be authorized under this act the letter carriers thus appointed may receive of the person to whom he delivers letters or papers, or from whom he receives them for conveyance to the post-office, such weekly, monthly, or quarterly compensation as may be mutually agreed upon; and when no such agreement is made, they may demand and receive not exceeding 1 cent for each letter or other package which they deliver from or convey to the post-office: Provided, That the sum which each carrier thus collects shall be in full for his services; and none of such carriers shall have any claim upon the Post-Office Department for compensation for services rendered as a letter carrier: Provided further, That no letter or other mail matter shall be given to such letter carrier for delivery unless addressed to a person who has lodged at the post-office a written request that his mail matter be delivered to such letter carrier: And provided further, That if any person who shall have filed such written request shall refuse or neglect to pay the amount agreed upon or fixed by this act for the delivery or collection of any mail matter the same may be returned by the carrier to the post-office and thereafter the carrier shall not be required to deliver or collect any mail to or from such person. Each person so appointed shall give bond to the postmaster for the faithful performance of his duties in the penal sum of $100.

SEC. 3. That the letter carriers appointed by authority of this act shall be subject to all the provisions of existing laws not inconsistent with this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. KYLE. I will ask, Mr. Speaker, what committee reports this bill?

Mr. SPERRY. It is reported unanimously by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question or two. I will premise by saying that I am in favor of extending the free-delivery system to the rural districts, but, after listening to the reading of the bill, it seems to me that it is a case of keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. If I understand the bill correctly, it does not provide that the Government of the United States shall be responsible for any of the letter carriers who shall deliver the mails in the rural districts, and I understand that if no provision is made by the persons living in the neighborhood the mail carrier is to receive only 1 cent per letter.

Of course that will not be sufficient compensation to secure the services of any persons competent to perform this labor properly, and I do not understand that the provisions of the bill in this respect are very different from the law which exists to-day, and which permits any one person in a neighborhood, if he choose, to collect the mail for the entire neighborhood and deliver it. Now, if we are going to do anything in this line for the farming community, it seems to me that we ought to have something in the bill which will provide in an affirmative way for the appointment of these mail carriers or mail deliverers; give them an ample salary, and arrange the matter so that the people living miles away from the little commercial centers scattered through the country will get the full benefit of this legislation without having to join together and themselves pay the persons who deliver their mails. I think that if we are going to do anything for the farmers of this country in this respect, we ought to provide that Uncle Sam, out of his ample revenues, shall pay the salaries of these delivery men precisely as he does in our large cities, and wherever the free-delivery system exists.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the word "ample" in connection with our revenues.

Mr. HOPKINS. In the city of Chicago and in other places where the free-delivery system exists, the person who gets the benefit of it is not required to pay anything out of his own pocket to the person who delivers him his mail. The mail carrier is an agent of the United States and looks to the United States for his compensation. But in the bill here presented, if I understand it correctly, if the people living out in the country are to receive any benefit whatever from this legislation, they must join in an agreement with the mail carrier to pay him sufficient compensation for his services. Therefore, I repeat that this seems to me to be keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope, so far as the farmers of this country are concerned.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, I understand that unanimous consent has not yet been given for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. KYLE. Well, I would like the gentleman to withhold the bill for the present. I do not want to object, but I understand that the Post-Office Department is opposed to this bill, and the measure is a very important one, which some of us have not had an opportunity to examine. I am a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, from which this bill is reported, but I have not examined the matter, although the gentleman says the bill has been unanimously reported, and I would like an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether the Postmaster-General has been called upon for an opinion concerning the desirability for this legislation?

Mr. SPERRY. The Postmaster-General was called upon, and he said he sympathized very strongly with the purpose of the bill, but he thought there might be some objections to it. Still, he certainly said he sympathized strongly with the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. His sympathies have not taken the form of a recommendation.

Mr. LOUD. This bill was not submitted to the Postmaster-General until after it had been recommended by the committee. When it was submitted to the Postmaster-General, he strongly dissented, I think, from the propriety of the measure; I have been trying to find his letter. It ought to be presented to the House, if we are going to consider this matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. The opposition of the Post-Office Department might, under certain conditions, be an argument in favor of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But in that case we would hardly allow it to pass by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPERRY. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] was certainly present when this bill was considered in committee. I trust he will allow the matter to come before the House. Do I understand him to object?

Mr. KYLE. There is so much confusion that I can not hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. SPERRY. I ask the gentleman whether he will not allow the consideration of the bill to proceed without objection?

Mr. KYLE. I shall have to object.

Mr. SPERRY. Then I move to suspend the rules and take up the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I believe there has been no recognition of the gentleman for that purpose. The Chair will allow me to suggest, deferentially, that, according to the uniform ruling, recognition for the purpose of asking unanimous consent does not carry with it recognition for the purpose of moving a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] for the purpose of moving a suspension of the rules, but only to make the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SPERRY. What is the ruling of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The request for unanimous consent is objected to.

Mr. SPERRY. Can I not move to take up the bill under a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE].

CIRCULATION OF LIGHT-WEIGHT COIN.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5732) to amend section 5459 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing the punishment for mutilating United States coins and for uttering or passing or attempting to utter or pass such mutilated coins.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5459 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended, so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5459. Every person who fraudulently, by any art, way, or means, defaces, mutilates, impairs, diminishes, falsifies, scales, or lightens, or causes or procures to be fraudulently defaced, mutilated, impaired, diminished, falsified, scaled, or lightened, or willingly aids or assists in fraudulently defacing, mutilating, impairing, diminishing, falsifying, scaling, or lightening the gold or silver coins which have been, or which may hereafter be, coined at the mints of the United States, or any foreign gold or silver coins which are by law made current or are in actual use or circulation as money within the United States, or who passes, utters, publishes, or sells, or attempts to pass, utter, publish, or sell, or bring into the United States from any foreign place, knowing the same to be defaced, mutilated, impaired, diminished, falsified, scaled, or lightened, with intent to defraud any person whatsoever, or has in his possession any such defaced, mutilated, impaired, diminished, falsified, scaled, or lightened coin, knowing the same to be defaced, mutilated, impaired, diminished, falsified, scaled, or lightened, with intent to defraud any person whatsoever, shall be imprisoned not more than five years and fined not more than $2,000."

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

There was no objection; and the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I ask now that the report, which is brief, may be read.

The report (by Mr. CHARLES W. STONE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5732) to amend section 5459 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing the punishment for mutilating United States coins and for uttering or passing or attempting to utter or pass such mutilated coins, having considered the same, respectfully recommend that it do pass.

Section 5459 of the Revised Statutes provides for the punishment of the offense of fraudulently mutilating or lightening the gold or silver coins of the United States, but by some oversight or for some other unaccountable reason no provision is made for the punishment of the knowingly and fraudulently uttering or passing or attempting to utter or pass such mutilated or lightened coins. To supply this defect in the existing law is the primary purpose of the present bill, but in restating the section it has been deemed advisable to make it correspond in phraseology, as near as may be, with the other sections relating to counterfeiting coin of the United States, and it has also been deemed advisable to make the maximum limit of imprisonment imposed as punishment correspond more nearly with the maximum punishment provided by law for other species of counterfeiting the national coin and uttering such counterfeited coin. The defect in the existing law and the necessity for the proposed legislation are pointed out by the Chief of the Secret Service Bureau of the Treasury Department in his annual report for 1894, an extract from which is appended hereto.

On February 1, 1894, I found the banking interests deeply concerned over the great number of light-weight gold coins in circulation.

These coins had been impaired by a new and ingenious method, namely: The milled or corrugated rim of the coin had been removed, decreasing its value about 5 per cent; new milling was then put on, and the coin, to all appearances, made perfect. I immediately put agents to work, with the result that all of the guilty persons are now serving terms in State prisons. One man was arrested in Sioux City, Iowa, on March 19, 1894, and, after trial, was sentenced to imprisonment for eighteen months; another and his wife were subsequently arrested in Baltimore, Md., and sentenced to four years and six months, respectively, under section 5459, Revised Statutes. In both instances a lathe and complete set of tools were captured. Since these arrests were made coins lightened in the manner above described have ceased to appear.

In the prosecution of these cases I was greatly surprised to learn that there is no law to punish uttering or passing such lightened or debased coins, knowing them to be such. I therefore earnestly recommend the passage of an act making it a felony to mutilate United States coins, or to utter, pass, or attempt to pass such coins, and ask that section 5459 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"Every person who fraudulently, by any art, way, or means, defaces, mutilates, impairs, diminishes, falsifies, scales, or lightens, or causes or procures to be fraudulently defaced, mutilated, impaired, diminished, falsified, scaled, or lightened, or willingly aids or assists in fraudulently defacing, mutilating, impairing, diminishing, falsifying, scaling, or lightening the gold or silver coins which have been or which may hereafter be coined at the mints of the United States, or any foreign gold or silver coins which are by law made current or are in actual use and circulation as money within the United States, or who passes, utters, publishes, or sells, or attempts to pass, utter, publish, or sell, or bring into the United States from any foreign place, knowing the same to be defaced, mutilated, impaired, diminished, falsified, scaled, or lightened, with intent to defraud any person whatsoever, or has in his possession any such defaced, mutilated, impaired, diminished, falsified, scaled, or lightened coin, knowing the same to be defaced, mutilated, impaired, diminished, falsified, scaled, or lightened, with intent to defraud any person whatsoever, shall be imprisoned not more than five years and fined not more than $2,000."

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] permit a question?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I was not able to hear distinctly the reading of the report, and therefore I may be asking a question that the report fully answers. But from what I can gather there has come into use a new process of diminishing the weight of coins, and then, after remilling, putting them in circulation dishonestly.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The trouble is, there is now on the statute books no provision for punishing the uttering or putting into circulation of these coins that have been diminished in weight and value. The fact was brought to the attention of the Treasury Department that some persons were engaged in turning off from the edges of gold coins about 50 cents to a dollar's worth of gold, and then remilling the coins and putting them into circulation. Section 5459 of the Revised Statutes punishes diminishing the value of coin in that way, but there is no punishment now provided for putting such coin into circulation knowingly and with intention to defraud.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the bill sufficiently guard from prosecution persons into whose hands these diminished coins may fall innocently? Is the penalty confined only to those who in the first place put these coins into circulation dishonestly?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. There are four sections of the Revised Statutes which now provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the gold and silver coins of the United States and the minor coins, and also for making coins which, though not necessarily in resemblance of legal coins, are used for the purpose of money. There is also in each case provision for punishing the putting into circulation of such counterfeit coin. In drawing this bill, I have made it conform to the provisions of existing law in regard to uttering or putting into circulation counterfeit coin. If the gentleman will examine the bill he will see that its provisions are very carefully guarded. The language is that any person "who passes, utters, publishes, or sells, or attempts to pass, utter, publish, or sell," etc., "or has in his possession," etc., "knowing the same to be defaced," etc., "with intent to defraud any person whatsoever." I do not think the language could be more carefully guarded. In order that the punishment can operate there must be knowledge and fraudulent intent on the part of the person putting the coins into circulation, and when a person having the knowledge and the fraudulent intent passes such coins he ought to be punished.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Does this bill cover foreign coin?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. It covers "any foreign gold or silver coins which are by law made current or are in actual use or circulation as money within the United States."

I may say that the bill is in the form recommended by the Treasury Department to meet the oversight in the law which the recent prosecutions have made evident.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 1448) to withdraw from the Supreme Court the jurisdiction of criminal cases not capital and confer the same upon the circuit courts of appeals.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 5 of the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, as reads "in cases of conviction of a capital or otherwise infamous crime," be amended by striking out the words "or otherwise infamous," so that the same will read "in cases of conviction of a capital crime"; and that appeals or writs of error may be taken from the district courts or circuit courts to the proper circuit court of appeals in cases of conviction of an infamous crime not capital: Provided, That no case now pending in the Supreme Court or in which an appeal or writ of error shall have been taken or sued out before the passage of this act shall be hereby affected, but in all such cases the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall remain, and said Supreme Court shall proceed therein as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I demand a second. I would like to know whether this bill has been reported by any committee?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to inform my colleague on the committee that this bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now will the gentleman explain the purpose of the bill and where it comes from?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. This bill comes from the Judiciary Committee and is unanimously reported.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am a member of the committee and I never heard of it before.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The reason was that the distinguished gentleman was not present at the meeting of the committee which authorized the reporting of the bill. I had the honor to be directed to prepare the report, by the vote of those present in the committee, and did so on March 6. It has already passed the Senate and has the approval and request of the Supreme Court.

I suggest that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1448) to withdraw from the Supreme Court jurisdiction of criminal cases not capital and confer the same on the circuit courts of appeals, have considered the same, and report it to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

It is probable that the act of March 3, 1891, which established the circuit courts of appeals, inadvertently enlarged the right of appeal in criminal cases so as to include those not capital. However that may be, the practical result has been antagonistic to the general purpose of that act, as the following letter from the clerk of the Supreme Court, stating the criminal cases now pending in that court, will abundantly show:

"OFFICE CLERK SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1896.

"SIR: In compliance with your request in regard to the amount of criminal business on the docket of this court, I have to say that on the docket for 1894 there were 65 criminal cases, of which 17 were capital cases.

"Since the close of the last term and during the present term there have been docketed 28 criminal cases, of which number 16 are capital cases.

"There are now pending on the docket undisposed of, 42 criminal cases, of which 14 are capital cases.

"Very truly,
JAMES H. McKENNEY,
"Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"Hon. HENRY M. BAKER, M. C.,
"Washington, D. C."

As the act of 1891 provides a court to which appeals from the circuit courts can be taken, and generally limits the cases appealable to the Supreme Court, it is reasonable to suppose that it was not its intention to greatly enlarge appeals to that court in criminal cases. The practice under it has greatly increased the business before the Supreme Court; and, in the opinion of your committee, the personal rights involved are not of such a nature as to justify a rehearing after an appeal to the circuit courts of appeals.

Your committee adopt the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate and append it hereto.

[Senate Report No. 265, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1448) to withdraw from the Supreme Court jurisdiction in criminal cases not capital and confer the same on the circuit court of appeals, have given the same consideration, and report it to the Senate with the recommendation that it be passed.

The entire purpose and the entire effect of the bill are to transfer appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases not capital from the Supreme Court to the several circuit courts of appeals in their respective circuits, saving only jurisdiction to determine cases already at its passage pending in the former.

Until the act of March 3, 1891, creating the circuit court of appeals, the Supreme Court possessed no appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases as such. By the act of September 24, 1789, no review whatever of any sentence of the circuit courts in criminal cases was provided, and for nearly one hundred and two years that wisdom of the fathers was accepted to govern and give efficacy and vigor to the criminal procedure of the Federal courts. By the act for the establishment of the circuit courts of appeals the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was extended to convictions "of a capital or otherwise infamous crime," thus suddenly going to the other extreme. This was not the carefully digested result of committee consideration, but was effected in the debate on the floor. It disregarded rather than profited by the experience of the century. It seriously hinders one of the best purposes sought through the creation of the new tribunals. Instead of relieving the Supreme Court, so that it may bestow on the great questions assigned to it the leisurely study, unvexed by the importunity of delayed and pressing business, which is essential to their wisest resolution, no matter what the learning or ability of the judges, the act of 1891 has cast upon this bench a large and increasing class of cases never before within its range, out of keeping with the nature of its jurisdiction otherwise, and involving points which by no means require for the safety of the citizen the labors of such a court, but which may as well be left to other courts.

As cases of the Government, and as involving life or liberty, they must also be advanced for hearing under the rule, and thus the beginning of every term finds an obstructing barrier of these appeals in the forefront of the docket.

It was said in behalf of this jurisdiction that it was a greater duty to protect the life and liberty of the citizen than his property. Not disputing the proposition, no good reason can be given why the circuit courts of appeals may not fully discharge the duty. They are of equal dignity with the highest courts of the States, and are the final arbiters in the Federal system of by far the greater number of causes arising within the limits of the Constitution. Besides, until their creation this full duty was done well and sufficiently by the circuit courts without review.

This argument overlooks, also, it seems to the committee, as do all invoked to the same end, the true place and service of the Supreme Court in our system of national judicature. It is not and ought not to be regarded merely as a tribunal of justice to determine causes between litigants, but rather as the expositor of the jurisdiction, laws, and principles of our system of Government as between the Union, the States, and the people, the judicial spokesman of the nation in causes resting upon international law and the interpretation of treaties, the restraining power against invasion of the Constitution by Congress or State legislature, the overruling guide and regulator of the Federal judiciary, suppressing differences and insuring continuing stability of doctrine, the head of one of the three departments which every free government must recognize and possess.

Except for the interposition of this criminal jurisdiction, out of character, the limits of appellate authority defined in the act of 1891 are in complete harmony with this place of the Supreme Court in our Government. Section 5 of that act reads as follows:

"SEC. 5. That appeals or writs of error may be taken from the district courts or from the existing circuit courts, directed to the Supreme Court, in the following cases:

"In any case in which the jurisdiction of the court is in issue, in such cases the question of jurisdiction alone shall be certified to the Supreme Court from the court below for decision.

"From the final sentences and decrees in prize cases.

"In cases of conviction of a capital or otherwise infamous crime.

"In any case that involves the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States.

"In any case in which the constitutionality of any law of the United States or the validity or construction of any treaty made under its authority is drawn in question.

"In any case in which the constitution or law of a State is claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States.

"Nothing in this act shall affect the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases appealed from the highest court of a State nor the construction of the statute providing for review of such cases."

Contrasting this with the following section, which assigns the appellate authority in other cases to the circuit courts of appeals and by which the superintending control of the Supreme Court is preserved in every case, civil or criminal, either by certification by the circuit courts of appeals or by certiorari issued from the upper court, and the great care taken to set apart this court for service of supreme public import is made very manifest. There is nothing of personal right in any aspect, either as affecting property, life, or liberty, which enters into its jurisdiction. It is the public character of the question only which may justly invoke its judgment.

True though it be that its duty is to interpret and apply the Constitution and the law as they are, it is no less true that such a court is necessarily a lawgiver, expounding the law as it lies in and arises from most intricate and abstruse conditions, resolvable only by the lights of history and philosophy, together with the written words and unwritten doctrines which constitute our law.

To such a service free, ample argument at the bar, abundant, unvexed ease of consideration, not less than learning and wisdom, are indispensable. There is nothing in the nature of criminal causes that gives rise to questions specially worthy to engage the attention of such a court, save only when, as may sometimes happen in our system, a criminal case may involve some point of constitutional or Federal law. All such cases will remain within the jurisdiction of the court, being directly appealable for that reason; and even if they shall be first determined by the circuit court of appeals, they continue subject to the review of the Supreme Court upon certiorari.

Some of the committee think this all that need be preserved of this jurisdiction, even in capital cases. But out of deference to the sentiment which secured the enactment of the present law, and in hope sufficient relief may be gained, the bill is limited to other cases only.

Appended is a communication from the Attorney-General to the chairman of the committee, which exhibits the nature of the criminal cases not capital which have been imposed on the court since the act of 1891, and from the continuance of which only this bill will relieve it. It is highly probable the full comprehension of the term "infamous," as applied to statutory crimes, was not fully considered when it was adopted.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1896.

SIR: Your letter of yesterday, requesting me to send you a statement of the number and character of criminal cases which have been brought to the Supreme Court of the United States since the court of appeals act became a law, distinguishing between the capital and the noncapital, has had my attention. In reply I beg to say that the whole number of criminal cases taken to the Supreme Court since the passage of the act named is 123. Of these 51 are capital cases, 49 being indictments for murder and 2 for rape, leaving 72 cases less than capital.

You ask that I give the number of each class of cases noncapital, but, as you will see from the inclosed memorandum, the cases are miscellaneous in character, and can hardly be classified.

Respectfully, yours,

JUDSON HARMON,
Attorney-General.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR,
United States Senate.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Unless some gentleman wishes to be heard, or to make some inquiry in regard to the bill, I ask for a vote upon the motion.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, I want to make a statement about this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be recognized to control the twenty minutes in opposition.

Mr. CULBERSON. If I understand the bill as read from the desk, it takes away from the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction over all criminal cases less than capital. Now, for one hundred years of the life of this Government no criminal had the right to appeal from the circuit courts of the United States to the Supreme Court of the United States. After a long struggle here we provided by law that all criminals convicted in capital cases, or in felony cases punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, should have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Before that there was no appeal except from the district to the circuit courts of the United States. As the law now stands a person indicted and convicted of murder has a right to appeal his case to the Supreme Court and take the judgment of the highest court of the land on the conviction. If a person is indicted for a felony, the punishment of which is confinement in the penitentiary at hard labor, he is accorded the same right under the law. All criminals convicted of lesser offenses have the right to appeal their cases from the circuit courts to the circuit courts of appeals.

Now, if this bill passes in the form in which it is presented here there will be no criminal cases which can be appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States except in cases of conviction for capital crime, all other cases going to the courts of appeals.

I understand that the reason assigned for the enactment of this law is, that the Supreme Court is overloaded, that its docket is crowded, and that they do not want to do the work. Now, I suggest that the docket of the circuit court of appeals of the fifth district is in a far worse condition in that respect than the docket of the Supreme Court. We went to work a year or two ago and created a circuit court of appeals to relieve the Supreme Court of the burden of work then on it, and they had a right to apportion the work as it was apportioned under the law creating the circuit court of appeals. If this bill passes you put into the circuit court of appeals, now clamoring for more judges, for more help, saying that they are overloaded and can not get through with their dockets, all of these cases of felonies which are now tried in the Supreme Court; I mean all who are convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment. Is that not so?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No, sir; for it is impossible for them to reach the Supreme Court until they have passed the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that. The law provides that the appeal should lie directly from the circuit court in all capital cases, and in all cases wherein the punishment is confinement for life in the penitentiary they never go to the circuit courts of appeals.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. They certainly do.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, the law will settle it. I will send for the act of 1891; I think it will determine the question.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Right there, if it will not interrupt my friend, if I understand the effect of this bill, it is to abridge the right of appeal to the highest tribunal of the United States on the part of those who may be convicted of crime and sentenced to life servitude?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I say it will do.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is an abridgment of the right of appeal.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the man who is sentenced to the penitentiary has a right to appeal his case direct to the Supreme Court of the United States. That is the way I look at it, and that was the reason why we passed the bill in the form that we did. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed five minutes of his time.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will probably not occupy all the time which has been kindly allotted to me by my friend from Texas, Judge CULBERSON, but I will take enough time to say that I do not believe any good can come from abridging the right of the American citizen to have the question of his liberty, the most important that can possibly be presented concerning him, tried by the highest judicial tribunal. I can not believe that after we shall have gotten the full benefit of the act which added eighteen or twenty new judges to the Federal judiciary and constituted new courts for the trial of causes which had theretofore gone to the Supreme Court of the United States, there will be any difficulty in having the United States courts dispose of those cases which really require revision. It seems to me best that these cases involving life penalties in the penitentiary should have a right of appeal to the Supreme Court, for the reason that there ought to be uniformity of decision in these cases. Where you have a number of circuits, and different tribunals, with different judges presiding over them and holding court at different places, I am wholly unable to see how you are going to have uniformity of decision in that very important class of cases. One judge or set of judges will hold one way, another a different way, and you will have no head to the system. I do not see any good that can come from it.

Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat I want to say that this country owes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] a debt of gratitude for putting some restraint upon the frightful encroachment of the Federal judiciary upon individual rights and the jurisdiction of the State courts. It is not inappropriate here to say that there is not a field of jurisdiction over which they have not extended in an usurping way. He has to some extent restored to the people their rights; but this bill proposes to turn back the wheels of progress in the matter of giving fair and impartial trials. Why, only twenty years ago it was often found impossible to have an impartial jury in a Federal court. It will be remembered that we were able to get a rider upon an appropriation bill, under which the panel was selected part from one political party and part from the other, preventing forever partisan decisions in our Federal courts. I hope this House will not take a backward step. I can see no good that will result from refusing an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States on the part of any citizen who has incurred the penalty of life servitude in the penitentiary.

Mr. CULBERSON. Has the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] the act of 1891?

Mr. CONNOLLY. The circuit court of appeals act provides that all cases of conviction of a capital or otherwise infamous crime may go direct to the Supreme Court of the United States from the district court.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I said.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Either from the district or circuit court to the Supreme Court.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I said, that the law provided that they should go direct. Now, if I understand, the gentleman provides a circuitous route to get into the Supreme Court.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Not to go to the Supreme Court at all.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is worse than a circuitous route. It is an absolute denial.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It goes from the district to the circuit, and from the circuit to the circuit court of appeals, and there receives final adjudication, in the circuit court of appeals, rather than in the Supreme Court, in all cases not capital.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I thought the bill meant, and that is exactly what it is.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It is only about twelve years since any of these cases could go to the United States Supreme Court or to the circuit court at all.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am well aware of that.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The decision of the district court was final, and there was no appeal or writ of error allowed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have just stated that to the House.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The circuit courts of appeals act allowed an appeal direct to the Supreme Court in these cases.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that.

Mr. CONNOLLY. This bill provides that an appeal shall lie to the circuit court of appeals, and that the adjudication of that court shall be final. It still allows that appeal.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that.

Mr. CONNOLLY. And I would suggest, further, to the gentleman while he is on the floor, that if this bill passes it divides the criminal business of the United States among nine different circuit courts of appeals. If the law is allowed to stand as it is, it brings all the criminals to one court. Hence the congestion of business in the Supreme Court. The effect of this bill is to divide it among nine different courts.

Mr. CULBERSON. Already congested.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. To avoid that congestion.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, the effect of the bill is to divide the criminal prosecutions among nine courts, whereas now they are all sent to the Supreme Court of the United States and have congested the business of that court. Now, I undertake to say that the circuit courts of the United States are in a far worse condition in this respect than the Supreme Court of the United States. We have created eighteen or twenty circuit judges to help the Supreme Court out of the dilemma from overcrowded dockets. I understand that the business of that court is not very large. Only 48 criminal cases have been reported to that court within the last twelve months, and the very object is, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] says, in having these cases less than capital go the Supreme Court of the United States, to have a uniformity in the decisions, so that a man in Texas shall not be confined or put in the penitentiary and held there under a decision of the circuit court of appeals in that country which would not be tolerated by the circuit court of appeals at Chicago; so as to force a uniformity of decisions, and I expect that if you overload these circuit courts, as you are now, and as this bill tends to do, and will tend to do, you will have to increase that force, for, as far as the fifth circuit court is concerned, I know that it is impossible for the three judges of that court, two circuit judges and a district judge assigned to them, to discharge even the civil business before it—perfectly impossible. Now, do you not think that a man indicted and sent to the penitentiary for life under the Curtis bill, which is likely to become law, or do you not think that a man indicted and sent to the penitentiary for ten years or fifteen years ought to have the right to go to the highest court in this country and ask whether or not that conviction is just and proper and legal—or even for manslaughter?

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that this bill tends in the wrong direction. You already have an appeal from the circuit court of the United States to the circuit court of appeals in all criminal cases less than capital and less than felony; and I think that it is entirely proper to leave it so. I have no factious opposition to make to the bill.

Mr. TERRY. I desire to ask if this is the section of the law to which my friend from Texas referred, section 5 of the act of 1891, which provides that appeals or writs of error may be taken from the district courts or from the existing circuit courts direct to the Supreme Court in case of conviction of a capital or otherwise infamous crime?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir; that is the section I refer to; and if a person is convicted of an infamous crime—that means a crime for which the man may be punished by confinement in penitentiary at hard labor——

Mr. TERRY. That is correct.

Mr. CULBERSON. Why, then he has a right, under the statute, to appeal his case to the Supreme Court?

Mr. TERRY. I think that right should be preserved.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then this bill takes that away?

Mr. CULBERSON. This bill takes away that right.

Mr. MILES. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if this bill has received the approval of the Department of Justice?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know whether it has been to the Department of Justice or not. It has not from the House. Yes, sir; it has the approval, as the gentleman will find on page 3 of the report. It was sent there from the Senate, and the approval is in this:

Your letter of yesterday, requesting me to send you a statement——

Mr. MILES. I have the report. This is the letter from the Attorney-General?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes, sir.

Your letter of yesterday, requesting me to send you a statement of the number of criminal cases which have been brought to the Supreme Court, etc.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this bill becomes a law the appeals which can be taken in infamous cases will be greater in the United States courts than the appeals ordinarily allowed in the State courts; and that in itself ought to be a sufficient answer to all the objections which have been raised upon the other side of the House. There is an appeal at present direct from the district court to the Supreme Court in all these capital and infamous cases, and the purpose of this bill is to have the cases not capital proceed in the regular order from the district court to the circuit court and from the circuit court to the circuit courts of appeals. That gives two appeals after the first trial——

Mr. CULBERSON. Is not the gentleman mistaken about that?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I think not.

Mr. CULBERSON. Murder cases are tried uniformly now in the circuit court of the United States.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Oh, not necessarily.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. They may or they may not be.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, if a man is tried in the circuit court he has an appeal, and the gentleman will recollect that the act of 1891 provides that all other appeals are abolished.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If he is tried in the circuit court he has only one appeal; if he is tried in the district court he has two under the provisions of this bill and the act of 1891, constituting the circuit courts of appeals.

Mr. CULBERSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is not the law.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No, there is only one appeal—to the circuit courts of appeals.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Well, admitting that the gentlemen are right on that point, that gives the accused as many appeals as he has in any State in the Union. The object of this bill is to provide relief to the Supreme Court from the trial of little cases involving violations of internal-revenue laws, matters of pensions, matters of frauds upon the mails—the hundreds of little suits that are brought and then appealed from court to court in order to secure delay. It is not appropriate that the Supreme Court of the United States should be troubled with such little cases, which do not involve any great principle, any constitutional questions, and should thereby be prevented from promptly deciding those important questions which naturally and properly come before that high court.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If a question of the liberty of the American citizen is not of sufficient magnitude to engage the attention of the Supreme Court, will the gentleman kindly tell us what he thinks would be?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The liberty of the citizen is of the highest importance; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. McMILLIN. Yet, however important may be the right of liberty involved, even if the penalty is life servitude, so long as the actual life of the citizen is not involved you would cut him off from this appeal in order to give the Supreme Court time and opportunity to settle some question involving two thousand or three thousand or some other number of dollars and cents.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know how the gentleman can get into the Supreme Court with his case involving $2,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, make it $10,000, if you prefer; or make it any amount of dollars and cents. There is nothing on this earth that ought to be more sacred to the court and to Congress than the liberty of the citizen.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But when the man has had his several trials in courts of jurisdiction equivalent to that of the State courts in which he would be tried for his life, is any injustice, relative or otherwise, done to him by this proposition?

Mr. McMILLIN. Would not that same argument abolish the Supreme Court and leave all these questions of money to these other courts?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The primary purpose of the Supreme Court is to pass upon questions of constitutional law, laws, treaties, and matters which pertain to the whole nation, and the Supreme Court should always have an opportunity to give sufficient attention to those primary matters in order that no mistakes may be made in regard to them; but if the dockets of that court are lumbered up with cases pertaining to 4 gallons of whisky or 1 newspaper, then the court will find it impossible to give proper time and attention to the great constitutional and national affairs which it was instituted by the fathers to pass upon.

Mr. POWERS. In a prosecution under an indictment for manslaughter under your bill, if I understand it, the party charged can not get into the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. He can not get into the Supreme Court of the United States if he is charged with manslaughter, but he can go from the district court to the circuit court and from the circuit court to the circuit courts of appeals if this bill becomes a law, and that is more chance than he would have in the State of Vermont.

Mr. CONNOLLY. The gentleman is wrong. He can not go from the district court to the circuit court.

Mr. POWERS. No; but he can go from the circuit court to the circuit courts of appeals.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Well, that is as much opportunity for appeal as he would have in Vermont.

Mr. POWERS. But we have a great deal better courts there than your Federal courts. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Possibly that was true when the gentleman himself was on the bench, but I doubt if it is now. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. The right of appeal in cases of manslaughter has always existed, has it not?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No, sir; until the act of 1891 there never was an appeal to the Supreme Court in manslaughter cases, but the act of 1891, which established the circuit courts of appeals, granted it for the first time in the history of the country.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, if it was granted at that time, was not that done for the reason that Congress felt that the right of the citizen had been abridged in that respect?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am inclined to think that the granting of it was a mistake; that it was not intentional.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Was not that right of appeal considered as one of the rights that ought to be extended to the citizen, so that he might have the opinion of the highest court of the land when his liberty was at stake?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not think that was the intention of Congress, though, of course, I can not tell what the intention then was.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I understand that to have been the very object of the law.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly this bill does not deprive an accused party of any benefit which he should enjoy as a citizen of the United States. It will leave an appeal which was never allowed until 1891.

Mr. POWERS. My friend seems to be reckoning by the number of chances which a man accused of crime will be allowed. I submit that is hardly a fair way to treat the right of a citizen to liberty. The question may be very important to the citizen whether he is allowed to appeal from one lower court to another lower court, or whether he is allowed to appeal from a lower court to the highest court known to the law.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The gentleman should remember that prior to the act of 1891, all these cases were ended in the circuit courts. Prior to 1891 there was no appeal allowed to any higher tribunal. If this bill passes, there is one more appeal than those which were allowed up to the passage of the act of 1891.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman is wrong in his reckoning. He loses sight of the fact that these cases are not tried in the district court, but in the circuit court——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. They may or may not be.

Mr. POWERS. Well, they are tried in the circuit court as a matter of fact, are they not?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. They are sometimes tried there, and sometimes not.

Mr. POWERS. But that is the usual, the ordinary proceeding.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No, not the ordinary proceeding.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Most appropriately these cases should be tried in the district court.

Mr. POWERS. I sympathize with the suggestion of the gentleman that there is not very much of a criminal character which ought to reach the docket of the Supreme Court of the United States; but would it not be wise to eliminate from the jurisdiction of that court the lower grades of offenses, while retaining its jurisdiction over these great momentous questions of personal liberty, involving, if the party is convicted, a long term of imprisonment, possibly imprisonment for life? I throw out this suggestion, thinking perhaps the gentleman may see that his bill can be profitably modified.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I believe that the liberty of the individual American citizen is a question of as high moment as any that a court can pass upon; and if gentlemen are at all strenuous upon the point, I have no objection to so amending the bill as to allow appeals to be taken in capital cases and cases where the offense charged is manslaughter.

Mr. POWERS. We have many cases where the maximum punishment is a very long term of imprisonment. As these questions touch so gravely the right of personal liberty, it strikes me that the prisoner is entitled in such cases to a hearing before the very highest tribunal that the law has created.

It seems to me that we are improperly treating the two classes of cases as parallel when we say that because when a prisoner is charged with violation of a State law his last right of appeal is to the highest State court, therefore we are giving a prisoner charged with violation of Federal law an equal opportunity if we give him the same number of chances to take an appeal.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The only question, of course, would be the relative value of the circuit courts of appeals as a final tribunal and that of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. POWERS. Not quite that. Sometimes the violation of a Federal statute creates more widespread injury to the public, is more heinous in its character, more grave in its consequences, than the violation of a State statute.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the result to the individual would be practically the same.

Mr. POWERS. I feel quite sure that my friend from New Hampshire will on reflection find that his bill needs a little modification.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. An amendment is being prepared to which I have no objection, excepting cases of manslaughter.

Mr. POWERS. There are other offenses which are punished quite as severely as manslaughter, although the punishment for manslaughter may be imprisonment for life or for a shorter term. But there are cases of counterfeiting and forgery——

Mr. BAILEY. Do I understand that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] agrees to accept an amendment?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will inquire whether it is in order to propose an amendment to a bill which is being considered under suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). It would not be except by unanimous consent.

Mr. TERRY. I do not see why it should be any worse to be put in the penitentiary for manslaughter than for some other offenses, and if we except cases of manslaughter, I do not see why other offenses should not be excepted.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I suppose the gentleman from Arkansas would discriminate as to different grades of crime, and I suppose he is perfectly willing that people should be punished in this country for crime.

Mr. TERRY. If I had to be put in a penitentiary (I do not know that I should like to be put there at all), I would rather be placed there for manslaughter than for some infamous offenses in respect to which this bill denies the right of appeal. For instance, I would rather be imprisoned for manslaughter than for theft, or embezzlement, or anything of that kind—offenses which inflict a worse stain upon a man's character than if in hot blood and under provocation he commits what the law calls manslaughter.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Do I understand the gentleman to say he would rather kill a man than steal a twenty-dollar bill?

Mr. TERRY. I would rather be in the penitentiary for killing, in hot blood, a man who had grossly insulted me than for going stealthily and stealing or embezzling another man's property. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, allow me to suggest now, to meet an objection which I think is fairly well founded to the bill, namely, that it allows an appeal to the Supreme Court where a man's life is involved, but denies the appeal when he may have been convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment, which to most men would be quite as bad as a sentence to death in a limited time, I propose to amend the bill for the purpose of meeting this point by inserting on page 1, in line 9, after the words "or otherwise infamous," the words:

Or cases in which a judgment of life imprisonment is rendered in the district court.

That would extend the right of appeal to all cases that are capital by statute without reference to the judgment of the court, because gentlemen must understand that whether a case is capital or not is not to be determined by the judgment rendered, but is to be determined exclusively by the indictment found. There may be a conviction on an indictment where a man is indicted on a capital charge, and the conviction may be for manslaughter, or it may be for assault and battery; but it is a capital offense, and hence appealable to the Supreme Court whether this bill passes or not. If the amendment I suggest shall be adopted, the bill carries to the Supreme Court all cases of judgments of the district or circuit courts in which the judgment shall be life imprisonment.

Now, gentlemen, these appeals in behalf of human life, and in behalf of human liberty, are very effective always in touching an American of a right mind. But gentlemen should bear in mind also that nearly the whole category of crimes, under the Federal law, are infamous. They are unlike our State statutes, wherein we make certain crimes felonies and others not felonies, and we make other crimes, again, misdemeanors. But under our Federal system of law nearly everything is infamous. Take, for instance, a man who is tried for selling a drink of whisky. He may be charged as a retail liquor dealer, and may be convicted of the charge. What, then, may his punishment be? It may be two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary; for a term of imprisonment of that length of time means necessarily in the penitentiary. Any imprisonment of a party for a year, or in excess of that, under the Federal statutes, must be in the penitentiary, and he can not be there except at hard labor. That has been settled by the Supreme Court.

Now, we have that condition where the man is indicted and convicted of selling a drink of whisky, and he may be sentenced to pay a fine of only $1, without imprisonment. That man has a right to appeal that case to the docket of the Supreme Court of the United States under existing law. Now, is there any sense in that?

Mr. RAY. Will my colleague allow a question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. Under our system of government is it not just that that man, who may be sentenced to the State prison for two years, shall be tried and convicted, if convicted, and sentenced under correct principles of law?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Oh, beyond all doubt.

Mr. RAY. Now, what is the object of the Supreme Court of the United States? Is it not to settle correctly contested principles of law that may arise in these cases? The object is to have one court where we may have the question finally determined, so that we may have a uniform rule running all through our modes of procedure in the courts of the United States.

Mr. CONNOLLY. From that I take it the gentleman would conclude that in every controversy between the United States and the citizen, whether the citizen be a criminal or not, he should have the right to appeal finally to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. RAY. I would assert that, even if the punishment were not more than an hour's confinement in a county jail, if it could be done without incumbering our courts to such an extent that the administration of justice would be practically impossible. For, as a matter of abstract principle, it is just as essential that the man who is worth only a dollar, and that dollar is to be taken away from him, shall have the right to go to the Supreme Court of the United States and have the question of his rights determined as it is for the man who is worth ten millions and has a million involved in the controversy. I do not favor that. I do not argue that. I only make these suggestions as bearing upon the question of where we should make the dividing line, where we should cut off the right of appeal. I make these suggestions for that purpose and no other.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I concur with the gentleman fully about that, that as an abstract proposition I think it would be right that every citizen, in every controversy he may have with the Government of the United States, should have the right to go to the court of last resort in the United States, namely, the Supreme Court. But as a concrete question, as a practical question, is it possible that that can be done? We know it is not. Every gentleman knows that the line must be drawn somewhere for practical purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I ask unanimous consent that an amendment be offered.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] asks to modify his motion, and moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes in which to call the attention of the House to the class of cases that are cumbering the docket of the Supreme Court under the statute as it stands.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to that, if time may be extended to this side of the House to a similar extent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked to extend the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] five minutes, and to grant a like extension to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, before the gentleman proceeds, will he be kind enough to suggest an offense which, under the law of the United States, is now punishable byconfinement in the penitentiary for life?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, sir, murder is one, for instance. Rape, within the jurisdiction of the United States, is another.

Mr. CULBERSON. The penalty for murder is hanging.

Mr. CONNOLLY. But it may be imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. So it may be for any of these offenses. I think he will find that the punishment may be less than death.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the gentleman will find that he is mistaken.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Possibly I am. If I am, I will readily concede it. I am answering now upon the general principle.

Mr. CULBERSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him. I only ask the question because if there is any offense against the laws of the United States now punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for life it has entirely escaped my attention, and if there is no such case, then the gentleman's amendment would not be necessary.

Mr. CONNOLLY. My amendment would not effect anything if that is true. I think, however, the gentleman will, on investigation, find that there are many of these offenses in which the imprisonment may be for life.

Mr. CULBERSON. That may be so.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Your amendment would not take manslaughter into the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. CONNOLLY. If the defendant was sentenced for life.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But if he was sentenced for ninety-nine years, it would not?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No, sir.

Mr. NORTHWAY. What is the penalty for burning a Government building?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I could not tell that without referring to the statutes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think it is death.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No; it is not death.

Mr. NORTHWAY. It may be imprisonment for twenty-one years, may it not?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I do not know.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Your amendment would not take that case into the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CONNOLLY. No; it would not] I can modify it so as to provide where the sentence extends to imprisonment for life or for the term of ten years——

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Make it five years.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Very well. The House kindly extended my time to allow me to call attention to the class of cases that are now cumbering the docket of the Supreme Court, with the view of showing the absolute practical necessity for doing something. Instead of making the Supreme Court a hopper in which all the district courts may pour their criminal cases, this proposition makes nine different hoppers into which they may go.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Yes; my five minutes will be up in a short time.

Mr. MILES. Could you not get at that reform better by providing that these petty offenses shall not be punishable by confinement in the penitentiary?

Mr. CONNOLLY. That would require a revision of the whole title of crimes in the Federal statutes. For instance, as I have said, one class of cases is the retailing of spirituous liquors. A man may be punished by a fine of $1 or 1 cent, or he may be sent to the penitentiary for two years. Therefore it is an infamous offense, and he has the right of appeal, and without any question of principle or law being involved he has a right to appeal, and postpone the day of final conviction by means of the appeal.

Also, use of mails to defraud, larceny as postmaster, conspiracy to interfere with operations of mines, depositing in mails letter containing obscene matter, breaking into a post-office with intent to commit larceny, introducing beer into the Indian country, abstracting funds of bank, for committing pension frauds, perjury in land case, using mails to defraud, conspiracy to prevent the internal-revenue collector from discharging his duties, embezzlement of letters by postal clerk, violation of the interstate-commerce law, false entries in reports to Comptroller of the Currency, interfering with officers' election, making false entries in books and reports of bank, smuggling and sale of opium, bribery of custom officers to permit Chinese to land, receiving and selling smuggled cattle, taking unlawful fee in pension case (where the law limits the fee to $10 and he takes $15); in effect, all appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States; illegal dumping of refuse into harbor, taking illegal fees as United States commissioner, stealing of letter and contents by carrier, embezzlement of money-order funds, making a false affidavit to aid in a pension claim—all that class of cases are dumped now into the Supreme Court of the United States, and on that docket there are 254 cases of these classes. The Supreme Court are compelled to advance these cases in front of all the cases on their docket, so that all the great questions of constitutional law that it was originally designed that this court should settle for the country at large are compelled to wait, so that——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I will only ask to have my amendment reported again, so that it may be understood it extends the operation of the proposed law to cases where the judgment is five years' imprisonment or more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1, page 1, after the word "infamous," insert the following:
"Or cases in which a judgment of imprisonment for five years or more is rendered in the district or circuit courts."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire should include the amendment just now reported in the bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That extends it to all capital cases, and all others where the judgment rendered below shall be as much as five years' imprisonment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from New Hampshire may modify his motion as suggested? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have only to say now that the list of cases read by my friend from Illinois demonstrates the necessity of maintaining the law practically as it now exists, for every case he has read is a grave offense against the laws of the United States, in which surely we ought to have some uniformity of decision by the courts. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MILES. I have no desire to address the House.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield the floor.

Mr. MILES. I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact, as the gentleman from Texas has been kind enough to yield me some time, that I asked the gentleman in charge of this bill a while ago if the bill had the approval of the Department of Justice, and he read a letter to the House in which there is not one word of approval given to this bill by the Attorney-General. The Attorney-General does state, however, that the total number of cases that have reached the Supreme Court to incumber the docket since the passage of the act read by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] is only 123, and that 51 of these were capital cases, 49 being indictments for murder and 2 for rape, leaving 72 cases less than capital.

The further statement is made—

You ask that I give the number of each class of cases noncapital, but, as you will see from the inclosed memorandum, the cases are miscellaneous in character and can hardly be classified.

So that the House is asked to pass upon this bill without having knowledge as to the real character of the 72 cases which are less than capital. And I want to assert, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe it is possible to cite on this floor a single instance of a case of the petty character referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], involving 2 gallons of whisky, ever having incumbered the docket of the Supreme Court of the United States. No such cases have reached that docket; and that is conclusively shown by a recital of the cases which are found in the report and which are shown, as remarked by my friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], to be cases of grave consequence, both to the laws of the country and to the persons charged with these crimes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendment reported by the Clerk.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The noes seem to have it. Two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative, in the opinion of the Chair, the motion is lost.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5820) to create a second division of the southern district of California for judicial purposes, and to fix the time for holding court therein.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of San Diego, in the State of California, shall constitute the second division of the judicial district of the southern district of California, and a term of the circuit and district courts for said district shall be held therein at the city of San Diego on the first Monday in May and the first Monday in November of each year. The remaining counties heretofore embraced in said judicial district of the southern district of California shall constitute the first division thereof.

SEC. 2. That all civil suits which shall hereafter be brought against a defendant or defendants who reside in the second division of said district shall be brought in said second division; but if there are two or more defendants residing in different divisions of said district, such suit may be brought in either division of said district in which any defendant or defendants reside, and all mesne and final process subject to the provisions of this act, issued in either of the divisions of the judicial district of the southern district of California, may be served and executed in either or all of the divisions.

SEC. 3. That all crimes and offenses against the laws of the United States hereafter committed within the county comprising the second division of said district shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined at the terms of the district court hereinbefore provided for: Provided, That all such crimes and offenses heretofore committed within said district shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 4. That the clerks of the circuit and district courts for said district and the marshal of said district shall each appoint a deputy, who shall reside and maintain an office at the city of San Diego, each of whom shall, in the absence of the clerks or marshal, exercise all the powers and perform all the duties of his principal within the division for which he shall be appointed: Provided, That the appointment of such deputies shall be approved by the court for which they shall be respectively appointed, and they may be removed by such court at pleasure, and the clerk and marshal shall be responsible for the official acts and neglects of all their deputies.

SEC. 5. That all civil suits and proceedings now pending in the circuit or district court of said southern district of California which would, if instituted after the passage of this act, be required to be brought in the second division of said district may be transferred by consent of all the parties to said second division of said district, and there disposed of in the same manner and with like effect as if the same had been there instituted, and all processes, writs, and recognizances relating to such suits and proceedings so transferred shall be considered as taken at and returnable to the term of court in the second division of said district in the same manner and with like effect as if they had been issued or taken in reference thereto originally.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether this bill creates a new court, or simply designates a new place for holding court?

Mr. BOWERS. It simply designates a new place, San Diego, for the holding of court. This is a money-saving bill. It was reported unanimously by the committee on the 11th of February last as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The judges are already provided?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes, sir.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOWERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TOWN SITES IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1191 to ratify an act of the Oklahoma legislature, approved February 27, 1895, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That article 4, chapter 12, of the act of the legislature of the Territory of Oklahoma of 1895 entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the vacation of town sites and additions thereto and the plats thereof proved up and patented under section 22 of the organic act in certain cases," approved February 27, 1895, be, and the same is hereby, in all things ratified and approved.

SEC. 2. That in all cases where a homestead entryman has perfected or shall hereafter perfect his title to the land embraced in his homestead entry or any subdivision thereof, under the provisions of section 22 of an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved May 2, 1890, and the patentee or proprietor or proprietors of all the lots in any such town site or addition thereto have or shall vacate the same according to the law applicable thereto, and patents to the reservations for parks and for schools and other public purposes have not been issued and delivered for such reservations, all such reservations and unvacated streets leading to any such reservation shall, upon application to the Secretary of the Interior within six months from the date of the approval of this act or the vacation of any such town site or addition thereto and on payment of the original homestead price an acre for such lands, be patented to the proprietor or proprietors of such land containing such reservation: Provided, That if patent has already issued or shall hereafter issue for any such reservation to any town or municipality, such town or municipality, through its presiding officer, may sell the same and any unvacated street leading to any such reservation at public or private sale to the highest bidder after thirty days' public notice of such sale, and convey said lands to the purchaser thereof by proper deed of conveyance and cover the proceeds of such sale into the school fund of such town or municipality.

The committee recommended an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That in all cases where a town site or an addition to a town site, entered under the provisions of section 22 of an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved May 2, 1890, shall be vacated in accordance with the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma, and patents for the public reservations in such vacated town site or addition thereto have not been issued, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon an official showing that such town site or addition thereto has been vacated, and upon payment of the homestead price for such reservations, to issue a patent for such reservations to the original entryman.

If the original entryman shall fail or neglect to make application for the reservations within six months from the vacation of such town site, or from the passage of this act, the reservations shall be subject to disposal under the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act approved February 26, 1895.

SEC. 2. That if a patent has already issued, or shall hereafter issue, for any such reservation, to any town or municipality, such town or municipality, upon the vacation of the town site or addition thereto, as aforesaid, may sell the same at public or private sale to the highest bidder after thirty days' public notice of such sale, and convey said lands to the purchaser by proper deed of conveyance, and cover the proceeds of such sale into the school fund of such town or municipality: Provided, That where, by reason of the vacation of an entire town site and all its additions, the municipal organization has ceased to exist, the reservations in such vacated town site which may have been patented to the town may be disposed of as isolated tracts under the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act approved February 26, 1895.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws, in so far as they conflict with this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I desire a vote on the substitute, not on the original bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very long and it seems to be a complicated bill. I do not feel like saying that it ought not to come up for consideration, but if it is to come up I would like to hear some explanation of its provisions.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to correct a law which was enacted some years ago providing for the establishment of town sites in the Territory of Oklahoma. No provision was made for the vacation of those town sites when abandoned, and this bill seeks to establish a method for the change of title where the same has not changed through the municipal officers. Under the provisions of this measure, the Secretary of the Interior may treat these abandoned town sites as isolated tracts of land which may be sold under statutes already enacted. One provision is that no land shall be sold for less price than $1.25 per acre, the established schedule rate. The bill affects only those tracts of land in this one Territory, and only those cases where the owners have left the land and there are no municipal officers through whom the title may be changed.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to suggest also that the original bill was referred to the Secretary of the Interior, who referred it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in the Land Office a substitute was drawn for the original bill, and it is the substitute which the committee have reported back and recommend to be passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is there a recommendation by the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the passage of this bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, sir. He recommended the substitute and prepared it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask that the Clerk read the letter of recommendation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LACEY) was read, as follows:

This bill was submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, and thereupon the Secretary submitted the following report and a substitute bill to the committee:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 13, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you herewith a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated the 11th instant, on H. R. 1191, "To reaffirm an act of the Oklahoma legislature approved February 27, 1895, and for other purposes."

The Commissioner is of the opinion, for the reasons in his report, that the bill a copy of which he herewith transmits should be substituted in lieu of H. R. 1191. I concur in the Commissioner's recommendation.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN F. LACEY,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt, for report in duplicate and return of papers, of House bill No. 1191, entitled "A bill to ratify an act of the Oklahoma legislature, approved February 27, 1895, and for other purposes."

The purpose of the bill is to provide for the disposal of reservations in town site commuted under section 22, act of May 2, 1890 (26 Stat. L., 81), where such town site has been "vacated" in accordance with the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma.

While the object intended by the bill is one for which some provision should be made, the measure proposed does not meet with the approval of this office in its present form.

I therefore have the honor to recommend the substitution of a bill of the form herewith inclosed in lieu of House bill No. 1191.

As the act of the Oklahoma legislature approved February 27, 1895, which the bill No. 1191 proposes to ratify contravenes no law of the United States and needs no ratification, that feature has been omitted from the form of bill submitted.

The papers are returned.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SUBSTITUTE FOR THE BILL.

A bill to provide for the disposal of public reservations in vacated town sites or additions to town sites in the Territory of Oklahoma.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases where a town site, or an addition to a town site, entered under the provisions of section 22 of an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved May 2, 1890, shall be vacated in accordance with the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma, and patents for the public reservations in such vacated town site, or addition thereto, have not been issued, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon an official showing that such town site, or addition thereto, has been vacated, and upon payment of the homestead price for such reservations, to issue a patent for such reservations to the original entryman.

If the original entryman shall fail or neglect to make application for the reservations within six months from the vacation of such town site, or from the passage of this act, the reservations shall be subject to disposal under the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act approved February 26, 1895.

SEC. 2. That if a patent has already issued, or shall hereafter issue, for any such reservation to any town or municipality, such town or municipality, upon the vacation of the town site or addition thereto, as aforesaid, may sell the same at public or private sale to the highest bidder after thirty days' public notice of such sale, and convey said lands to the purchaser by proper deed of conveyance, and cover the proceeds of such sale into the school fund of such town or municipality: Provided, That where, by reason of the vacation of an entire town site and all its additions, the municipal organization has ceased to exist, the reservations in such vacated town site which may have been patented to the town may be disposed of as isolated tracts under the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act approved February 26, 1895.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws, in so far as they conflict with this act, are hereby repealed.

The proposed substitute of the Commissioner of the General Land Office effects the purpose for which the original bill was introduced and intended.

The reasons for the passage of the substitute sufficiently appear in the correspondence above.

The committee therefore recommend that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and that the above substitute be adopted and passed.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill to provide for the disposal of public reservations in vacated town sites or additions to town sites in the Territory of Oklahoma."

FREE DELIVERY IN TOWNS.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who made objection some time ago to the bill for free delivery in towns and villages, after reading it, has withdrawn his objection, and I ask that the bill be now taken up and put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut states that the objection made to the bill indicated by him has been withdrawn by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] and asks that the bill be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the House at this moment. He stated, I know, that he thought there was something in the files of the committee that would shed light on this measure and said that he would go and try to find it. I will ask the gentleman from Connecticut, therefore, to let this matter go over until another time, when the chairman of the committee shall be present.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to accommodating gentlemen, but I have called up this bill several times, and there has been objection made to what seems to me a very simple matter—a proposition to give the people of the rural districts greater mail facilities at no expense whatever to the Government. It does seem to me that this is a matter that ought not to be objected to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has the gentleman any objection to the chairman of the committee having charge of such matters being present when the bill is considered? I know that the chairman desires to be present, and that is why I have called attention to his absence at this time.

Mr. SPERRY. I did not understand that. When the bill was approved in the committee, I was put in charge of it, and the approval was unanimous. There was no objection whatever made to the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The conversation to which I have already referred occurred since the gentleman from Connecticut undertook to-day to bring this bill up. I have not seen the chairman of the committee since; but I know that after making the search for a certain paper he wanted to be present when this bill was disposed of. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will not object to allowing the bill to go over until the chairman can be present.

Mr. SPERRY. I did not understand the chairman of our committee to oppose this bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. He stated that he wanted to search the files for a particular paper, with the view of deciding whether the bill ought to be objected to. That is the way I understood him. It strikes me that no harm can come from allowing a measure like this to go over until the chairman of the committee that has had the matter in hand can be present. He said there was somewhere in the files a letter on this subject from the Postmaster-General, and he wanted to see whether he could find that letter. The bill may be entirely correct. If it should prove so on proper examination, I shall, of course, interpose no objection; on the contrary, I will heartily support the bill. If it gives better postal service than we have heretofore had, the gentleman will have no difficulty in getting it up and having it passed; and no man will more heartily aid him in securing its passage than myself. I am for all proper mail facilities, especially in the rural communities.

Mr. SPERRY. If the gentleman from Tennessee makes objection, of course I must acquiesce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. DALZELL. I move that the House now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COLSON, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BURTON of Missouri, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BURRELL, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUFF, for four days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of William N. Duncan (Forty-fourth Congress), no adverse report having been made.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel, of the United States Navy, retired, be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the highest pay and compensation of his grade as a rear-admiral from and after the date of the passage of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will ask that the report be read. The bill comes unanimously from the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is a very deserving case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill 1906, "in relation to the pay of Admiral Roger N. Stembel," have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

Admiral Stembel entered the Navy in the year 1832. He served in the successive gradations of rank until the year 1861, when hostilities commenced between the United States and seceding States. He was then a commander. In 1861 and 1862 he was in the Western Gunboat Flotilla, commanded by Flag Officer Charles Henry Davis; served with distinguished gallantry in the battles of Lucas Bend, September 9, 1861; Belmont, November 7, 1861; Fort Henry February 6, 1862; in the bombardment and capture of Island No. 10, and in the battle with rebel rams at Craigshead Bend, near Fort Pillow, May 10, 1862.

In the last engagement he was officially reported by his flag officer as having distinguished himself.

See official copy of Records of Living Naval Officers hereto appended.

In the last of the above engagements he was desperately, almost mortally, wounded while commanding the gunboat Cincinnati. For more than twelve months this gallant officer was confined to his apartments, and for the most of that time hovering between life and death. His life was probably saved by the unremitting efforts and tender nursing of his devoted wife.

Admiral Stembel never recovered from the severe wound received in that fight. This wound practically disabled him for further active service during the remainder of the war, and since. But on account of his distinguished services he was regularly promoted until 1874, when he was commissioned a rear-admiral. He was retired December 27, 1872.

Rear-Admiral Stembel served his country faithfully since his entrance into the Navy in March, 1832, a period of sixty-four years. He spent large sums of money, of his own private means, during the time he was confined to his apartments in 1862 and 1863. He is now 85 years old. He is very feeble and has never recovered from the severe wound received May 10, 1862, but still suffers from its effects. He is partially paralyzed in the right arm and side to the knee. His eyesight has been seriously injured. These troubles are constantly increasing, and it is feared he will soon become a blind paralytic. He can not now leave his domicile without an attendant. These sufferings from conspicuous and gallant services rendered his country take his case out of the general law of August 6, 1882, and makes his case for special relief at least as meritorious as the cases of Vice-Admiral Stephen C. Rowan and Rear-Admirals John L. Worden and James E. Jouett.

He can not have long to enjoy the honor and emoluments proposed by this bill. But he desires to be placed upon the same plane as the three distinguished officers mentioned above.

The honor thus conferred will be a priceless heritage to his children.

Your committee reports back Senate bill 1906 with a favorable and strong recommendation.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read, if it has not been.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the amount of pay granted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the clause of the bill referred to.

The Secretary read as follows:

The highest pay and compensation of his grade as a rear-admiral from and after the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to have an explanation of what the phrase "the highest pay" means.

Mr. DUBOIS. He is now retired on three-quarters pay. This gives him full pay. It makes a difference of one-quarter.

Mr. SEWELL. It makes an exception in this case over every other officer of the Navy?

Mr. DUBOIS. It makes an exception in this case; but exceptions have been made for the same reasons, though not so strong as in this case. It applies only to the rest of his life; it dies with him. He is 85 years old, and his services were conspicuous. There have been cases of the same sort.

Mr. SEWELL. It is all very well, but I can name twenty retired officers of the Navy who have earned full pay just as much as this one.

Mr. DUBOIS. No; I think not.

Mr. SEWELL. If it is going to be the policy of the Senate to do this, it is all very well; I do not object to it.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senate has done it in cases similar to this, I will say to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE H. LOTT.

Mr. HILL. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5229) for the relief of George H. Lott, to report it without amendment. The bill will take just a moment; it is recommended by the Department, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to George H. Lott, a citizen of Mississippi, $148, that being the amount deducted by the Post-Office Department from his pay as subcontractor on a mail route in that State because the mail service thereon was performed by the minor son of the postmaster at Stix, Miss.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. Let it go over and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the joint resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to have it printed, to be considered in connection with the motion I entered yesterday to refer to the Committee on Indian Affairs the answer of the Secretary of the Interior to the resolution of the 4th instant, so that the whole matter may come up at one time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a moment? I gave way reluctantly a day or two ago in reference to the Du Pont case, which is a question of the highest privilege, I take it, and if pressed by those having it in charge I presume everything else would necessarily give way. I found out, however, that with the other question of privilege up, and other matters coming in from time to time, we were not making much headway, and therefore I have given way until a later day to the Cuban matter, and, as a matter of course, I gave way yesterday to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who had given notice that they desired to address the Senate. That goes as a matter of course.

I am still willing, after the Senator from Alabama shall have concluded his speech, if the Cuban matter can be disposed of in any reasonable time, not to press the Du Pont case until it is disposed of. However, if it can not be disposed of within some reasonable time I shall feel compelled to ask that the Senate take up the question of high privilege and proceed with it to a finish. In any event, even if the Cuban matter is to go on this week and not be disposed of in the next two or three days, I should like at some opportune time that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], who desires to address the Senate on the Du Pont case, might have the privilege of doing so, as he is compelled to leave the city very soon.

Mr. SHERMAN. In accordance with the universal courtesy which prevails in the Senate, I never like to interpose in the way of a Senator making a speech, because I think when he is prepared to speak he ought to have an opportunity to do so; but I do trust and appeal to the Senate that we shall dispose of the privileged question which is now pending before the body. I will not object at all to the Senator from Alabama finishing his speech. His colleague will then take the floor upon the Cuban resolutions; and I think after the speeches are made of which notice has been given that we should proceed to conclude that matter. It ought to be done within a day. I do not myself expect to say anything more upon the subject, and I do not therefore wish to fix any limit upon the debate; but so far as I am concerned, I shall press the consideration of the Cuban resolutions against any other proposition that may be made.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, concerning the brief remarks which I intend to submit upon the Delaware case at the earliest possible moment, I yield to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], who informed me, as he has informed the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], that he is going away the last of this week, and, therefore, if he speaks at all, he must speak this week. I will waive my desire in his behalf. I do think that both of these matters ought to receive the unremitting attention of the Senate. The Du Pont case certainly ought to go forward without much delay; and it is of pressing urgency to the public interests that the Cuban resolutions should be disposed of.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. PUGH. I ask that the House bill on the tariff, with the amendment of the Committee on Finance, may be laid before the Senate for the purpose of enabling me to continue the remarks which I began yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill referred to by the Senator from Alabama, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase the revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I have read the messages of President Jackson and the debate in the Senate and the reports of the Committee on Finance, and any attempt to find anywhere any support of the single gold standard, or a single suggestion that the free and unlimited coinage of both metals ought to be prevented or suspended, is an indefensible perversion of the record of the Congressional debates, excusable only on the ground of ignorance or accepting as true deliberate misrepresentation of the report of these debates.

In 1834, and prior thereto, there was an inadequate supply of specie—both gold and silver. The production of our own mines of gold and silver was quite small and wholly insufficient to supply our demand. There was no suggestion of opposition to the coinage of either metal; the great anxiety was to secure and increase the coinage of both metals. There was no desire expressed by any Senator or Member that reducing the amount of gold to be coined in a dollar, so as thereby to make the ratio 16 to 1, would have any other effect than to increase the quantity of gold coined by our mint without interfering with or decreasing the amount of silver to be coined. The measure to increase the ratio to 16 to 1, instead of 15½ to 1, like the French ratio, was vigorously and ably resisted, solely on account of the doubt about the effect of the change to 16 to 1 in causing silver bullion to be withheld from coinage because of undervaluation.

The messages of President Jackson and the speeches of Senator Benton charged the reduction of the supply of the precious metals to the efforts of the United States Bank to contract the currency by warring on our supply of specie, and Senator Benton charged the four years' panic, from 1820 to 1824, to the persistent and unscrupulous warfare of the United States Bank upon our specie currency made up of both gold and silver.

It is admitted that the people of the United States are now practically unanimous in the opinion that silver should be immediately restored to equal coinage with gold, so that we can have the benefits of both metals as a coin standard of value and redemption basis of representative currency. It is universally conceded that the blessings and benefits that would be secured to the people of the United States by the equal coinage and equal use of both metals as a standard of value and basis of redemption can not be overestimated. All the arguments against and objections to restoring silver to free and unlimited coinage can be removed by an international agreement, over which it can not be denied England has absolute control.

This practically unanimous opinion and universal concession are a destructive and unquestioned judgment against the wisdom and safety and justice of the single gold standard, and the impossibility of its being continued as a dead weight upon the growth and prosperity of the United States. But there are powerful organizations and combinations in both the national Democratic and Republican parties who declare it to be their purpose to hold both parties to the maintenance of the gold standard, and the deprivation of all the blessings and benefits that would flow from the equal coinage and equal use of both gold and silver as standard and redemption money until England will agree to relieve the United States from the admitted evils of the gold system and consent to the restoration to mankind of the admitted blessings and benefits to flow from the restoration of silver to coinage.

These organizations and combinations are known to be founded on personal interest in utter disregard of the public welfare, and are therefore out of the reach of argument founded on public considerations. Money owners, money lenders, and speculators in the use of money, associated in banking corporations, chambers of commerce, and boards of trade, with vast capital invested in all the agencies of commerce and the means of transportation and industries requiring the employment of labor and the purchase of raw material, are sheltering themselves under the single gold standard by what they know to be the impossibility of obtaining the consent of England to any change or enlargement of her gold-standard system by restoring silver to free coinage. The unavoidable position of the gold-standard advocates of international coinage amounts necessarily to an acknowledgment that the United States must agree to be dominated by England on what shall be the financial system of the United States—a system involving as it does to a greater extent than anything else the future growth, prosperity, and welfare of this great country. The statement of such a proposition, supported by such powerful combinations, is enough to fill the producing and working people of the United States and all patriotic Americans with alarm and apprehension for the future of their country.

Why are the people of the United States asked to submit to the evils of the gold standard and to postpone the blessings and benefits admitted to exist in international coinage until we can try the hopeless experiment of securing the consent of England for our relief? It must be kept constantly in mind that the most powerful elements that make up the opposition to the coinage of silver are influenced by the most controlling motives of self-interest to have the system of gold finance in this country continued. These gold-standard advocates who insist that we shall wait for the consent of England know that consent can never be obtained. Whenever the people of the United States show their willingness to accept the gold system of finance and to continue its existence until changed by an international agreement, it becomes an absolute certainty that the evils of the gold standard must be endured as a permanently established financial system of the United States.

From the beginning of commercial power to 1873 England was acknowledged to be the greatest commercial country in the world. Her manufacturing power, her world-wide carrying trade extended English dominion over the world, and her supremacy was not questioned or interrupted until it was done by the manufacturing and commercial development of rival countries in Europe in close proximity to England and the unprecedented growth of the United States in all the elements of national greatness. Not one of the countries that have become powerful competitors of England in the struggle for commercial supremacy developed their ability to compete with her on the gold basis and a financial system of contraction. For sixty years after England established the gold basis, France and the other members of the Latin union and Germany and the United States held their gold and increased their supply of gold and made rapid strides in manufacturing and mining, in agricultural and commercial elements of greatness, and all this wonderful progress was made as rivals of England, with unlimited coinage of silver money, and without any gold standard or contracted currency. In every country that has followed the example of England and gone with her to the gold basis by stopping silver coinage, it was done without any popular demand or public necessity for such a radical change and against the will and interest of the people, and in every country where the gold standard exists the people are demanding the restoration of silver to free coinage.

Take the history of the question in our own country while silver has been dropped from free coinage in every country in Europe just as it is to-day. From 1878 to 1893, when the United States was carried to the gold standard by influences dangerous to free representative government, silver was restored to coinage at the rate of $24,000,000, with power to increase it to $48,000,000, per annum, and under our coinage laws, passed over Presidential vetoes, we added to our supply of silver money over $500,000,000, and all the time we were doing it our gold supply was increasing more than in any gold-standard country in the world. If we had listened to the predictions and lamentations of the Democracy of the East, and the Republicans of the United States, our entire supply of silver money this hour would not have exceeded $50,000,000, and Senator SHERMAN declared years ago that $50,000,000 of silver was all we could coin without driving out all our gold and going to the silver basis, and President Cleveland declared in his message to Congress in 1885 that we then had $215,000,000 of silver, and if we coined any more we would drive out all our gold, go to the silver basis, and destroy the credit of the Government. I have presented facts of history as an answer to predictions and lamentations in the past, and nothing is left to the gold advocates but assertions and lamentations as to what will surely happen in the future if we are reckless enough to venture on free silver coinage without the consent of England. Let us test the predictions as to the consequences of free silver coinage by the rules of common sense and reason. If all the gold leaves and the banks return their circulation, as it is predicted, it will contract the currency about $900,000,000, and leave us to carry on our trade and industries and pursuits with only about $900,000,000. This would be a complete change in the policy of banks as shown in their history in England and the United States. The banks have always exerted their power to expel all metallic money from circulation to give place to their own paper currency.

If the rule that scarce money makes dear money holds good, what will our silver and greenbacks be worth when they are the only currency left in circulation while we are coining our silver bullion to supply the place now occupied by our gold and national-bank notes? It would be the most favorable condition that could exist for profitable banking on the silver basis.

Carlisle says that it would take ten years to coin silver enough to give us our present supply of currency. While this change was being effected there could not be a richer harvest insured to the national banks. If our present supply of currency is to be reduced one-half by free silver coinage, prices of commodities, labor, and property would be reduced to one-half of what they are now, and every dollar of gold in this country and that could be obtained in Europe would be instantly invested in the United States in the most valuable property in the world, and we would have the liveliest markets and the liveliest times that ever gladdened the hearts of our people. The whole prediction is utterly preposterous. No country in the world has any better property, real and personal, in the country and in cities, no better railroads, no better mills, foundries, and no such raw material of all kinds, and there would be no reason why gold would not stay here and come here from abroad for investment if silver is going to break down prices and put all the mills and furnaces and railroads in the market at starvation prices. Talk about the silver craze; it is nothing compared with the insanity of the gold conspirators to establish a despotism of money to which the people will never submit unless they are really crazy.

Where will the gold go for employment that can be more profitable than in the United States? Gold will seek investment or some use for profit, or it will be hoarded and kept useless. If it goes to gold-using countries it will add to the supply of gold and lessen the demand for it, and diminish its purchasing power by increasing the price of our commodities. What opportunities or inducements can be found for investment in any gold-using countries that do not exist and must continue to exist in greater degree in the United States? How can the supply of silver from free coinage prevent the production of commodities in this country for export to gold-using countries? Will cotton and grain and manufactured articles produced in this country by the use of silver be any less useful and necessary in gold-using countries because they were produced in a country on the silver basis? If, then, free silver coinage in this country alone will not stop the production of cotton, grain, and meat, what will prevent all these commodities going to Europe for sale and consumption?

If we continue to export our commodities to Europe, will we sell them for gold or for silver? Will the owner take silver to bring home, or gold? If silver goes abroad to buy our commodities it must be recoined or paid out as bullion at the price of bullion in Europe. If our silver is taken to Europe to pay for our commodities, or bought here in our silver coins to purchase them, what would be the difference in the price of our bullion abroad to be used there as money in buying our commodities and the price of bullion there under free coinage in Europe on an international agreement?

It is manifest, then, that our commodities would be sold in Europe, as they are now, for gold at gold prices, increased by a greater supply of gold from this country. It is not within the scope of human power to keep this country on the gold basis or to put it on the silver basis. The ability of the United States is so varied and wonderful, and is capable of such expansion in its application to the development of our inexhaustible resources and advantages, that the problem will soon confront us: What is to be the remedy when both gold and silver, and all the capacity of both metals combined, fail to answer the demand on them as a redemption basis of representative currency, and when the substitutes for money like checks and drafts prove insufficient to meet the demands of the world's increasing population and commerce for more money? Mr. Goschen, as chancellor of the exchequer, in his place in the House of Commons in 1883, declared that the problem as I have presented it in this country would soon be presented for solution by monometallic England and Germany.

If silver is ever restored to coinage, it must be done at the old ratio and by the numerical strength of Democrats who are making this struggle for success inside of their old, time-honored, historic, Democratic party. It is known that the free coinage of silver has a most powerful support in the Republican party, and the Populists or Third Party is practically unanimous upon that question. If every voter in the United States friendly to the restoration of silver to free coinage could be united upon one man as a candidate for President it can not be seriously denied that he would be elected by an overwhelming majority. That an overwhelming majority of the whole voting population favor the independent restoration of silver to free coinage at the old ratio can not be honestly questioned. But, unfortunately, the friends of free silver coinage are divided and fighting each other in separate organizations. This division is the greatest and only obstacle in the way of success in the next Presidential election and is the main reliance of the advocates of the gold plutocracy. I feel confident that the Democratic party of the United States contains at least five times the number to be found in any other party ready to vote to restore silver to free coinage.

The whole power of the Republican party will be employed to hold free-coinage Republicans in line with their party by the force of party organization. Practically all the leaders of the Populist or Third Party will exert their influence to hold free-coinage Democrats in that organization. The friends of free coinage must come together where their numerical strength is only to be found—in the Democratic party. It is utterly unreasonable to ask free-coinage Democrats to leave their party and come to a third party, made up of a mere fraction of the strength of free coinage to be found in the Democratic party.

What the gold-standard advocates in the Democratic party mostly desire, and what their skill and ability is being employed to accomplish, is to keep free-coinage Democrats away from Democratic primaries and thereby divide them on different candidates in the final election. The most valuable aid the gold party can get is from those who are working to keep the friends of free coinage out of the Democratic party. The great aim of both parties in the financial struggle of 1896 is to get possession of the White House. Since 1873, when silver was dropped from coinage without the knowledge of the people, the enemies of the free coinage of silver have had possession of the White House and every Executive Department of the Government. The veto is a powerful weapon of the gold champions in the warfare against silver.

It has been exercised three times to prevent legislation friendly to silver. It blocked the way of the passage of a free-coinage bill in 1890, and the Sherman makeshift was substituted for free coinage to avoid the exercise of the veto power by President Harrison. The friends of free coinage had a pronounced majority in both Houses in the Fifty-third Congress, but the will of this majority was paralyzed by the presence of the veto power in the hands of President Cleveland. Thus it has been made manifest that a majority of the people may demand the restoration of silver to free coinage through their trusted representatives in both branches of the law-making power, but one man decides that no such bill shall become a law by his approval. The different parties in the same election send representatives to Congress to pass a free-coinage bill, but one man in the White House blocks the way as now, so that it must be conceded that no legislation friendly to silver can become a law while Mr. Cleveland is President.

What, then, is the financial condition of the country under laws that are now in operation, and must remain in operation until changed by legislation? As the law now stands, and as now construed and sought to be executed by the executive department of the Government, gold is the single standard of value and the sole basis of redemption of everything that is called sound money. Primarily it is claimed that there is now no money that is sound but gold, and every other description of currency is recognized as sound money for the sole reason that it is all falsely claimed to be redeemable in gold. It is admitted that our whole financial system depends for its existence and support upon one coin standard and one redemption basis made by one metal. It is also admitted that about $100,000,000 of borrowed gold constitutes the entire dimensions and strength of the standard of value and redemption basis that is available by the Government.

This $100,000,000 of gold is lying idle in the Treasury, dedicated to the single purpose of redeeming greenbacks and Sherman notes. More than half of the remaining $400,000,000 of gold outside the Treasury is in bank vaults as a checking basis for what is known as confidence or credit substitutes for gold in use by banks and clearing houses in settlements among themselves and for speculative uses. The balance of our gold supply outside the Treasury cuts comparatively but little figure in currency circulation that makes markets and prices. As a standard of value and redemption basis our gold supply makes the standard of value and redemption basis practically theoretical and nominal, with no real vitalizing power in our domestic trade and industrial pursuits. What is gold and what is our present supply of gold worth as a redemption basis of our currency supply? For all possible availability our entire gold supply is less than one-third of what is called our redeemable currency, and four-fifths of all our gold is outside of the Treasury and can be reached only by the sale of gold bonds. Our present supply of silver, coined and stamped by the Government as primary standard money, has been degraded by a perversion of the law that declared it to be standard money to the condition of secondary money, with no element of soundness except what it is falsely alleged to have on account of being hypothetically redeemable in gold which has no existence except in the will and pleasure of the New York bond syndicate. The whole system of gold finance now endeavored to be upheld is founded entirely upon Government credit that is available for the sale of gold bonds without a dollar's benefit to the country. There is no law in existence that makes silver secondary money, and no law that makes silver redeemable in gold. The whole pretense is founded upon a manifest perversion of the parity clause in the repealing act of 1893.

If it were a fact that our silver dollars were not worth more than 50 cents in gold, and that every holder of a silver dollar had the right to convert it into a 100-cent gold dollar, it would be a physical impossibility to obstruct the raid of the holders of silver dollars upon the Treasury to have their 50-cent dollars turned into gold dollars. If coined silver is really worth only half the value of coined gold, it is robbery to take our 100-cent gold dollars and exchange them for silver dollars worth only 50 cents; it is felonious. If the raid of the silver holders upon the Treasury to get gold were to commence to-morrow, as it would if the goldites tell the truth, they would not find a single gold dollar in the Treasury to exchange for their silver, and these silver holders would have to be sent back home until Mr. Cleveland could issue $600,000,000 of bonds to sell to Belmont and Pierpont Morgan to get gold enough to redeem our present supply of silver.

So much for the false pretense of making gold a redemption basis of our present supply of silver. But these gold advocates feel no apprehension on account of their unfounded assertion that our silver is redeemable in gold; because they know the assertion has no support in fact and the people have too much use for silver and confidence in it as money ever to be deluded into going to the Treasury to have it redeemed in gold. But the executive branch of the Government, with its head in the White House and its advisers in New York, are in a sea of trouble on account of the existence of the $346,000,000 of greenbacks that can not be reduced in amount under the law of 1878 that compels their reissue when redeemed, and also on account of the existence of the Sherman coin notes, amounting to about $146,000,000, which are allowed to be redeemed in gold.

The old greenback currency, which has been in use by the people as sound and safe currency for over thirty years, is greater in amount by $130,000,000 than the entire present circulation of the national banks. Greenback money was such a great favorite in the early years of its existence that the bonds of the United States were made redeemable in greenbacks, and it is an interesting fact that when Seymour was indorsed for President by the Democratic State convention of New York in 1868 the platform declared that the United States bonds were payable in greenbacks.

It is also an interesting fact that the same Democratic party lately in State convention in New York have declared in their platform that these same greenbacks ought to be retired from circulation and canceled, and that the same United States bonds must be paid in gold, or the Government will be discredited. There is also an interesting fact that when Mr. SHERMAN, as the financial leader of the Republican party, struck down silver in 1873 and got it out of the way of the gold standard and the national banks, the next obstacle in the way of the champions of gold and the national banks was this same greenback currency. Silver and greenbacks were both favorites of the people and of the Democratic party, but objects of hostility to the gold and national bank champions east of Washington. What movement was made by Mr. Sherman, as Secretary of the Treasury, to get rid of greenbacks after stopping the coinage of silver in 1873? Without authority of law, Secretary Sherman usurped the right to inaugurate the practice of redeeming greenbacks in gold when on their face they are redeemable in any lawful dollars. The gold-redemption policy was inaugurated as an inducement to the holders of the greenbacks to present them for redemption so that they could be retired and their place taken by national-bank bills.

This unauthorized practice was continued until it became a custom in the Treasury of redeeming greenbacks in gold, and without authority of law $100,000,000 in gold was reserved in the Treasury and dedicated to the sole purpose of redeeming greenbacks. This unauthorized custom had its origin in the interest of the national banks, so as to secure to them the place occupied by greenbacks in our volume of currency. It was considered a certainty that if greenbacks were redeemed in gold and canceled, the banks would soon have them retired from circulation and they would secure the monopoly of supplying the people with a currency. The banks made a raid on the Treasury for the redemption of greenbacks in gold and caused such a great contraction in our circulation in a few months that great alarm was produced throughout the West and South. For the purpose of putting a stop to this alarming contraction of the currency, bills were introduced in both Houses of Congress requiring that when greenbacks were redeemed they should be reissued and kept in circulation.

A bill for this purpose passed both Houses of Congress in April, 1878, and in the Senate the vote was 48 to 18.

Six of the 18 were gold-standard Democratic Senators from Eastern States, the same Democracy who are now trying to destroy the greenbacks, as they have succeeded in stopping the silver coinage. The law of 1878 compelling the reissue of greenbacks was the severest blow ever given the policy of contraction that has always been the paramount object of national banks and other money owners and money lenders. When silver was in the way of the gold contractionists they struck it down, not because it was silver, but because it was the most insurmountable obstacle they had to encounter in their purpose to get control of the supply of currency. For the same reason, greenbacks being in the way of contraction, and a standing menace to the gold standard, they must be retired out of existence and their place given to national banks. In its essence and character the gold system is necessarily founded on and productive of a contracted money supply. The circulation of currency can never be made greater than the gold basis upon which it depends for redemption, and this unalterable law insures a constantly diminishing supply of money, a descending scale of prices, languishing industries, dull markets, and hard times.

This law and its inevitable effects are fully understood by the advocates of the gold standard. The most dangerous representative money to the present maintenance of the gold standard is confessed by the President and his Secretary to be greenbacks. Under the law compelling the reissue of greenbacks when redeemed in gold the more valuable gold becomes; on account of the scarcity of money and increased purchasing power of gold, the greater the danger becomes that avaricious gold sharks will accumulate greenbacks for the purpose of making a raid upon any gold reserve in the Treasury.

The availability of greenbacks to satisfy the greed of gold sharks, and the use made of them for that purpose, has been fully established by recent experience. Under these circumstances it is a manifest necessity of the policy of contraction, which has been so declared by the President and Secretary Carlisle in their last utterances upon this subject, that the law requiring greenbacks to be reissued shall be repealed by the present Congress or the Congress and President to be elected in 1896. The confession is made public that the present gold policy of the administration can not be sustained as long as greenbacks and Sherman notes remain in circulation.

While the restoration of silver to free coinage is the paramount issue in future affirmative legislation, which can not be now secured over the veto of the President, it is a manifest fact that the destruction of greenbacks is to be the paramount issue with the gold-standard champions, who know they have the powerful aid of the President, which is worthless without the concurrent sanction of both Houses of Congress in repealing an existing law. The lawmakers are in the affirmative on this issue involving the life of the greenbacks, and would have had the same position on the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law, if it had not been surrendered to Executive influence. I think I can speak for the Senate, and safely give the assurance that no bill that repeals the act of 1878, requiring the reissue of greenbacks, can pass this body. The gold-standard advocates have cornered themselves, and they must wriggle awhile on the inability of their gold basis to support our present superstructure of representative currency. When the Democratic and Republican conventions meet it will be made manifest that the gold standard and its kindred measure of contraction have come to a deadlock, and that Congress refuses to relieve the Administration by destroying greenbacks with gold obtained by the issue and sale of gold bonds. So that no ingenuity to be employed in framing straddling and double-meaning platforms to mislead the people can avoid making known unmistakably how the two conventions stand on the two paramount questions involving the continued destruction of silver and the future destruction of greenbacks.

If the conventions of the two national parties refuse to pledge themselves to the restoration of silver to free coinage, and declare in favor of continuing gold as the only standard of value and the only redemption basis of currency, they will be compelled to pledge themselves to repealing the law requiring greenbacks to be reissued when redeemed, and leaving the national banks the sole power of supplying the people a currency and regulating thereby the prices of labor, property, and productions in the United States. It is a significant fact that the same Democratic party that elected Tilden President also elected the members of the Congress that passed the Bland-Allison silver law in 1878, and at the same session, within a few days of each other, passed the act requiring greenbacks to be reissued when redeemed; and, most remarkable to relate, a Democratic President asks that same Democratic party to join him in repealing both these laws, to destroy both silver and greenbacks, and thereby strangle its own offspring.

Can any party carry these two mill rocks around its neck and avoid being sunk out of the reach of resurrection? The people must decide, and the future will record their verdict. Let us contemplate the possibility that both silver and greenbacks are to be destroyed and national banks left with the absolute power to regulate the supply of money and its distribution. What then is to be the future of this country? If national banks are to be the only source of currency supply, and if it be true that the prosperity of the country depends largely on the quantity of money in circulation, it becomes highly important to examine into the practice of national banks in the past in the exercise of this far-reaching power—a power considered as important and as dangerous as was ever exercised by any government on earth. It is conceded that the power and duty of furnishing an adequate supply of currency, the kind and safety of the currency to the bill holder, and the equal and just distribution of the currency among the people, are among the most difficult powers any government can exercise. Shall the Government abdicate these vital and dangerous powers to corporations of individuals?

Shall the Government issue this currency directly or shall it charter banks, and confer upon them the power and duty of supplying the people with a sound and adequate currency equally and fairly distributed, or shall the Government and the banks join in the exercise of this power? If banks are to be granted the sole power of issue, shall this franchise be given alone to national banks, or shall it be divided between national and State banks? And if divided between national and State banks, how shall the division be made? Upon these several questions the Democratic party is seriously divided and nearly as difficult to be harmonized as it is to harmonize the party on the gold standard and the restoration of silver to free coinage.

I have always been in favor of requiring the Federal Government to discharge the duty imposed upon it by the Constitution, of supplying the people with an adequate amount of currency, without shifting the responsibility upon fiscal corporations in the shape of national banks. The national banking system of the United States will compare favorably with any in the world, notwithstanding its liability to abuse, as shown in its history; but I am opposed to conferring upon national or State banks the absolute power of supplying the people of the United States with currency and deciding the amount of currency to be issued and how and when it shall be distributed. My greatest objection to the national banking system has always been and is now to the power they possess and have exercised of contracting at their will and pleasure the amount of currency issued to meet the demands of the people in their trade and commerce. There never has been a time during the existence of the national banks when they were bolder than they are to-day in seeking the sole power of supplying currency to be exercised for the purpose of establishing and enforcing the London and New York system of currency contraction to regulate markets and prices.

No Sovereign in England ever possessed a more dangerous power or would dare to exercise it to promote their interest to the same extent that it has been and would be exercised for such purpose by our national banks.

How have the national banks heretofore exercised the power of supplying the people with currency? It would consume a day to go into the history of the operations of the national banks the last quarter of a century. As a rule all the large national banks now do business on their deposits and realize immense profits. They attach but little value to the right of issuing bills under their present charters and under existing banking laws. The 4,000 national banks have out now $150,000,000 less circulation than was issued by 2,700 of these banks.

I desire to call especial attention to what a powerful factor the deposit system is in promoting the policy of currency contraction. As a rule people who make deposits in banks have a surplus of money and are generally free from debt. It is true that small sums aggregating large amounts are deposited in savings banks and in banks of issue, but the largest deposits are made by capitalists who hoard their money and keep it out of circulation, except when opportunity offers of making investments in bonds or gilt-edge securities.

It is also a fact that large sums are deposited by stockholders in national banks and the banks themselves keep a large surplus, accumulated in their business, and in these many ways the banks thrive and acquire riches by the use of capital on which they pay no interest or taxes. Every dollar the banks issue in their own bills adds that much to the volume of currency.

Every dollar that would be added to the present supply of money by the free coinage of silver would lessen the value of money deposited in banks, diminish its purchasing power, curtail bank loans and discounts, and greatly reduce annual dividends of banking corporations. Another powerful factor in promoting and enforcing the policy of currency contraction is gold and the gold standard of value and the gold basis of redemption currency.

I have already stated that gold itself enters but little into general circulation and can not be made into coins like silver that can be handled by the people in daily trade and ordinary business transactions. Money owners know these facts, and hence they selected gold for free coinage and excluded silver from the mints. When England established the gold standard her financiers had the sagacity to stop the coinage of silver only on private account. The Government of England has the right to coin silver, and she exercises that right every year to keep her people supplied with fractional silver coins in their retail trade.

England coined $10,000,000 of fractional silver in the two years of 1893 and 1894. You will be surprised to learn, on the authority of the report of President Cleveland's Comptroller of the Currency in December, 1885, that under act of Parliament of 1844 the Bank of England, in addition to the notes authorized to be issued on the security of the Government debt, is permitted to issue notes equal in amount to the bullion or coin which is transferred to and held in the vaults of the issue department of the bank. Of the coin and bullion held, says the Comptroller, 25 per cent may consist of silver, but it is very seldom that any circulation of the bank is issued on silver. So that the working people of England—the mechanics, the miners, the operators in factories, the servants, and railroad hands—are paid in silver coins with less silver in them than in our silver dollar. These people never see a gold coin, and gold is comparatively unknown among them as currency.

As a rule, gold never goes into general circulation in gold-standard countries. The reports of the Comptroller of the Currency show that hundreds of millions in gold have been deposited by gold owners in the Treasury and gold certificates of deposit issued by the Secretary. But to guard against these gold certificates going into circulation and to insure their use only in large settlements by the banks themselves most of the certificates are taken by the depositors in sums of $10,000 and $5,000, and none less than $500. But the most valuable invention of the banks to make up the insufficient supply of gold to meet their own demands and convenience in the important part they take in the trade and commerce of the people is the invention of checks and drafts as substitutes for money, called confidence or credit currency.

This check system in bank and clearing-house settlements dispenses with the actual use of 95 per cent of the amount of money involved in bank and clearing-house settlements.

The clearing house in New York is composed of 65 banks and the subtreasury. The settlements in the clearing house running through a year frequently aggregate over fifty billions of dollars, and not as much as 5 per cent of this vast amount was paid in money. The 95 per cent was settled in the checks drawn on and by the banks that were members of the clearing house.

If Congress can ever be induced to repeal the law requiring the reissue of greenbacks when redeemed, and authority granted to the President and Secretary to issue 3 per cent bonds payable in gold without limit, in amount to sustain the gold standard, and retire and cancel the greenbacks and Sherman coin notes, amounting to about $500,000,000, thereby contracting the currency over one-third of the entire amount in existence, and over one-half the present amount in circulation, such a panic would follow as would drive this country into revolution, and the only suggestion of any remedy to mitigate the evils of such unprecedented contraction is to trust to the national banks to fill up the vacuum created by the destruction of greenbacks and Sherman notes with the bills of national banks, to be issued at their will and pleasure to the amount of $500,000,000, to be added to their present circulation of $207,000,000, making over $700,000,000 of national-bank bills.

Who is reckless enough to express the belief that the national banks can be trusted to issue such an amount of their bills to fill up the vacuum created by the destruction of the greenbacks and Sherman notes? If the banks could be compelled to issue their bills to the amount of $700,000,000 how could the banks float that amount of currency redeemable in gold? It would be impossible, and the banks will take no such risk. The national-bank bills would instantly take the place of the greenbacks and be absorbed by gold sharks and gamblers to draw gold out of the banks just as they now do so with greenbacks out of the Treasury. No, Mr. President, the gold system of finance can not be made to operate successfully in this country without inevitable disaster and ruin. It is bound to work its own destruction.

Mr. President, I will conclude by making a part of my remarks an article on the currency headed "Gold versus the Farmers," written by the largest cotton raiser in Alabama, known to me personally from his boyhood. He is one of the most practical and successful business men, who has made finance a study, and his argument is unanswerable.

GOLD VERSUS THE FARMER.

Mr. SHERMAN testified, and no one doubts the testimony, that the inflation of our currency by the issuing of many millions of greenbacks was followed by unexampled prosperity to every class of citizens except the money man, the fellow with the bills receivable, will emphasize the fact that at that time there was no coin in circulation. If a man wanted gold or silver he bargained for it. Yet Mr. SHERMAN said that laborers were well paid, farmers prospered, manufacturers got rich, and there was no word of complaint except from the creditor, and that was because his notes and mortgages were paid and there were no bargains being offered, and Mr. SHERMAN admitted that this was best for the community as the creditor could better afford to suffer. And the histories of all times and countries verify Mr. SHERMAN, that inflation with redeemable or intercommercial money is always attended by prosperity to the masses. This being the case—and no sane man will deny it—the only question at issue with the farmer and the masses and all directly interested in their welfare, has gold monometallism as it now exists brought contraction, is that contraction to their hurt, and will silver free coinage bring inflation, and is that inflation to their benefit? To-day our primal or money of last redemption is gold alone. And this about six hundred millions, or $10 per capita. When it suits the interest of a goldite he will parade the fact that we have ever so many millions of silver dollars more than ever before in our history, and that it is as good a dollar as any other dollar, and then stultifies himself by saying that the Government has no right to use this very good dollar to pay interest on coin bonds and to redeem legal tenders, and that it is right with its vaults full of those dollars to sell again and again other coin bonds, at a loss of many millions of dollars, to get the gold with which to pay claims that the contract states can be paid in coin.

Our present currency then, by the example of the Government itself, is based on gold, and it is enough to scare away from any enterprise whatever prudent men, who see the makeshifts to which our great Government has to resort to keep gold in its vaults. For ten years contraction has been going on. Depression in every class of business except money lending has kept by its side. Mr. SHERMAN said that inflation helped all business except the money lender. Contraction then hurts all business except the money lender. I will appeal to all citizens if for the last ten years any business has flourished except that of the money lender. Mankind is selfish. We all work for self and incidentally to benefit mankind. The law demonetizing silver was secured by Mr. SHERMAN, the representative of capitalists. When silver, the one-half of our money metal, was stricken from our currency, the remaining half, gold, was doubled in value; that is, to every man who owed money the debt was doubled, and every man who had or raised anything to sell got half price, and every man who had money could buy double as much; and this was done by a statute and in the interest of capitalists.

The free coinage of silver—who is fighting it the hardest? The gold mines, the money lenders of every description. Have we any gold mines down here? Have we any capitalist? It is true we have citizens with dabs of money and the Cleveland idea, who are sententiously for sound money. And I challenge anyone of them to explain the difference between the soundness of the two metals, both being under free coinage. Either one of them would be worth as much in one man's pocket as any other man's, and as much in one country as in any other country. The stamp of the Government simply gives legal-tender rights, and it would place the two metals in competition, and that means, as all competitions mean, that the one would restrict the price of the other. As regards the benefit to the silver mines, it would only come as silver advances.

The silverites assert, and they have all time and history with them, that to the extent the use of silver was increased that silver would advance, that to the very extent the use of gold was decreased that gold would decline. America owns the bulk of the silver mines, and the United States is the largest individual owner of silver, and would consequently be most benefited by the advance. England owns the majority of the gold mines, and is the largest holder of gold, and has been most benefited by the advance in gold, and would lose most by the decline, and we are called upon to sacrifice our own property for the benefit of any other man's property. It is asserted that the remonetization of silver would drive all the gold out and cause a panic. Does any man in Alabama know of a man or set of men who would turn their gold or any other property loose without they were willing and without getting market price? A business man will sell anything he has if the price is satisfactory, and there is no power on earth to make him do otherwise.

Under free coinage we would have the two moneys. If it paid to sell all the gold and keep the silver, would somebody explain how that would hurt us? If the gold went to glut markets of Europe, would it not make it cheaper there, and would not our crops which are exported and which will be measured into this very gold bring more of it? The United States depends almost entirely for its gold upon the cotton and other farm products which are exported. Is it our interest to bid gold up by withdrawing silver, or bid it down by using silver? The higher we bid it up the less we will get. The cheaper gold the more cotton will bring. The only way to cheapen gold is by using a substitute. Silver has up to the last twenty years been that substitute and competitor. And is there anything in recent years to make the farmer think that contraction is good for him? Money was intended for the convenience of man, not for his tyrant and master. Whether money is white or yellow has nothing to do with prosperity. Seven years' big crops made Egypt rich. A succession of big crops make American farmers poor, and yet abundant yields is the idealism of farming. And yet we are told by the goldite press that we make too much cotton, too much corn, too much everything; that it is the quantity that puts the price down. And yet the same press will assert that if we double the quantity of metal out of which we make primal money that we will have no money at all. Captain Johnson stated, and it is so, that in every gold-standard country the farmer had a hard struggle for a living and was getting poorer all the time, and that Japan and Mexico, silver countries, were developing faster, getting rich faster, than any other nation, and that more capital was going into Mexico for development than into the United States.

A lot of promoters insanely clamor for sound money in order to fix us a basis of credit, overlooking the fact that Lazarus never had any credit, and that prosperity, no matter what medium of exchange, is the only basis of credit. And to day we see the United States, at the dictum of Wall street, staggering under a load of credit, and the daughters of those very men made doubly rich by statute, in the utmost magnificence, marrying dukes and earls, and their sons startling the world with the extravagance of their displays.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the conference report upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the resolutions relative to the war in Cuba be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). The Senator from Alabama calls up the conference report indicated by him. The question is upon concurring in the report, upon which he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have on several occasions since I have been in this body experienced the disadvantage of being compelled to break an argument upon a question in half and proceed on some later day to complete it. I never felt this disadadvantage more seriously than I do to-day. It seems to me that this is a case that deserves consecutive argument and treatment, because it involves principles of law which are intricate and undecided in the United States, and it involves also our relations with a foreign Government, which are delicate at this moment of time, are the subject of considerable irritation, an irritation not provoked by anything that has been done either by the people or the Government of the United States, but provoked, as I understand it, by the supersensitiveness of Spain, because she feels that the sand is crumbling from under her feet and that she is about to lose the beautiful gem of the Antilles to which she attaches such a vast importance, and always has, and justly. This gem of the Antilles is an orange that Spain and her feudal lords have been sucking now for nearly four centuries. While it is true that they have very nearly gotten all the substance, all of the juice and sweetness out of it, it still remains as the only territory that they seem to have a particular fondness for, and it seems to gratify all the tastes of Spain for dominion and power, accompanied with the control of men and things in the sense of the severest despotism.

The paper that I last read and commented upon yesterday was the best statement that the Spanish minister could then make, on the 11th of January, as to the prospects of Spain in her efforts to suppress the rebellion in Cuba. It was hastily withdrawn from the committee, no copy being left with us, and no one on the committee has seen it, I think, or has scarcely remembered its existence, until I presented it to the Senate yesterday, after it had been made the subject of animadversion of a somewhat severe character by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] against the Committee on Foreign Relations. His animadversions, if they are due to anybody, are due to the Secretary of State and the Spanish minister, his particular friend, and I dislike to become a sort of scapegoat for what the Senator now finds upon looking into the subject is the fault, if fault of any person, of Mr. Olney and Mr. Dupuy de Lôme.

That is a very weak statement, if it was then, or is now, all that Spain has to say about the Cubans and the war they are waging, and about her power to suppress the rebellion. I do not know why it has been held in seclusion, but I suppose, rationally I think, that this forecast of Spanish success and this prophecy of the suppression of the rebellion have been so utterly disproved by subsequent events that the reproduction of this paper would discredit Spain's capacity as a diviner of the future, and would increase into a wail of despair the note of anxious apprehension which pervades that statement.

Never was a demand for liberty met with a feebler protest; never was the success of an enemy disparaged by so weak a refutation; never did a victor have to recount so many defeats, such artful strategy, and so many narrow escapes, as the story of this war reveals as it is told in the letter of General Campos and the comments of the Spanish minister upon this semitragic warfare.

The plea of the Cubans for liberty is answered by the assertion that negroes are fighting those fierce yet sacred battles. The plea for independence is answered by the assertion that Gomez is a Dominican and Maceo a mulatto, and they could not conduct civil government if they had independence. The plea for humanity is answered by the fact the supplicants are mere subjects, not citizens with a voice that can even utter a prayer—poor, dejected outcasts without the right to human benevolence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, without losing its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. The plea set up by the Spanish minister for a further exercise of our long-suffering patience is that these miserable wretches are exceedingly hard to whip, because they will not stand up in line and be shot down. That, having few arms, little ammunition, and no artillery, after they have delivered a single blow they seek shelter in the thick woods, after the example of that fox, Francis Marion, whose headquarters were in the islets of the Dismal Swamp, in our Revolution. They are accused of discarding the strategy and high etiquette of chivalric warfare, knowing that the Spaniards who will kill them when they are captured, though they are left wounded on the field of battle, will receive honors, badges, and promotions for such service. Yet they turn their prisoners free, because they can not feed them and have no prisons like the Isle of Pines, Fernando Po, or Ceuta in Africa, to which they can condemn them, in chain gangs, to perpetual imprisonment.

These lawless rebels are charged with being naked and barefooted, without commissary trains, and in such bad plight and of such fierce and daring nature that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] exhibits the deepest abhorrence when denouncing them as "guerrillas" and "savages."

For more than two centuries we have fought savages, in guerrilla warfare, savages compared with whom the worst of the Cubans and some of the Spaniards are preux chevaliers—very angels of light; yet our history in these five hundred wars has been humane, and we have never refused belligerent rights, as to the humanities of warfare, to any Indian tribe engaged in open hostilities. It is otherwise in Cuba, where the barbarities practiced by the monarchy, in former wars, of old, and of late, and at present, have provoked retaliation until human life, like that of serpents and noxious worms and beasts of prey, is considered as being fit only for extinction.

Spain has made this bad record so distinctly a part of her history that her wars with Cubans blush with the crimson hue of murder and are blackened with rapine as a universal assumption of fact. When the Spanish minister was sending his "memorandum" to the Senate committee as a plea for delay, we had the right to recur to the facts of the history of the last war of Cuba for independence, and to the outcry of the world against their repetition in the present war, and to ask ourselves if we could afford to give our silent acquiescence to the Spanish assertion that a million people are rebel traitors and deserve death in any form that Spanish ferocity or vengeance shall choose to inflict. We dared not to give such an answer to the petitions of our people, yet we were constrained into longer silence by our duty and our reverence toward our own country. We were compelled to answer that there is no reasonable ground for the expectation of any change for the better in the character of the present war.

The furtive allusion to sugar in the memorandum of the Spanish minister which I read yesterday, and to the burned plantations of our citizens in Cuba, intended to sweeten the invocation of our sympathy and for our aid in crushing the rebellion, did not serve to convince us that Spain, without our aid, could again subjugate these people in their war for justice, liberty, and life. That covert plea was almost a conclusive proof that Spain had despaired of success.

That memorandum treats of Cuba as a mere feudatory of Spain, whose people are incapable of self-government and do not deserve the treatment even that is due to coolies or serfs. This is the true relation between Spain and Cuba that has been established by the cruelties of that Monarchy. This is the blot on the escutcheon of Spain that will not out. It is not provincial or colonial; it is only feudal. What voice Cuba has in the Spanish Cortes is the voice of rulers selected for them and seduced into tyrannical exactions upon them by divisions of the spoils gained from their robbery.

The feudalists of Spain have their friends and supporters among the feudalists in Europe and America. Of late that new rank has had a great accession of strength, even in this plain Republic, notably among the nouveau richesse. Their power seems to brood over this Senate and to check the earnest movement of the people in the direction that their noble ancestry have never refused to march, whatever the peril or the cost. Facts that prove the existence of open war in Cuba are admitted in the memorandum of the Spanish minister, sent to the committee through the Secretary of State, which I read yesterday. And yet the feudalists demand further proof. The existence of an organized civil government among the insurrectionists, that they at least obey, is distinctly admitted by the Spanish minister. But its efficacy is denied, and it is alleged that it has no permanent capital.

It is the existence of war and not its atrocities, Mr. President, or its prospects of ultimate success, that gives to us the right to assert our neutrality as between these belligerents.

If open war exists in Cuba we can not afford to call it peace. As it is a war for the liberty of nearly 2,000,000 people, we are not unjust or inimical to Spain if our sympathies go out to the Cubans who put their existence in the scale, finding that life is intolerable under Spanish persecution.

It is not the location of the civil government, it is not its capacity to command the allegiance, the support, or the obedience of the people outside of the domain of its military command, but inside that territory, that fixes its right to recognition as a belligerent power. A de facto civil government, having power to command obedience to its decrees, within its military command, whether that power is civil or military, is a government that can conduct lawful warfare under the laws of nations. It needs no capital or seaport or garrisoned fortresses to prove its right to fight for the liberties of its supporters.

We did not hold permanently a single seaport during our war for independence, and our Congress, like a hunted hare, had its seat wherever it found temporary shelter.

The next open appearance of the Spanish minister, as he seems to be working a crusade for political influence and power against the Congress of the United States, is his appeal from an indulgent Congress, acting within the limits of its duty and without injustice to Spain, over its head to the people of the United States.

When the people of the United States, who are our constituents, impeach us and become our judges on the demand of a supercilious foreign minister, it will be high time for the Senate and the House to close their doors and go into retirement, for then it will become true, as it never has yet been true in America, that a foreign representative of a monarchy can call in question the House and the Senate, and members of the House and members of the Senate, for words uttered in debate on these floors, against which our Constitution protects us.

Before proceeding to discuss this matter I will first ask the Secretary to read that appeal and the answer of the agent of the Cuban Republic to it, and I will then remark upon both papers as coming from men who are equally reliable. I can not assume when dealing with Spaniards who speak unofficially that the office they may hold enhances their authority or that a Cuban is not entitled to credit because his credentials are not signed with the royal signet of Spain. I will ask the Secretary to read from the remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], which I will send to the desk, what the Spanish minister had to say in his celebrated diatribe against the Senate and against Senators particularly, commencing on page 2941 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Secretary read as follows:

Senator SHERMAN, in the sitting of February 28, quoted freely, among other things, from an article published in a New York morning paper of Sunday, February 23. He said, giving in very strong language his opinion of the present commander-in-chief of the Spanish army in Cuba, the following: "A book was published in Spanish, which I am very sorry I can not get from the library, written by a Spaniard by the name of Enrique Donderio, who came over from Spain with the Spanish troops to see the war of 1872, and who was so horror-stricken with the high crimes that he saw committed that he flew to the United States and there published his manuscript. Telling is this evidence, and it shows General Weyler," etc.

I have made an investigation about that book, and I have found that the name of the author is not Enrique Donderio, as originally printed, but Enrique Donderis. For this reason probably the Senator was unable to find the book in the Congressional Library. Should he have found it, he would have seen that in the book, which is a small pamphlet of 43 pages, not a single time the name of General Weyler is mentioned.

I have carefully read, and have had the pamphlet read by other persons, and I see in it that many horrors are described attributed both to the Spaniards and to the rebels, but in it, as I said before, and as I most emphatically affirm again, the name of General Weyler is not mentioned one single time. I have the book at the disposal of anybody who would like to controvert my statement.

I have been told that that person, Enrique Donderis, was a Spanish officer who fought in Spain against the Government, and was sent to Cuba. He fought there in the Spanish side, then deserted, and afterwards fought in the rebel ranks. But, although this fact has been stated by a Cuban sympathizer, it can not be vouched by me, and it is of no consequence.

What is important is that the honorable Senator from Ohio said in good faith that all the crimes that he related were attributed by Spanish authorities to General Weyler, and that his good faith has been imposed upon. General Weyler went to Cuba as a lieutenant-colonel in 1869, and returned to Spain as a brigadier-general in 1873. A part of the campaign he held the position of staff officer, he being one of the general staff, and some time later he held the position of colonel of a regiment of volunteers, which was made up and paid by the merchants of Habana. He defended the town of Holguin, being commander-general of that jurisdiction, but he has never had in Cuba other position than that of a subordinate officer.

In my investigations I have read many pamphlets written by Cubans during the war from 1868 to 1878, with all the natural bias when a contest is standing, and have failed to see the name of General Weyler recorded as responsible for the horrors that now, when he is at the head of the army against the rebels, are attributed to him.

MR. MORGAN AND HIS AUTHORITY.

Senator MORGAN, in the sitting of February 24, said that, according to official reports forwarded from Madrid by the United States minister, "13,000 Cubans had been killed in battle up to August, 1872, besides 43,500 prisoners, whom the Spanish minister admitted to have been put to death."

Senator MORGAN said that his authority was the American Cyclopedia. A friend of mine addressed Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., publishers of the cyclopedia, inquiring as to the authority of the book quoted by Senator MORGAN. In reply to his inquiry, Mr. Rossiter Johnson, associate editor of the American Cyclopedia, says that the article was written by Mr. Antonio Bachillery Morales, a Cuban, who was a decided and partial enemy of Spain, and that he presumes that it will be easy to get access to the official reports in the Department of State at Washington. I have accepted the advice, and in the State Department the following answer has been given me: "The minister of the United States to Spain, on the date of August 16, 1872, quoted from the Imparcial, described as a semiofficial journal of Madrid, of which the colony minister was the director until he entered the present cabinet, the following: 'From the beginning of the hostilities in Cuba 13,600 insurgents have been killed in battle, and 43,500 taken prisoners,' the minister adds, 'as it is believed that all prisoners of war taken are shot or garroted.'"

It is plain that the American minister, who was General Sickles, read the statement in a paper. The paper (El Imparcial) was owned by a cabinet minister (Señor Casset y Artime). General Sickles said, in a general way, that it was believed that the prisoners were all shot or garroted. Of course, that is not true; that simply is a belief, an opinion. From the expression of a belief an official report is made; from the statement in a newspaper that the prisoners were taken the conclusion that they were executed is derived, and because the Imparcial was the property of a minister of the cabinet the assertion is advanced that a cabinet officer admitted that they had been put to death. That has been said in the United States Senate and indorsed by a vote of that high body.

MR. LODGE AND A GARBLED INTERVIEW.

Senator CABOT LODGE, in a speech made on the 25th of February, quoted from the Liberal, of Madrid, an interview sent by telegraph from Cadiz in the moment in which General Weyler embarked for Cuba. The translation which has been given to the Senator from Massachusetts is a fraud. My attention was called to it by a telegram from Mr. Taltavull, correspondent in the United States of the Liberal, from Madrid, and a former member of the Cortes. This distinguished gentleman wired to me: "General Weyler never said, in any interview or conversation published in the Liberal, that he would exterminate the filibusters. What he said was that he would clean out the western provinces of Cuba of filibusters, and that he would exterminate the small bands of bandits." I have now before me the text of that interview. I will not stop to discuss the historical importance of a nonauthorized interview. But, even taking as granted that General Weyler said what is printed, the words that the person who has furnished documents to Senator CABOT LODGE have made him pronounce are not exact. The exact translation of what General Weyler said is: "On my arrival to Cuba I propose in the first place to clean out of filibusters the provinces of Habana, Pinar del Rio, and Las Villas; be it well understood that I refer for the moment to the large bands which have invaded them. Then will remain the small bands of bandits, which I will exterminate gradually."

Nobody can believe that General Weyler in the word "exterminate" meant to put to death; but even if that sense is applied to his words, it is necessary to understand what those bands of bandits in Cuba are and have been. I would like to know the opinion that the American planters, respectable, lawabiding citizens, who are working for their own interests and for the prosperity of Cuba, have in that respect; what would be done in this country with the people who have been kidnaping and blackmailing the honest toilers living out in the country. What treatment do they think deserve people like Manuel Garcia, Mirabal, Matagas, Perico Delgado, and others? The paper to which I refer is at the disposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, and of anybody who wants to see it.

CRUELTIES OF WAR.

I can not understand how all rules of war that have been given by all civilized nations are so criminal, so cruel, and so tyrannical when they are applied to Cuba. I have before my eyes a summary of charges of inhumanity in connection with the war of the rebellion in the United States to both sides, taken from American history. I am sure that many of them are false, most of them exaggerated, some necessary, and others unavoidable. But, taking only as an illustration and for the sake of argument what I see in that list, I can not understand how people who are familiar with those necessary evils of war have been able to use such harsh, unjust, and offensive language against Spain.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary may read the extracts which are cited there from contemporaneous literature about the struggle in America, which show how unreliable these are.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

"In an English paper of those days I read the following opinion of the American civil war: 'Stripped of its trappings, it is a mere quarrel for territory. The antagonists are acting like Delawares and Pawnees. War to the knife, pushed to absolute extermination, is what they have resolved on, and people breathe a language of massacre and extermination.'

* * * * * * *

"This charge was no more justified than the charges which are brought now against Spain. I said nothing when that language was used in the press, but I believe it is my duty, although against the conventionalities of my position, to appeal, as I have said, to the honest common sense of the American people when those words are uttered from the Capitol of the United States.

"Nothing is now done in Cuba that has not been done and has not been deemed necessary in other countries when at war. It would be possible and easy for me to quote many facts not different from those which now arouse public sentiment against Spain. I will only ask persons wanting an impartial and honest opinion to read what the commanders-in-chief of the American armies on both sides and what those of the armies of France and Germany have deemed necessary for the protection of their soldiers and the carrying out of the war.

"General Weyler has, in my opinion, been grossly traduced. I should add I feel confident that it is owing to misinformation, to an erroneous prejudice, to systematic attacks on him personally by interested enemies that the people of the United States and their public representatives have formed a monstrously erroneous opinion about the governor-general. The question of loyal politics does not enter into the subject. No matter whether a man is an ultra-Spanish Monarchist, a Liberal, a Home Ruler, or a Separatist rebel, there is no occasion to speak untruly about an individual who is in opposition to his views.

"Campos spoke kindly of Gomez personally, and I have yet to hear that General Weyler does otherwise. I see that the American newspapers publish charges that prisoners are ill treated and killed by summary execution. Here again is an incorrect representation of facts. I have been striving for autonomy for many years. I have ardently labored in the Cortes to secure all possible reforms and benefits that could ameliorate the condition of Cuba. I love my country, Cuba, and I will do all in my power to advance her interest. When I speak as I do I think I do so disinterestedly and fairly.

"I am astonished to perceive how unacquainted with the true conditions are the public men in Washington. When Cuba lies so close to the borders of the United States it would be supposed a much wider intelligence concerning the internal affairs of the island would exist. If the book said to have been quoted in Congress against General Weyler was by Enrique Donderis, I never heard of its author. I fancy it is a nom de plume.

"WILLIAM SHAW BOWEN."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the surprise of the Spanish minister that we get no better information from Cuba would certainly indicate that he knew that the channels of information were all open; when, on the contrary, there is a strict, rigid censorship on the cable between the island and the American coast; and I was informed yesterday by a Catholic priest, who knows perfectly well Cuba and Spain, that the mails between Cuba and the United States are constantly opened and their contents examined. He is a gentleman of veracity, and evidently of impartiality, because he was very strict in his expressions and careful not to offend either against Cuba or against Spain.

We know perfectly well that the information that comes to the United States from Cuba is doctored when it comes on the telegraph lines unless it happens to be favorable to the Spanish cause. We find, however, that the Spanish Government has access over the cable lines that run through Europe and across the Atlantic Ocean to the bosom of the Senate here for the purpose of informing Senators as to all that relates to the opinions, the decrees, the judgments, the forecasts, the prognostics, and the sentiments of the Spanish Crown as expressed throngh its premier. One side of this question seems to have full access to all the information that is favorable, while it is entirely shut off from the other side. The Committee on Foreign Relations have felt this embarrassment very much, as the people of the United States have, and they have been compelled to rely upon that suspected source of information, which, after all, when it is sifted out, is the best and truest source of information—the American press.

The minister from Spain, however, did not have any difficulty in ascertaining what I had said in debate in the Senate, for the RECORD discloses exactly what I did say, and it was very presumptuous on his part to misquote me as I was reported in that RECORD and to undertake to palm that off—a false quotation—on the people of the United States as being true. I must say that I have little respect for a minister or any gentleman who will misquote a Senator on this floor when he has the RECORD before his eyes and evidently was making up his statement from that RECORD.

In answer to this arraignment of myself, along with my colleagues on the committee, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], before the bar of the American people, by the Spanish minister, I will take occasion to answer what he says as to the misquotation, or as to the affirmation which he says I made, by reading from the RECORD extracts to fully display the context of what I said on that subject.

The question was asked me by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]:

Has the captain-general ever been a Cuban?

I said:

Oh, no; that was never within the contemplation of the Government of Spain, so far as I have ever heard.

I do not know whether I am accurate about that or not, but I think I am. I had stated, as follows, a part of Spanish history in Cuba:

In 1851, 50 men of the Lopez expedition were shot in Habana. These are not referred to by General Grant except in general terms. In 1854 Pinto and his associates to the number of 100 men were shot or deported. Then followed the ten years' war from 1867 to 1878, during the progress of which these enormities occurred to which General Grant refers. Spain had more than 90,000 troops in the field in that war. In 1869 the Spanish troops committed atrocities that shocked the civilized world in the wholesale slaughter of men, women, and children in Habana at the Villa Nueva Theater, at the Louvre, and in the sacking of the house of Aldama.

The number of these cruelties is almost beyond comprehension, and the loss of life is appalling. Spain marched into the war 80,000 troops and brought out 12,000. It is stated—

Here is the particular part of it—

It is stated on high authority that—

Now, quoting from the book—

according to official reports forwarded from Madrid by the United States minister, 13,600 Cubans had been killed in battle up to August, 1872, besides 43,500 prisoners whom the Spanish minister admitted to have been put to death.

Then I say:

I confess that when I came across that statement in an authentic history to which we give credit, I read it over and over to ascertain whether it could have been possible that such a multitude of humanity had been slaughtered within 90 miles of the coast of the United States during that ten years' war; and I inquired of myself, What has Christianity been doing in the world if in this age, the nineteenth century, it has been possible that such things could be done in an island like Cuba, and that this great and free Republic could stand indifferently by, knowing the facts, and not unsheath its sword and strike the brutal monarch to death who inflicted them?

Then the junior Senator from Maine addressed the following question to me:

Mr. FRYE. I failed to catch the name of the authority for the wonderful, the horrible statement which the Senator from Alabama has just made in relation to the slaughter of prisoners to the number of over 40,000.

Mr. MORGAN. I am sorry that for the moment I can not recall his name. I will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. FRYE. It is from history?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; deliberately written, and written by a Spaniard.

The point is made there that he was a Cuban, but I suppose he is a Spaniard notwithstanding he is a Cuban, and his name shows that he is a Spaniard—

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator credit it?

Mr. MORGAN. For a long time I hesitated to credit it, but I had to credit it or else deny the evidence of a deliberate statement made by a historian in a book of universal acceptance, one of reliable authority.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Alabama state the name of the historian or the book?

Mr. MORGAN. It is the American Encyclopedia, under the title of Cuba.

Then the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] interposed to read an extract from a newspaper, for which, of course, I had no responsibility, but which, I have no doubt, presented an exact statement of facts.

The country will see, when what I have read from the RECORD appears, together with the Spanish minister's arraignment of me, that he has misquoted that RECORD and has put me as stating that it had been officially communicated to the Government of the United States that 43,500 prisoners had been shot by the Spanish Government in August, 1872. The Spanish minister, in casting his eye over all of the statement I made, could find no error in it, except as to the question whether I had stated that this statement had been made as an official communication to the United States Government. He does not deny the fact that here was the series of bloody murders which I referred to. The statement of them spread before his eyes, and he does not deny any of them, but quibbles, in his arraignment of me, upon the point whether I had asserted that that was an official document or an official report. Why did he not when he was vindicating his country and arraigning me, come out and deny what I put upon that RECORD, and which he has not denied and can not deny in the light of truth? No, sir; the facts stand confessed against Spain through the lips of her own minister, because, having full opportunity to make denial, he evades it and leaves it unanswered and tries to force a controversy with me upon a misquotation of the RECORD of this body.

I should leave that subject just there, but I think that in justice to General Sickles I ought to call the attention of the Senate, if I have the document here—I supposed I had it, but can not at the moment lay my hands on it, and I shall cite it at some other time. It is a letter written by General Sickles on that occasion to his Government, in which he made the statement, not affirming that the 43,500 people had been actually slain, but giving the evidence upon which the statement was made, it being drawn from a newspaper that was then owned and conducted by a member of the imperial cabinet. I regret that the paper has been mislaid for the moment, because I wanted to give General Sickles the benefit of the full statement of all he said, and I shall place it in the RECORD later.

Mr. President, that letter of the Spanish minister found its way into the newspapers upon an alleged right of his to go into the public prints, provided he did not sign his official name to his communication, and arraign the Senate for words uttered in debate here. Some Senators have thought that it was a light matter that he should do this, and some have brought his accusations into the Senate with a spirit almost of hilarity, and have repeated them here upon his authority against Senators. I take occasion here totally to dissent from any opinion expressed, it makes no difference by whom, to the effect that a foreign minister in this country has the right to resort to the press for the purpose of affecting any measure or matter which is then pending before the Houses of Congress, or has been recently pending, or in regard to any policy of the United States which he may consider to be offensive or injurious to his country. I may be considered a little old-fashioned in referring to authorities which have been some time forgotten, at least by members of this body, upon a question like that.

Nevertheless, I think it is well worth our while on this occasion, when this flagrant abuse of our privileges has been entered upon, that we should record our opinions upon this question even at the expense of a little public time, for it certainly is time that the diplomatic affairs of this country were withdrawn from public tinkering and tampering by foreign ministers in the newspapers, and that they were confined to official statements between the Governments concerned. If the Senate is to be continually put in an uproar and confusion by telegrams coming from the premier of the Spanish Government to some newspaper editor in the United States, to be read here as authoritative statements of the attitude of Spain in regard to this question and of its feelings and purposes, then, sir, we had as well dismiss our Secretary of State, disband the whole of the State Department, and rely upon these men who have acquired eminence in one way and another in newspaperdom for the knowledge of what is transpiring in foreign Governments with reference to our affairs and official information as to the designs and purposes of foreign Governments toward the United States.

A country that addresses the American people on diplomatic questions or situations through the newspaper press so far violates all recognized rules of courtesy as to forfeit its right to any representation at this capital. Whether it is Congress, or either of the Houses, or the members thereof that is criticised by a foreign Government, or whether it is the President, or the Supreme Court that is assailed for official conduct, the offense is the same, and is inexcusable.

I will remark here that so far as my privileges as a Senator are concerned they are, equally with those of my colleagues on this floor and the members of the House of Representatives, very sacredly guarded by the Constitution of the United States. We have the right here, in the presence and under the eye of Almighty God, to state anything that we think it proper to state relating to matters pending in Congress, and the Constitution of the United States gives us a guaranty that we shall not be called in question for it in any other place. If I, in my place, were to make a statement about a citizen of the United States who has some supposed or actual connection with public affairs which would calumniate him, and which would be actionable or indictable for libel if uttered by a private person, the Constitution of the United States, in deference to the exalted position which my State has conferred upon me and the oath that I have taken, protects me and would stand as a shield between me and that citizen, and would give to me free liberty of speech, under my own control, under my own judgment, subject only to the ruling of the Senate as to whether it was appropriate and whether it was in order.

Mr. GRAY. The citizen's freedom of speech would not be curtailed.

Mr. MORGAN. The citizen's freedom of speech would not be curtailed, I very freely grant you, but the minister from Spain is not a citizen; and he is protected by the law of nations against any suit or proceeding on my part to hold him accountable for any calumny he may utter against me as a Senator or as a man. There the rule comes in that seals his mouth in respect of all communications and all utterances that affect the affairs of the Government of the United States, or that call in question the statements of any Senator made on this floor in regard to him or his Government.

The law of nations forbids a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives, and equally forbids any citizen of the United States, from bringing an action or a criminal proceeding against a foreign minister who is enjoying our hospitality, it makes no difference how outrageous his action may have been, if it is not dangerous to the public peace. He can stand here, if he chooses to do it, and fulminate libelous accusations against members of the Senate or either of these bodies, and he will go entirely free and unwhipped of justice, unless the President of the United States sees proper to dismiss him and send him back to his country. There is where he has that advantage. He enjoys a hospitality in the United States that is absolutely sacred so far as his protection is concerned, and while he does that he makes accusations against Senators connected with the conduct of affairs in which his Government has a vital interest, and he does it under circumstances which disable us from doing anything else except to take this floor and vindicate and defend ourselves against his accusations. Perfectly ensconced in the provisions of international law, which protect him against liability in our courts, he violates that law of our own Constitution which throws around us the ægis of its protection and declares that we are not responsible elsewhere for words uttered in debate.

Now, let us see whether or not that agrees with the teachings of our fathers upon this question. I will first read the minutes of a conversation between Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, and M. Genet, on July 10, 1793. First Genet asks Jefferson a question, to which he replied as follows:

* * * He asked if they (Congress) were not the sovereign. I told him no, they were sovereign in making laws only, the Executive was sovereign in executing them, and the judiciary in construing them where they related to their department. "But," said he, "at least Congress are bound to see that the treaties are observed." I told him no, there were very few cases, indeed, arising out of treaties which they could take notice of; that the President is to see that treaties are observed. "If he decides against the treaty, to whom is a nation to appeal?" I told him the Constitution had made the President the last appeal. He made me a bow and said that indeed he would not make me his compliments on such a Constitution, expressed the utmost astonishment at it, and seemed never before to have had such an idea—

Mr. Jefferson proceeds:

He was now come into perfect good humor and coolness, in which state he may with the greatest freedom be spoken with. I observed to him the impropriety of his conduct in persevering in measures contrary to the will of the Government, and that, too, within its limits, wherein unquestionably they had a right to be obeyed. "But," said he, "I have a right to expound the treaty on our side." "Certainly," said I, "each party has an equal right to expound their treaties. You, as the agent of your nation, have a right to bring forward your exposition, to support it by reasons, to insist on it, to be answered with the reasons for our exposition where it is contrary; but when, after hearing and considering your reasons, the highest authority in the nation has decided, it is your duty to say you think the decision wrong, that you can not take upon yourself to admit it, and will represent it to your Government to do as they think proper; but in the meantime you ought to acquiesce in it, and to do nothing within our limits contrary to it."

I will presently call attention to a further declaration of Mr. Jefferson upon that subject, for I think the extract I have been reading is not the full statement of his entire views upon that occasion or upon some other, in which he was in conversation with M. Genet. Mr. Jefferson again said to the same person, November 22, 1793:

He (the President) being the only channel of communication between the country and foreign nations, it is from him alone that foreign nations or their agents are to learn what is or has been the will of the nation, and whatever he communicates as such they have a right and are bound to consider as the expression of the nation, and no foreign nation can be allowed to question it, (nor) to interpose between him and any branch of Government, under the pretense of either's transgressing their functions, nor to make himself the umpire and final judge between them.

Again, Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to M. Genet, dated December 31, 1793, writes as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, December 31, 1793.

To M. GENET.

SIR: I have laid before the President of the United States your letter of the 20th instant, accompanying translations of the instructions given you by the Executive Council of France to be distributed among the members of Congress, desiring that the President will lay them officially before both Houses, and proposing to transmit successively other papers to be laid before them in like manner, and I have it in charge to observe that your functions as the missionary of a foreign nation here are confined to the transactions of the affairs of your nation with the Executive of the United States, that the communications which are to pass between the executive and legislative branches can not be a subject for your interference, and that the President must be left to judge for himself what matters his duty or the public good may require him to propose to the deliberations of Congress.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, said to Mr. Fauchet, June 13, 1795:

A foreign minister has a right to remonstrate with the Executive to whom he is accredited upon any of those measures affecting his country. But it will ever be denied as a right of a foreign minister that he should endeavor, by an address to the people, oral or written, to forestall a depending measure, or to defeat one which has been decided.

Here is a case which is a little closer, perhaps, in its application to the facts in this case than those that I have been quoting. It is in a letter of Mr. Livingston, Secretary of State, to Mr. Buchanan, on the 2d of January, 1833, in which he says:

Even though the Globe, as published during the Administration of President Jackson, should be regarded as a Government paper, the Government "is and can be, from the nature of our institutions, only answerable for official articles; on all the rest the Globe is as independent of the Executive as any other gazette." Hence, the Government, as such, can not be properly called on by Russia to explain the insertion of articles in the Globe injurious to Russia in relation to Poland, or the publication of what Russia may consider inaccurate and unjust report from France or England of Russian affairs.

That was a correspondence directly between our Government and the Russian minister. Then, again, Mr. Forsyth, in a letter to Mr. Livingston, March 5, 1835, after making some discussions of some preliminary matter, says this:

As one of its branches, the Chief Magistrate, in his messages, commits the Government to foreign nations no more than the two Houses of Congress can by their separate action, and it would be a most extraordinary movement of the foreign power to discuss the resolutions of either House of Congress, or of both, if passed by less than two-thirds, and not approved by the President, as if those resolutions were causes of complaint against the United States, to be subjects of discussion with the Executive. The President corresponds with foreign governments, through their diplomatic agents, as the organ of the nation. As such he speaks for the nation. In his messages to Congress he speaks only for the Executive to the legislature. He recommends, and his recommendations are powerless unless followed by legislative action. No discussion of them can be permitted. All allusions to them, made with a design to mark an anticipated or actual difference of opinion between the Executive and legislature, are indelicate in themselves, and if made to prejudice public opinion, will immediately recoil upon those who are so indiscreet as to indulge them. If they contain anything injurious to foreign nations, the means of self-justification are in their own power without interposing between the different branches of this Government—an interposition which can never be made, even by those who do not comprehend the true character of the Government and the people of the United States, without forfeiting the respect of both.

Again, he says:

Were any foreign powers permitted to scan the communications of the Executive, their complaints, whether real or affected, would involve the country in continual controversies; for, the right being acknowledged, it would be a duty to exercise it by demanding a disavowal of every phrase they might deem offensive, and an explanation of every word to which an improper interpretation could be given. The principle, therefore, has been adopted, that no foreign power has a right to ask for explanations of anything that the President, in the exercise of his functions, thinks proper to communicate to Congress, or of any course he may advise them to pursue. This rule is not applicable to the Government of the United States alone, but, in common with it, to all those in which the constitutional powers are distributed into different branches. No such nation, desirous of avoiding foreign influence or foreign interference in its councils—no such nation, possessing a due sense of its dignity and independence, can long submit to the consequences of this interference. * * * If the principle is correct, every communication which the President makes in relation to our foreign affairs, either to the Congress or to the public, ought in prudence to be previously submitted to those ministers, in order to avoid disputes and troublesome and humiliating explanations.

Then Mr. Buchanan, while Secretary of State, in a letter to Mr. Rosa in 1845, says:

Communications of the President to Congress and the debates of Congress are domestic matters, concerning which this Department will not entertain the criticisms or answer the questions of foreign sovereigns.

Would that we had somebody here now who had a just conception of the constitutional rights of the different departments of this Government.

There are various authorities following in the same line, but I shall not detain the Senate by reading them. I will cite, however, Mr. Lawrence's Wheaton, edition of 1863, page 385, for the information of any gentlemen who may desire to prosecute the study of this question further.

Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, said to Mr. Hülsemann:

The President's communications to Congress are matters of domestic concern which are not within the range of the official notice of foreign sovereigns.

Then Mr. Marcy says:

The President's annual message is a communication from the Executive to the legislative branch of the Government; an internal transaction, with which it is not deemed proper or respectful for foreign powers or their representatives to interfere, or even to resort to it as the basis of a diplomatic correspondence. It is not a document addressed to foreign governments.

Mr. Seward, on the 2d of January, 1868, said:

It is neither convenient nor customary with the executive department to discuss or give explanations concerning the expressions of opinions which are made in incidental debates and resolutions from time to time in either or both of the legislative bodies, at least until they assume the practical form of law. When they assume that form they are constitutionally submitted to the President for his consideration, and he is not only entitled, but he is obliged to announce his concurrence or nonconcurrence with the will of the legislature.

It would not be becoming for me to entertain correspondence with a foreign state concerning incidental debates and resolutions in regard to the treaty for the two Danish islands while it is undergoing constitutional consideration in the Senate and in Congress.

Mr. Fish, in 1878, says:

Correspondence by a foreign minister with the press in this country on subjects connected with his mission, such correspondence involving an appeal to the people on diplomatic issues, is ground for his dismissal.

A case could scarcely be more perfectly in point than that which falls within the denunciation of that great Secretary, Mr. Fish. I have not asked any dismissal of this minister; I do not expect to do so, and I regret this serious breach of privilege on his part. Let him stay if he wants to, or if his Government is satisfied. But I have a right as a member of this House to claim the protection of the Constitution of my country against any attack that may be made upon my vote or my speeches on this floor by one who holds a commission as a minister from a foreign government, and who, under that commission, enjoys our hospitalities and is protected against any liability to legal redress. Under the eye and in the presence of the American people, as an American Senator, I feel perfectly protected against those assaults, and I am quite sure the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] feel in like manner protected against them.

Attorney-General Lee has given us a proper view of this question, and I will read what he says. It is an opinion delivered at a time when the United States was a weak infant as compared with its present strength, but in the hearts of those great and noble men who won the liberties of these people and established this Republic upon eternal foundations there was a regard for national honor and duty and a protection of the different departments of this Government which, I am sorry to say, has disappeared, if the expression of some Senators and their conduct in bringing in the Spanish minister's accusation against us as an arraignment is to be the criterion. This letter is addressed to the Secretary of State, and is in response, doubtless, to a demand from the Secretary of State as to what was the state of the law upon a certain proposition.

PHILADELPHIA, July 27, 1797.

You will observe—

He says—

that my letter of this date contains an answer to yours of the 24th instant upon one of the subjects which you submitted to my consideration; and I shall now give my opinion on the other.

The Chevalier de Yrujo, in sending a translation of his letter to you of the 11th instant to Benjamin Franklin Bache and William Cobbett, and directing it to be printed, deviated from propriety. A foreign minister here is to correspond with the Secretary of State on matters which interest his nation, and ought not to be permitted to do it through the press in our country. He has no authority to communicate his sentiments to the people of the United States by publications, either in manuscript or print, which he shall write and circulate while resident among us; but his intercourse is to be with the Executive of the United States only, upon matters that concern his mission or trust. His conduct in this instance I deem a contempt of the Government, for which he is reprehensible by the President.

I can not discover that this letter is libelous on the Government or any public officer, though it may be charged with a degree of indecency and insolence.

The publication of it by Mr. Bache first, and Mr. Cobbett afterwards, can not be considered as criminal, unless in the light of a contempt to the Government of the United States, for they ought not to have joined the minister in the act. I am of opinion, therefore, that no prosecution of either of the editors can be maintained for a libel in this instance, and that no legal prosecution of either of them is advisable.

Why not? Why could it not be done? Because they had acted in concert with a foreign minister, and the law of nations protected him against a suit for libel.

Mr. President, I have gone into this subject for the purpose simply of giving the authority upon which I make the emphatic denunciation of any right of a Senator of this body to take the public prints of this country in which he finds accusations written and signed by a foreign minister which are in any way derogatory to any member of this body, or which in any way might affect his vote or action upon any question, and repeat them, approvingly, to the Senate. I claim the privilege to deny this right as against my brother Senator, as well as against a foreign minister. Whoever may treat the subject lightly, I can not do so, not because I am wounded in spirit, for I have a perfect indifference to what Mr. Dupuy de Lôme may say about me and my conduct upon the floor of the Senate, but I have a regard for my privileges and rights and my duties and the honor of the position which I hold in the Senate, which I am not going to subordinate quietly and without a word of protest to any man who lives, and more especially to a foreign minister whose country is now being made the subject of serious examination in the councils of the Senate.

Sir, we have brought no accusations like this at any time against any other country. The accusations of the kind that we have been forced to bring into this record were produced in justice to the history of the occasion and in justification of the attitude of the Senate committee in reporting this very mild resolution, expressing only our opinions. We had the right to resort to the history of Spain and Cuba, recorded in books of authority recognized on all sides, for the facts that have hitherto formed a part of their conduct in their dealings with each other. It was not expected of the committee, I hope, that they should write up the history of all that Spain has done and of all the blood she has shed since the times of the wars of Pizzaro and Cortez down through those of the Netherlands and through the civil turmoils that have agitated Spain from year to year during the whole of this century. It was not requisite that we should form a compendium of history when the facts are open to the access of every mind and the scrutiny of every eye, and bring it here to inform Senators as to what the history of Spain has been, or that it has impressed upon her warfare in Cuba a type of ferocity which is utterly inconsistent with the civilized methods of conducting war in modern times.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator departs from his strictures upon the Spanish minister for the writing of the letter which he has characterized in so strong terms, I call his attention to the statement which the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], made upon this subject when he last addressed the Senate, showing that he, although chairman of the committee, has not this feeling about that communication which the distinguished Senator from Alabama has. For he says, if he Senator will allow me to read three or four lines:

As I said before, I do not complain that the Spanish minister wrote his letter. I think he had a right to defend his country and his countrymen whether here or anywhere, before the people or in the Department of State. I do not believe in the narrow idea that a man may not defend his Government and people anywhere wherever he goes and in any community.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine is very apt in quoting the Senator from Ohio when he happens to make an expression, perhaps thoughtlessly or in the heat of debate, out of which he can get some possible comfort for the peculiar attitude that he holds toward us. But when it comes to following the Senator from Ohio in the facts that he states, that Senator is put upon excruciating interrogatory all through the debate. When it comes to expressing differences of opinion upon questions of law with the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maine experiences no difficulty in finding in the midst of his own great researches of law a full and complete answer, to his own satisfaction, to all that the Senator from Ohio had to say. When it comes to speaking of the presidency by the Senator from Ohio of the great Committee on Foreign Relations the Senator from Maine has no sort of compunction about insinuating, I will not say accusing, that the Senator from Ohio has been guilty of suppressing papers that ought to have come before the Senate in the course of the investigation of this case.

Mr. HALE. The Senator I think will allow me——

Mr. MORGAN. Wait until I get through my answer.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. When the Senator from Maine is able to quote upon me an expression of the Senator from Ohio that he is indifferent to what the Spanish minister did, the Senator from Maine does it with great unction. But the Senator from Ohio is no higher authority for me upon questions of my Senatorial rights and propriety than he is to the Senator from Maine upon questions of fact and his demeanor in office in connection with this business.

I do not agree with the Senator from Ohio upon that subject, though I did not intend to take occasion to say so until I have been called in question and compelled to do it.

Mr. HALE. I made the citation for the purpose of showing that the two eminent Senators do not agree upon this subject. But the Senator from Alabama must not charge that I insinuate, in any form or by any suggestion, that the Senator from Ohio has deliberately suppressed facts. I did not need to do that. There would have been no justification for it. I simply took the ground and, I think, showed pretty conclusively that the Senator from Ohio had been imposed upon, and that he had honestly and seriously and in good faith read from what he thought was good authority, but which, it was discovered afterwards, was no authority whatever. All that the Senator from Ohio said was that the paper that he read from, not the original authority, had General Weyler's name in it. He did not claim or assert that the original book, which he thought he was representing to us from the paper, contained any allegation against General Weyler.

I wish to say now here that the Senator from Alabama has no right to use the words that he has used when he charged me with insinuating that the Senator from Ohio undertook to delude the Senate or to deceive it. I never thought of it; I never harbored that idea; and I was careful, very careful, sir, entirely to exclude it from what I said.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine called the Committee on Foreign Relations in question time and again, yesterday and previously, upon the proposition that a paper had been before the committee which they had not produced here and of which they had made no mention. He dwelt upon it as a circumstance to convey the idea of a suspicious and clandestine movement on the part of the committee to keep from the Senate the possession of facts in regard to the case of Spain. That is patent. The Senator, with an art which of course is creditable to his tact and talent, in his statement made a moment ago has evaded the question. He has tried to turn the issue between him and me upon the question whether or not an accusation was made against the Senator from Ohio in regard to his quotation from some Spanish book that he found. No, sir. My remarks were addressed to this proposition.

The Senator from Maine, as I understood him, distinctly attempted to cast reproach upon the Committee on Foreign Relations because a paper came before the committee which had not been mentioned in debate, and which, as he characterized it at the time—I do not quote his words, but I have the idea—was inadvertently brought into this debate by some remark of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

I do not care to wrangle about personal matters in this debate, so far as I am concerned. I have no feeling about the question between the Senate or Senators and the minister from Spain, but I want this business to stop. Senators time and again have been arraigned on this same kind of appeal because of expressions and facts that they have stated here. Personally I have suffered egregiously in that matter, and I stood with mute astonishment when compelled to feel and to know that I had a Government that was entirely indifferent to my rights as a Senator.

There is no man in the United States—there is no man in the world—who can make an accusation against the President of the United States on this floor which treats him with injustice or can make a statement of fact which does him wrong without calling me to my feet for the purpose of vindicating that high representative of the sovereignty of the American people. And so the Department of State and the President of the United States owe it to Senators and Members of the other House, owe it to the legislative department as much as they owe it to the department of the judiciary, that when those who are enjoying the hospitality of this country and have official connection with it make accusations against us or criticisms of what we do or how we vote here, to call them to order and tell them that that thing must be corrected or they must cease to enjoy our hospitality. When we place the Government back upon the line of conduct such as I have read to-day from these eminent American statesmen and jurists, then we will have a Government that we can respect and love, and until we do it we will have a Government that will receive only our silent, unspoken contempt.

Now, having gone through with this matter, there is an answer to what the minister from Spain has said, coming from an authority that is quite as respectable as his in point of personal character. I refer to the letter written by Mr. Quesada, which, I believe, is his name, who is the representative of the Cuban Government at this capital, and who when he had a case to make in favor of Cuba sent his communication to the Department of State. Although he had no ministerial or official recognition, the Secretary of State thought enough of it to communicate it to a committee of the Senate, and it has now become one of the published documents of this controversy. Strip Mr. Dupuy de Lôme of his royal commission and put him upon his Spanish blood and his Spanish character and his history, of which I know nothing—I do not even know the gentleman personally—and bring Mr. Quesada here upon his history and his Spanish blood and his character, of which I know nothing, for I do not know the man—confront them as they are confronted through the newspapers, and let both speak.

Sir, if the letter of the Spanish minister arraigning the Senate of the United States and appealing from this body to the people had not been introduced here by a member of this body, no one could ever have induced me to go to a newspaper to find Mr. Quesada's answer to it. But it has been invited and it must go into the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate. Will the Secretary please read the letter of Quesada?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

HIS REPLY TO DE LÔME—HORRORS OF SPANISH WARFARE RECALLED BY A CUBAN—CRIME CHARGED TO GENERAL WEYLER—SECRETARY GONZALO DE QUESADA, OF THE CUBAN DELEGATION, SAYS SENATORS SHERMAN, MORGAN, AND LODGE SPOKE THE TRUTH, AND THAT THEIR STATEMENTS CAN BE SUBSTANTIATED, DESPITE THE SPANISH MINISTER'S ASSERTIONS TO THE CONTRARY.

Editor Post:

Minister Dupuy de Lôme, against all propriety and precedent, has turned from his unsuccessful work in diplomatic circles to the newspaper arena. The Cubans are glad to see him discuss this burning question of the revolution in the public press, which he has so often condemned, but we will not allow him to distort facts, as he has to his Government, if the reported cable be true in which he said that the President of this great country had taken him into the confidence of the Administration and declared that during Mr. Cleveland's term of office the Cubans would not be recognized as belligerents.

Mr. Dupuy de Lôme will find that we are prepared to meet him here, none the less, as our gallant armies in Cuba meet the thousands of unfortunate recruits who fight to maintain oppression and the power of Spain in the island which so liberally pays a Spanish minister in Washington to insult the land from which comes his salary.

The newspapers of this country need no defenders. In every one of them the minister sees an enemy, because he does not want the truth to be known. Why have the correspondents been denied entrance into the ranks of the Cubans? Why have they all had to leave the island? To-day an American reporter—Michelson—tells of his experiences in the Morro for trying to expose the fruits of Gen. Valerian Weyler's recent brutal proclamations—"a massacre of unarmed, peaceful country people at the town of Guatao, a dozen miles from Habana, by Spanish volunteers," and describes the tortures to which Walter Grant Dygart, an innocent American, is subjected.

Sylvester Scovell, another reporter, was thrown into jail as soon as he arrived in Cuba, and yet Dupuy de Lôme cynically says that statesmen do not know the real situation in Cuba.

HORRORS OF 1871 RECALLED.

But let us refute the minister's statements. The book of Donderis exists, and if the name of Weyler does not specifically occur it is because Valmaseda and other superiors of his take the credit for his atrocities. Will Minister Dupuy de Lôme deny that eight students were butchered in Habana in November, 1871? Will he deny the assassination committed by Burriel in the Virginius affair, where Americans and Cubans were murdered and afterwards their private parts desecrated, as was done with the brave Crittenden and his 50 Kentuckians, from whose skulls Spanish beasts drank Spanish wine? Is the crime of the Mora family of the 6th of January, 1871, forgotten by Spain, when two of Cuba's most beautiful women and their children were violated——

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest that the reading of the remainder of the extract be omitted. The Senator from Alabama has no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it be inserted in the RECORD. I am sorry to have it to do, Mr. President, but at the same time——

Mr. HALE. I should be very glad indeed to have it read.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Maine insists on having it read, all right.

Mr. MORGAN. All right; let the Secretary go ahead.

Mr. HALE. I have read it myself. I should like to have it read, and I should like to have the whole tone of it regarded by Senators, so that it may be taken for what it is worth.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Alabama asks not to have it read, and the Senator from Maine insists on having it read.

Mr. HALE. Yes, I should be very glad to have it read.

Mr. MORGAN. I make no indorsement of the truth of what is stated in the paper. What I mean to say is that, so far as I know and believe, the author of this paper is quite as good a character as Mr. Dupuy de Lôme.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

Is the crime of the Mora family of the 6th of January, 1871, forgotten by Spain, when two of Cuba's most beautiful women and their children were violated, insulted, and burned alive to conceal the horrible crime? And did not Hamilton Fish, the Secretary of State of the United States, himself take cognizance of the barbarities committed by Spain's officers, among whom was Weyler?

Can Mr. Dupuy de Lôme deny this crime of Weyler committed under his command on the farm of Lavado, in the territory of Las Tunas? There are witnesses to this occurrence, and it is no excuse for Weyler to say that he only obeyed orders, or for De Lôme to argue that he was a subordinate.

Two young men, Eugenio and Lorenzo Odoardo, brothers, and relatives of Aguilera, the vice-president of the Cuban Republic, were sick on their farm. They were cared for by a lady, who was accompanied by her daughter 8 years old. The troops of Weyler surprised the place, captured the men and the woman and child, and took them to the camp of Weyler. Weyler ordered the men to be killed with machetes in the presence of the lady. He formed the soldiers in a circle, placed in the center the poor woman and the child, despoiled the woman of her clothes, and, naked, forced her to dance by whipping her before the drunken and passionate soldiery. All the efforts of the virtuous woman to cover herself with the child were unavailing; the troops laughed and jeered; the unfortunate victim was given up to the lust of the troops; she died the next day. Weyler was the executioner of the French family of Rigoteau, for which Spain had to pay a large indemnity.

DIARY OF IGNACIO MORA.

Let Dupuy de Lôme read the diary of "Ignacio Mora," a copy of which is in my possession, dated the 27th of May, 1872, the very epoch in which Weyler was in command of the Spanish forces in that province. "The details," he declares, "which the postillira, Juan Lorres, gives me of the operations of the enemy are horrible. They assault the families; they rob them.

"They killed Mercedes Hernandez and the wife of Lieutenant-Colonel Sanchez. They also assassinated the children of that unfortunate woman. They committed other assassinations. On the 1st of June, 1872," he says in the Migial, "they killed Juana Gregoria Torres, after violating her, and her child, a few months old. The total number of murders committed in Canto from the 8th to the 28th of May was 28, of which 13 were women and 11 children. In Estancia Grande they killed 3 women and a child of 8 years."

Weyler branded the Cuban women in the bosom, as if they were cattle. He killed the prisoners in the jails by suffocating them with charcoal. It was this man of whom Martinez Campos said once that if he came to Cuba the very dead would rise against Spain.

The French papers of a year ago tell how he crushed anarchism in Barcelona. He arrested by wholesale innocents and suspects in the darkness of night. He tortured them most inhumanly. If Minister De Lôme wants to know how, he can read the press of that time. I dare not repeat, for decency's sake, the torments to which he submitted the prisoners. He gave them salt codfish as their only food and tantalized them by offering them water which he did not allow them to touch. He applied the inquisition. He killed 200 people, among them women and children.

I have asked for the terrible exposure of his acts published in a Parisian paper, and when it comes I shall send a copy to the minister who defends the man who is to-day sending hundreds of men to Africa and the Isle of Pines, and who is, in fact, clearing the prisons by killing the captives. Of course Mr. De Lôme would like names of persons who have seen these horrors. They dare not speak. They know what happens to those who disobey the decrees of the autocrat; but the book of blood will ere long be published, similar to the one which was published in the last war, a copy of which Minister De Lôme can obtain in New York, and in which he will see the thousands of defenseless Cubans executed by his Government, by his nation, which lost Italy by her crimes, the Low Countries by her murders, and the entire American Continent as a punishment for her extermination of the Indian, for her treachery and ingratitude to the native races. The data used by Senator MORGAN "were from the official reports forwarded from Madrid by the United States minister," were revised by Mr. John D. Champlin, and are incontrovertible, and as to the translation of Senator LODGE, in which the word "exterminate" is used for "clean out," there is no essential difference; it is a mere quibble of the casuistic mind of Philip II.

PROPERTY OF THE SLAIN.

And as to the conduct of the war, when in the history of any civilized nation has the property of the slain gone to the general and officers of the victorious army? Gen. José Marti was killed at Don Rios; instead of his watch and valuables being given to his widow and only child, the watch was given to the minister of war in Spain, the ring was kept by an officer of the noble Spanish army, who took it from the dead hero's finger, and the rest of his things were distributed among the gallant representatives of the chivalric mother country.

Of the horrors committed in this revolution by the Spanish commander the American press have daily reports. It is indeed worthy of note that the Cubans have not been the authors of those reports, and it would be too much for Minister de Lôme to declare that either the great American press has sold itself to the Cubans or that all the American newspaper men send "exaggerated reports to cater to the American taste."

I will very soon publish as many of General Weyler's innumerable crimes as possible. I am now getting such accurate facts together as will identify Weyler as the author of similar if not the same crimes exposed by Donderis in his book, and by citing year and place prove to the world that Tourquemada, Alva, Morillo, and Bores, Spanish angels, renowned in history for their humane methods, are all incarnate in the captain-general of Cuba, Valeriano Weyler, "the Butcher."

GONZALO DE QUESADA,
Secretary of the Cuban Delegation.

WASHINGTON, March 8.

Mr. HALE. I desired that this recital by this man, as horrible as it is, should be read to the Senate that Senators may have time to reflect that it is not the fashion in this country to make charges of that horrible kind which are past human belief without furnishing testimony. The American people and the American Senate will not believe those things of any man unless facts are given, unless there is something more than a promise to give facts, but will demand that they shall be supported by evidence. I do not credit those recitals as against this Spanish general in the least. I believe they are figments of the brain and could not have been true.

Mr. MORGAN. In his statement the Spanish minister goes on to open up the war of 1868–1878—the ten years' war—and undertakes to refute some statements made in regard to that war. The statement which I had the honor to submit upon the authority of General Sickles, which is found to be sustained in his letter to the Secretary of State, when that gets into the RECORD—I have misplaced it for the moment—related entirely to the conduct of the war during the former ten years. I have here statements from General Grant and Mr. Fish, made directly to the Spanish minister, which themselves show that much of what is stated there by these Cubans is true. I rely upon that authority. I do not rely upon this authority, and yet I know of no reason why Mr. Quesada is not a man of as good reputation as Mr. Dupuy de Lôme. The mere horror of the transactions which are there recited will not do as a disapproval of their existence. If we were to tell all we know of the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands before we could believe that in regard to Spain——

Mr. HALE. It certainly throws the burden upon those alleging such atrocities. The Senator is an old lawyer, and he must admit that.

Mr. MORGAN. It is rather impossible now to prove by living witnesses all that was done in that war, and yet I have some evidence before me of men who participated in it, and whose character is vouched for on the floor of the Senate, which I shall presently proceed to read. This is a very disagreeable thing to me, extremely so, in fact; it is a very disgusting thing; but it must be remembered that both of the controversialists bear the Spanish name and are of Spanish blood, and doubtless both of them have worn Spanish titles of honor among the old families of Spain.

If I were reciting the horrors of warfare that have existed in the United States on the part of the Ute Indians, the Apaches, the Arapahoes, the Cheyennes, the Comanches, etc., I would perhaps have to go into the details of greater horrors than have been detailed here. At the same time we know how very true are the awful recitals of our own American history in respect of those savage tribes. Men who can accuse each other and their Government of having been particeps criminis in horrible iniquities of this kind and go into the public prints and present them are men who on both sides are to be regarded with caution, I will grant you, in accepting their statements; but when they are at war so near our coast and war on the property of our own people, and when they take our own men captive in their armies, and the like of that, it becomes us to look at both pictures and see what is possible among such people.

I do not deal with Spain, I must say, in this matter as I would deal with Canada at all. I would deal with both Canada and Spain upon their historical record. We can not be expected to go back and hunt up the evidence to prove all these transactions, the onus of which the Senator from Maine would cast upon us. But before I get through with my remarks I will cast upon him the onus of denying what Mr. Fish said to Admiral Polo in a communication which he sent to him, which involves not all the details but horrors equivalent to those that are presented in the statement made by Mr. Quesada.

Now, inasmuch as we must have evidence brought here, under the requirements of the Senator from Maine, I will send to the desk an article taken from the New York Tribune of recent date upon the subject that I referred to in the speech I had the honor to make in this case when trying to present it on behalf of the committee in the first instance. I believe the New York Tribune is accredited as high authority in its anti-Cuban sentiments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

[New York Tribune, March 16, 1896.]

INNOCENT MEN SHOT DOWN—A STORY OF A SPANISH OUTRAGE IN THE TEN YEARS' WAR—THEY WERE CUBAN MEDICAL STUDENTS AND THEIR CRIME WAS VISITING A CEMETERY, WHEREIN A BURIAL PLACE WAS FOUND TO HAVE BEEN DISTURBED.

"Whenever you read accounts of Spanish atrocities in Cuba do not make the mistake of believing that they are in any way exaggerations. I have lived in Habana, and while not personally familiar with this present war, I was there during the ten years' war, and I know whereof I speak." This statement was made in Brooklyn yesterday by a medical student of one of the colleges in New York, who is an American, born in Habana. His father is at present in Cuba, and a well-known man there, but in order to save his family in Cuba from annoyance and persecution the student stipulated that in the story he was about to tell his name should not be mentioned.

"I want," he continued, "to tell you a tale of a Spanish outrage which happened in Habana in 1878, almost at the close of the ten years' struggle, which I witnessed. In all the terrible history of Spanish misrule and butchery in that island, the killing of seven innocent medical students by the order of the captain-general, at the instigation of a mob, is about the most heartless and inhuman act that I ever heard of, and I tell it simply to illustrate Spanish methods, and to show that in the present war similar cruelties are being enacted which the world will never hear of. In Habana there is an old cemetery surrounded by four stone walls, built with niches in tiers, and thick enough to hold a coffin lengthwise. The fronts of these niches are covered by a panel of thick glass, so that the coffin may be seen inside. In the latter part of 1878 one of the Spanish generals died and his coffin was placed in one of the niches. The Habana Medical College at that time was situated near the cemetery.

"One day fourteen students, having nothing else to do, visited the cemetery. That night one of the cemetery attendants noticed that the glass in the Spanish general's niche was scratched. He told the parish priest of the 'outrage,' and the priest in turn sent word to the authorities. Next day a number of policemen visited the college and arrested every student—to the number of about fifty—who had been at the college on that day. They were taken to the Spanish jail, and at once a report spread through the city that a Spanish grave had been desecrated by young Cubans. The volunteers, who, let it be understood, consisted of Spaniards living in the island and of some of the lower classes, were aroused. Within an hour the jail was surrounded by a howling, frenzied mob. Balmaceda was absent in the eastern part of the island at that time, and the segundo cabo, or lieutenant-general, was in command. He assembled his troops in front of the palace and told them he would investigate the case and punish where punishment was due.

"NO EVIDENCE AGAINST THEM.

"A commission of Spanish officers was immediately assembled and the case was tried then and there. Not a single well-known Cuban was called into the case. The gardener of the cemetery, who had been called as a witness, said that he had noticed some scratches on the glass and had also seen that a few flowers were missing. Further testimony on the part of the assistant gardener showed to the commission that the students were in no wise guilty of any wrongdoing whatsoever. The assistant gardener said that the scratches had been on the glass several days before. Upon hearing this the Spanish commission shut him up and practically threw him out of the room.

"Then, out of the whole commission arose one Spanish officer, Captain Capdevilla, and said that there was nothing upon which to hold the students. He advised their release and the dispersion of the mob, and said if these students were harmed it would be an act of inhumanity. The captain was immediately put out of the room, and next day was arrested for treason for daring to voice such sentiments in a high military court of Spain. The mob was every minute growing larger and more vociferous for the lives of the students. A great uproar was heard without the palace, and the segundo cabo appeared on the balcony and made a speech, saying there was really no evidence against the students. The volunteers and their supporters would not have it this way and demanded the lives of some of the accused men. There was a further conference of the commission, and the additional fact was brought out that of the 14 students who visited the cemetery only 7 were in that part of the inclosure where the grave was located, and only one youth among this number possessed a diamond ring with which it might have been possible to scratch the glass. With this flimsy accusation and in order to appease the volunteers, the commission decided that 7 of the boys, whose ages ranged from 14 to 20 years, should be killed and the other 7 transported to an African dungeon.

"The parents of the unfortunate prisoners became frenzied when they heard of the sentences. They offered the weight of the prisoners in gold to the Spaniards if they would free them. The commission was obdurate. The volunteers must be appeased. The prisoners had to be killed.

"SHOT DOWN BY A REGIMENT.

"Next day was a fête day. Early in the morning, as the seven young fellows were lined up in front of a blank wall surrounding the Carcel, a brother of the youngest prisoner offered to stand up for him and be shot, but this was not allowed. Instead of having a file of soldiers, as is usually the case, the lieutenant-general called out an entire regiment to perform the massacre. The order to fire was given and the seven were literally shot to pieces.

"I know of similar atrocities committed in that war, of which General Weyler is guilty, and while he had nothing to do with that particular massacre, he is inhuman enough for anything. The strict censorship now prevailing prevents the world from hearing of crimes equally as bad which are committed every day. If the Cubans can hold out for another summer, or if, by chance, the war should be prolonged for two summers, fever would reduce the present number of 130,000 Spanish troops on the island to about 13,500. In the end Cuba will be free."

Mr. HALE. Read the name. A statement of that kind ought not to be given to the Senate without giving the name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). There is no name attached, the Chair is informed.

The SECRETARY. New York Tribune, March 16, 1896; not signed.

Mr. HALE. This purports to give the personal narration of somebody, and is there no name signed to it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no name, the Secretary informs the Chair.

Mr. HALE. It does not seem to me that that is a very good piece of evidence. If that is a case of mob violence and a lieutenant-general protesting against it——

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can comment on the evidence when it gets into the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. I certainly supposed it was going to be followed by giving the name.

Mr. MORGAN. I had stated that I got it from the New York Tribune, which has been an anti-Cuban paper, I understand. I supposed the New York Tribune would not without some excuse publish those facts. I referred to that same incident in the first speech I made on this subject in the Senate, that to which Mr. Dupuy de Lôme replied. He made no reference to my statements on that subject which I extracted from history and not giving the details. He had a safe opportunity to reply to it and deny it if it was not true. I suppose whoever reads about such things at all knows about that massacre of students in Habana.

If the Senator from Maine requires witnesses to be brought and names to be stated, as a matter of course they ought to be brought here to the bar of the Senate, and in such a case I would ask that the Spanish minister and Mr. Quesada be summoned to the bar of the Senate in order that we might examine them, if we are going into that sort of detail. What I am trying to do is to get a general and I trust a just view of what is the situation in Spain as respects the feeling of those people and of that Government against the Cubans. I have here——

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me a moment I shall not then interrupt him again.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not like to be replied to as I go along. The Senator from Maine will have plenty of time. I did not interrupt him to any extent, and such a course diverts me from my ideas and keeps me on my feet until after a while I shall get so weary that I can not say anything.

Mr. HALE. I thought in a case of that kind some authority should be given for such a statement.

Mr. MORGAN. I think not.

Mr. HALE. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not agree that any more authority should be given to that than to an extract taken from the public history of an important event. This paper is a historian; it professes to be. It selects its extracts with a view of informing the people of the United States. The Tribune certainly would not put an article of that kind into its paper that was not well authenticated in history.

A letter was written on the 6th of March, 1896, from Virginia, to a member of this body. The gentleman who wrote the letter is known to some Senators on this floor, and he is known to be a man of good reputation.

Mr. HALE. Who is he?

Mr. MORGAN. I will not give his name, but I will show you the letter. I will myself read the letter.

MARCH 6, 1896.

DEAR SIR: Noting that certain cowardly sheets, always opposed to everything American, are trying to break the force of your statements of Spanish atrocities in Cuba by alleging them to be vague, general assertions, made on hearsay, and incapable of proof, permit me to offer this testimony as to what I have myself seen and heard in that island.

In 1869, 1870, and 1871 I served as captain of cavalry in the liberating army of Cuba under General Ryan and General Federico Cavada, my observations extending from the north coast to the south, and from Las Tunas in the east to Cienfugos in the west, embracing some 300 miles of the center of the island.

The Spaniards held the cities, towns, and some of the plantations in the sugar-producing part of Santa Clara, with forts and strong garrisons; the Cubans held all of the country beyond gunshot from the Spanish forts.

There was fighting somewhere almost every day. The Spanish operated by marching strong columns through the country, gathering up all they could carry off, and burning houses and whatever else they could not carry. The Cubans operated by ambuscading the columns, making sudden attacks on the forts, blockading them, cutting off detachments, convoys, etc. The Spaniards could beat us in a pitched battle, from their superiority in equipment; but they lost in action or by death and desertion at least five men to our one.

We were compelled to adopt this system by the nature of the country, which does not admit of the maintenance of large armies in the field, and by the want of arms. We had plenty of men, but not more than one gun to four men. Hundreds were camped, unarmed, in different places, waiting for arms to come from the States. We could not reduce the Spanish forts for lack of artillery, but sometimes carried them by surprise or assault. In these cases they were dismantled and destroyed, as it was not our policy to stand a siege in them.

The whole country was laid waste. The Spanish burned every house they came to. They killed every man and boy they found, whether armed or unarmed. Sometimes they killed the women and girls; sometimes they * * * sometimes they carried them on with the column; and sometimes after killing the men they left the women crying over the corpses and the ashes of their homes.

The population of the country and the refugees from the cities had taken to the woods, and lived in palm-leaf huts and wigwams in the depths of the forests and swamps and in caves in the mountains; but when these hiding places became well known from the numbers resorting to them, they were noted by Spanish spies, who often carried the enemy there and surprised the women and children, the old, and the sick and wounded before they could get away into the woods.

Neither side gave quarter to prisoners, and every victory ended in a massacre, except that Spanish prisoners who elected to join the liberating army were released and received into full fellowship. Most of our drillmasters and many of the officers and men were Spaniards.

This violation of the laws of war was forced upon us by the Spanish Government. The Cubans wanted to save all prisoners and exchange them, and the Spanish in the field would have agreed to it; but the administration required all prisoners to be put to death, and we were obliged to retaliate in self-defense. It would have been suicidal madness to send hundreds of men back to the Spaniards to fight us again and carry them information as to our positions, numbers, etc.; and we had nowhere to keep them until the war ended. The course of the Spanish Government in Cuba is exactly the same as was the course of Philip II in the Netherlands. Three centuries have not changed it in one iota. Valmaseda, Weyler, and Pando are just Alva, Vargas, and Tel Rio over again—

Mr. HALE. My attention was called away for the moment. What is the date of these occurrences? I did not catch that.

Mr. MORGAN. 1869, 1870, and 1871—

For specific allegations I mention these:

In May, 1870, an American named Coyneo, who wished to leave the island, surrendered to the Spanish in the neighborhood of Najasa. He was murdered, and we found his body, fearfully mutilated, in the road where they left it.

In May, 1870, in Las Temas, on a forced march, we had to leave one of our men who was wounded. Three days afterwards we found him in the same place, where the Spanish had overtaken him. He had a large chunk cut out of his throat by what they call "dos puñalados," and was dead.

About the same time, between Najasa and Yara, six unarmed men who were gathering bananas for their families were surrounded by the Spanish and murdered. Our men found them lying dead. Each one had a banana rammed down his throat by way of a joke.

Two days before the action at La Gloria, in June, 1870, while scouting with General Ryan, we found the body of an old, unarmed man who had been surprised and murdered by the Spanish while he was getting honey out of his beehives.

Brig. Gen. Edwardo Del Marmol, chief of staff to General Cavada, was shot through the body in the action at Altamira, in July, 1870, and was carried to a potrero in western Camaguey to be nursed. The Spanish came suddenly and butchered him in his bed.

At the Caridad of Curana, in August, 1870, Capt. Ramon de Varona, of the staff of General Ryan, was on sick leave at a retreat where were his lovely young wife and several other ladies and girls belonging to the leading families of Camaguey. The Spanish surprised them, killed Captain Varona, unarmed and sick, in the presence of the ladies, stripped his corpse, mutilated it in the most atrocious manner before them, and dragged it about with a rope around the neck. The Spanish commander (name unknown to me) then pointed to the terrified and sobbing ladies, and told his men that they "could take their choice of those rebel bitches"; and the ladies were treated in a manner not fit to be described.

Two days afterwards I saw two of these ladies and a colored woman who had been present, and heard them relate what had happened.

In August, 1870, in the vicinity of Rio Seco, while looking for the chief of ordnance, I came to a house in the woods occupied by others of the Varona family. The ladies were in tears, and told me that their brother, a young boy, had been shot down by the Spanish the day before. He was unarmed, and, as I understood, not over 11 years old.

In August, 1870, near Rio Seco, I was told by several families living there in the woods that the Spanish had come to a house near by a few days before, and finding no one but women spared their lives, but burned their house and carried off one of the daughters, who was a beauty, behind an officer. They tore the girl from her mother's and sister's arms, and swore they would kill her and the whole family if she did not go. These Spanish were a part of the force of Colonel Monteneo, then commanding at Santa Cruz del Sur. The poor girl's name was told to me, but I do not remember it now after so many years.

In June, 1870, near La Glorico, I heard General Ryan examine a Spanish prisoner. This man gave a detailed account of the state of certain Spanish camps, and named certain Cuban ladies whom he had seen kept there by certain Spanish officers, describing their wretched condition, their appearance, and their actions very minutely. His statements had every appearance of truth. The Cuban officers who were present said that they knew the ladies named, and that they were at that time prisoners in the hands of the Spanish.

Capt. Henry Earl, of Brooklyn, who won great distinction in the patriot service before his death, showed me the marks of the wounds given him by the Spanish after the action in Holguin in 1869. They found him lying on the field after the fight, shot him and bayoneted him several times, and left him for dead. General Jordan had gathered up some of his wounded and left them in a house to be cared for. The Spanish surrounded the house, set it on fire, and burned up the wounded men. One of these was a young New Yorker, a sort of clerk to General Jordan. I have heard, but do not remember, his name.

Gen. Ignacio Agramonte, General Ryan, General Cavada, and many other officers and men whom I knew personally, were at different times taken by the Spanish. They were in every instance murdered. I never heard of anyone escaping death.

I knew a family named Mola, prominent people, living in the western part of Camaguey. The mother and three young daughters were refined, cultivated ladies, famous for kindness and courtesy to everyone, and much beloved. Major Mercer, of Boston, our chief of artillery, and I had especial cause, as strangers, to thank them for hospitality and kindness. Some time after we went westward into the Villas with Cavada these four ladies and one of the sons, a boy of about 10, were murdered by the Spanish. A captain and his men came to their house one night, seized them, * * * murdered them and their mother and brother, and burned their house down over their bodies. The only one who escaped was the youngest boy, aged about 7. In the confusion and darkness he slipped into the bushes near the house and saw and heard what was done. I did not see this, but it is matter of common notoriety.

I have seen hundreds of burned houses, bones, and graves, and have heard many circumstantial and undoubtedly true narratives of Spanish atrocities, but prefer to give these specimen cases which came under my own observation, and when I can give the time and place. This sort of war was waged all over Cuba. The present war is just the same as the last; the same men, Weyler, etc., are in command. The Cuban question is just this: Are 1,500,000 people to be massacred that Spain may hold the island a few years longer, or is it to be stopped? The only way to keep the Cubans down is to kill them all; and if all these were killed and the island repeopled from Spain, a new war for independence would come as soon as a native-born generation grew up. All the Cubans are for independence. Those in the Spanish cities are forced into the so-called volunteer battalions to save their lives, families, and property; but the Spanish do not dare to trust them where they would have any chance to desert, knowing they would go over to the patriots by whole battalions.

As for the objection that the Cubans wage only guerrilla war, it is the sort of war that gives them the advantage, and they would be fools to give it up to wage grand guerre.

Maximo Gomez is a great captain, who understands how to handle his men so as to neutralize the many advantages enjoyed by the Spanish. His vigorous offensive obliges them to divide their forces and guard a hundred points at the same time, while he selects his point of attack and is as successful as a man with a knife can hope to be in fighting a man with a gun.

It is the sort of war by which Robert Bruce freed Scotland; with which Spain opposed the great Napoleon, and by which her other colonies obtained their independence.

It is the sort of war which General Washington proposed to adopt in our own Revolution when he expected to be driven out of Pennsylvania to his last stand in Virginia's mountains. It is the war which Nathaniel Green, Daniel Morgan, Henry Lee, William Campbell, Isaac Shelby, John Sevier, Thomas Sumter, and Francis Marion adopted for the recovery of the Carolinas and Georgia after the Continental armies had been destroyed at Charleston and Camden.

Why, then, should any American denounce the Cubans as guerrillas? Are not these good examples to follow?

There is only one way to settle the Cuban question. Every generation that grows up is going to fight for independence. Millions of people may be butchered, and the struggle may go on for centuries, but in the end the Cubans will be free.

The writer of that letter is a graduate of the Military Institute of Virginia and also of the University of Virginia.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on to-morrow morning, during the morning hour and after the dispatch of the ordinary routine business, I shall ask unanimous consent to present an argument, by request of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in favor of the seating of Henry A. Du Pont as Senator from Delaware.

Mr. MILLS. I want to say to the Senator that I have the floor for to-morrow by common consent, and have had it given to me for three or four days on this question. I understand that we are to have this question concluded before we take up the Du Pont case, and I must object to yielding the floor now and further giving way, as I have given way for three or four days.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say that there is no such understanding as that the Du Pont case is not to be taken up until the Cuban question is disposed of.

Mr. MILLS. I understood from the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] that he intended to give way, and let the Cuban question go on.

Mr. CHANDLER. There will be no difficulty in having the Senator from Nebraska and also the Senator from Texas speak to-morrow; but the reservation was distinctly made that, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] was obliged to go away at the end of the week, he should be permitted to speak on the Du Pont case.

Mr. THURSTON. I am perfectly willing, if it be agreeable, to have my announcement take effect on Thursday morning just the same. I only wish an opportunity to speak before I leave.

Mr. MILLS. All right. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do I understand the Senator from Texas to claim the whole day to-morrow?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no; but I wish to follow my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have an interview of General Sickles, which he did me the honor to send me with his card. Of course it is a correct and authentic interview, and I will ask the Secretary to read it.

Mr. PLATT. What is the date of the interview?

Mr. MORGAN. It is a very recent date. I believe I have General Sickles's note here transmitting the interview to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, who was United States minister to Spain during a part of the ten-year Cuban rebellion, and whose dispatches from Madrid while minister were mentioned in the recent debate in the Senate over the Cuban resolutions, was interviewed by a Sun reporter yesterday at his home in Fifth avenue.

"While you were minister to Spain," asked the reporter, "did you have occasion to consider the question of the shipment of arms and ammunition to Cuba?"

"Yes, I did," said the General, "and I must say that there seems to be a great deal of misapprehension about the rules of international law, and our own law as well, on that subject at the present time. In the absence of a recognized state of war it is no offense for sailing vessels or steamers sailing from this port or any other American port to carry arms and ammunition for whomsoever it may concern. No Government can, by the law of nations, be held responsible for the shipments of arms, munitions, or material of war made by private individuals at their own risk and peril. These views have been repeatedly declared by our Government.

"During the former insurrection in Cuba, Captain-General de Rodas issued a decree in contravention of this principle. He closed a number of ports, interdicting trade with them of any kind, and threatened the summary execution of the officers and crews and passengers of vessels transporting arms or passengers suspected to be in the interest of the insurgents, affecting to treat them as pirates. This extraordinary decree caused a profound sensation in the United States, and our Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, addressed the Spanish minister under date of July 16, 1869, a strong protest, in which he said:

"'The transport on the high seas in time of peace, by outsiders, of what is commonly known as contraband of war is a legitimate traffic and commerce which can not be interfered with or denounced unless by a power at war with a third party in the admitted exercise of the recognized rights of a belligerent. The freedom of the ocean can nowhere and under no circumstances be yielded by the United States. While Spain disclaims a state of belligerency, or until the United States may find it necessary to recognize her as a belligerent, the United States can not fail to look with solicitude upon a decree which, if enforced against any vessel of the United States, can not but be regarded as a violation of their rights that may lead to serious complications.'

"Again, in a note to the Spanish Government, written by Secretary Fish on the 18th of April, 1874, he makes this declaration:

"'A friendly government violates no duty of good neighborhood in allowing the free sale of arms and munitions of war to all persons, to insurgents as well as to the regularly constituted authorities; and such arms and munitions, by whichever party purchased, may be carried in the vessels on the high seas without liability to question from any other party. In like manner the vessels may freely carry unarmed passengers, even though known to be insurgents, without thereby rendering the government which permits it liable to a charge of violating its international duties. But if such passengers should be armed and proceed to the scene of the insurrection as an organized body which might be capable of levying war, they constitute a hostile expedition, which may not be knowingly permitted without a violation of international obligations.'"

These extracts from the notes of Secretary Fish, as they were quoted by General Sickles, are particularly interesting when considered in connection with the recent seizure of the steamship Bermuda off Liberty Island. More interesting still is this statement, which the General went on to make:

"I have satisfactory reasons for believing and knowing that our Government to-day accepts and enunciates the same views of international law and of our own laws expressed by the Administration of President Grant. I have it from the best authority that this Government can not and will not stop the shipment of arms and ammunition from any of our ports; nor will it stop the departure of passengers on a vessel bound for any foreign port. What it must stop is 'any military expedition or enterprise' intended to make war on a nation with which we are at peace. That is to say, if some ammunition and men are sent off together under circumstances such as show an intent to do hostile acts on foreign territory or on the seas against a friendly nation, our neutrality laws and our international obligations are violated.

"Surely ample room may be found between these several lines of procedure for the friends of the Cuban patriots to supply them with arms and ammunition, and even with men, if men were necessary, without violating our laws. If passengers embark let them do so in the usual way. Their destination concerns nobody but themselves. They are free to go where they choose to go. If arms and ammunition are shipped, as may be rightfully and lawfully done, do not send men with them in the same vessel. If men are sent let them go by themselves, unarmed. Such shipments of arms or such embarkation of passengers may be made, and should be made, in open day without concealment or secrecy, because no law is violated and no interference would be lawful. I am persuaded if the course thus outlined should be followed, our Cuban friends could supply their people with all they need without any other risk than capture by the Spanish land and naval forces within Spanish jurisdiction; that is to say, in Cuba or within a marine league of the shore of the island."

"General, have you noticed in the recent Senate debates a reference to some of your dispatches, in which you speak of the shooting of prisoners of war in Cuba during the former insurrection? If so, the Sun would like to have a reference to them and know something of their purport," said the reporter.

"Yes," replied the General, "my instructions from Washington frequently directed me to invite the attention of the Spanish Government to the barbarous and inhuman manner in which prisoners of war and noncombatants suspected of sympathy with the insurgents were put to death. The dispatch referred to in the Senate debate is my No. 426, dated August 16, 1872, and appears in the red book for that year on page 563. I referred to the hostilities in Cuba as 'four years of war without quarter.' This was notorious. These campaigns had been conducted mainly under the direction of Count Valmaceda. His campaigns were as conspicuous for cruelty as for incapacity. His decree of April, 1869, indicated his character and temper. He waged a war of extermination without quarter, against which our Government made repeated remonstrances. The decree to which I refer declared:

"'That any man from the age of 15 years upward found away from his habitation, and not proving a sufficient motive therefor, would be shot.

"'That every habitation unoccupied would be burned.

"'That every house not flying a white flag should be reduced to ashes.'

"Repeated reclamations were made by the Government of the United States for indemnity for the lives of American citizens shot pursuant to that decree. In Madrid no one doubted or denied, so far as ever I heard, that prisoners of war were shot. In the dispatch referred to I quoted statements from the Imparcial, a semiofficial journal in Madrid, of which the colonial minister at that time had been the director until he entered the cabinet, showing the captures of prisoners and war material in Cuba up to August, 1872, and the number of insurgents killed in battle.

"I was justified from the notoriety of the facts undisputed in adding to the number of slain in battle 13,600, as alleged, the number of 43,500 claimed to have been taken prisoners. This statement was made in these words:

"'As it is believed that all prisoners of war taken are shot or garroted, it would appear, taking the total of killed in battle and prisoners captured, that more than 57,000 insurgents have fallen since the war began.'

"I may remark, however, that this computation was based upon the assumption that the figures given in the semiofficial organ of the Government were accurate. It must be said that as a rule no dependence could be placed upon such figures. It was customary to amuse the Spanish public then, as now, with frequent reports of battles won and captures made of prisoners and war material. Indeed, scarcely a month passed during the long years the war continued in which statements were not published in the Madrid journals, claimed to be gotten from official sources, that the rebellion in Cuba was practically ended, that only a few roving bands of insurgents kept the field so long as they could hide in the mountains inaccessible to Spanish troops.

"Mr. Fish stated in his dispatch No. 432, dated October 29, 1872, page 582 of the red book of that year, that 'the insurrection in Cuba has now lasted four years. Attempts to suppress it, so far futile, have been made, probably at a sacrifice of more than 100,000 lives and an incalculable amount of property.' In my dispatch No. 374, dated May 30, 1871, page 71 of the red book of that year, I stated that 'reports of the most cruel severities against prisoners of war and against noncombatants perpetrated by both parties continue to reach Madrid.' Mr. Fish wrote to Mr. Cushing, my successor, on February 6, 1874, that 'our people are horrified and agitated by the spectacle at our very doors of war, not only with all its ordinary attendance of devastation and carnage, but with accompaniments of barbarous shooting of prisoners of war or the summary execution by military commissions, to the scandal and disgrace of the age.' Of course, all our people are familiar with the slaughter of the prisoners of war taken on the Virginius in 1873, the horrors of which I need not repeat.

"Our people, who are accustomed to regard the Spanish nation at home as chivalrous and cultivated, of course find it difficult to reconcile a belief in such atrocities as take place in Cuba with their high conceptions of Spaniards at home. The solution is to be found in the peculiar situation of things in Cuba.

"Mr. Fish points out in the dispatch to which I have just referred 'that the struggle is continued in Cuba with incidents of desperate tenacity on the part of the Cubans, and of angry fierceness on the part of the Spaniards unparalleled in the annals of modern warfare.' Again he says that 'by the slaveholders' resolutions of January, 1869, in Habana, General Dulce, whose generous intentions have been feelingly referred to by Admiral Polo, was driven out of the island, and the substance of political power passed into the hands of the Casino Espanol, where it has since remained.' This Casino Espanol is the governing power in Cuba to-day, as it was in 1874, when Mr. Fish wrote the passage quoted.

"If the Spanish governor of Cuba disobeys the wishes of the Casino, his position is made inestimable. If he conducts war in a civilized way, the volunteer guard, organized by the Casino and inspired by it, menace the captain-general with their vengeance, and he is forced to succumb or quit his post. This has recently happened to Captain-General Martinez Campos, as it happened to General Dulce, in the former insurrection. Dulce was succeeded by De Rodas and Lamacida, and Jobellas, and Campos is now succeeded by Weyler. The volunteers rule the Spanish authorities of the island at the instigation of the Casino.

"The truth is that the authority of the Spanish Government is not recognized in Cuba unless it is agreeable to this dominating class, incorporated in the Casino Espanol and its instruments known as the volunteers. We are, therefore, confronted not with the question how far we should respect the sovereign rights of Spain in Cuba, but rather how far we are expected to tolerate a condition of things existing on the island which prevails in spite of Spanish authority, in a great degree, and for which an irresponsible body, such as I have described, is essentially accountable.

"The responsibility of the Spanish Government for the atrocities and outrages committed in Cuba, as well upon the persons and property of American citizens as upon the insurgents, is found in the fact that since 1825 the captain-general of Cuba is endowed by the Government with plenary powers to suspend the execution in Cuba of any law of Spain or any decree of its executive government at his pleasure. Whenever, therefore, the Madrid Government may attempt to mitigate the horrors of war or to introduce into the struggle any of the amenities of civilized hostilities, the Casino Espanol, with its branch of volunteers, creates a situation in Habana, compelling the captain-general to yield to its demands and to execute its will regardless of the instructions or wish of the Spanish Government."

Mr. MORGAN. If I had chosen I could have rested this whole matter upon that interview and statement of General Sickles, which he did me the honor to send me in a letter post marked, I think, the 14th of this month, March. Every one who knows anything of General Sickles, not merely in regard to his ability, but his Americanism and his truthfulness and uprightness and honor, knows that he has no motive in bringing these facts to the attention of the American people except to keep his own Government, which he loves very dearly and in whose service he has made sacrifices, on proper ground in regard to this transaction between Spain and the United States respecting Cuba.

Now, I have here a letter from a native American, dated Philadelphia, February 13, 1896. He sent his card along with the letter. He resides in Philadelphia. His card is open to the inspection of any Senator who desires to see it. I do not feel authorized, however, to put his name in the RECORD. I will read what he says to show what were his personal experiences in the Island of Cuba during the previous ten-years war:

BELLIGERENT RIGHTS—WHY THEY SHOULD BE ACCORDED TO THE STRUGGLING CUBAN REVOLUTIONISTS.

To the Editor of the Press:

SIR: The New York Herald published an editorial on the 10th instant entitled "The Government should go slow in the matter of belligerent rights." This article evidently emanated from the brain of an overzealous Spanish sympathizer. He says first, "Government action is quite different from popular sympathy." If this is, as I understand it, a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, therefore the will of the sovereign people should prevail. Then why go slow in recognizing the belligerency of Cuba? Did Spain go slow when she recognized the Southern Confederacy? We have nothing to lose by recognizing the Cubans; on the contrary, we would have considerable to gain; they would owe us a debt of gratitude and all their imports would come out of this country, while most of their products would seek our markets, being the nearest of access. If we do not recognize them we lose their friendship and gain nothing; for, granting that Spain is responsible for damage done to American properties up to the present time, what does that responsibility amount to if she will not pay—in fact, does not pay the numerous claims our citizens have against her? Outside of the Mora claim, which took twenty-seven years to collect, can anyone tell me of any other claim paid by her to citizens of this country in the last thirty-five years?

The comparison made between the insurrection of 1868 and the present insurrection is not a fair one. In the former the Cubans never had in the field more than 7,000 men, and they were confined to the eastern district and never came as far as Colon, yet it lasted ten years. In the present revolution the Cubans have marched at will from Cape Maisi to Cape San Antonio, the full length of the island. They now have in the field nearly 60,000 men, well organized; they also have an established government, which virtually occupies the whole island, excepting the seaports, which are occupied by the Spaniards, backed up by a strong navy. It would be folly for the Cubans to capture a seaport, that they could only hold a few hours, with great sacrifice of human lives.

Give them recognition and they will soon have afloat enough cruisers to wipe out Spain's navy. By recognition it will shorten the struggle and save thousands of lives, as Spain would soon be obliged to give up the contest. If not recognized the war will last as long as there is a Cuban living, for Spain is doomed to lose the last jewel of her tyrannical crown. The Herald states that Spain would board our vessels on the high seas. What of that? If the vessel's papers are in order and her cargo legitimate and lawful merchandise it would be allowed to proceed; if she has contraband of war let them capture her if they can; these are the chances of war. As far as recognition interfering with our commerce with the Island of Cuba, this is erroneous, as we have none now; therefore, if Spain blockaded the ports of Cuba it would be no loss to this country, for you can not lose what you do not possess.

The Cubans are not fighting for autonomy; they want independence the same as we fought for when we seceded from England, and when recognized by other nations, let us then reciprocate and give them the same chance that we had. Blaine was in favor of reciprocity, and it worked well while it lasted. General Campos tried to reciprocate with the Cubans by being humane with prisoners, as the Cubans were with his soldiers; because he was humane, tyrannical Spain recalled him and sent to Cuba in his place General Weyler, commonly known as the butcher, and she says with instructions to be humane. How can you make a lamb out of a hyena? This is an impossibility. Time will tell, and a very short time at that, how he carries out his instructions. Let this Government act—not slowly, as the Herald suggests, but swiftly; it can not be too swift—and Spain will understand that the United States are not going to tolerate or allow her to murder innocent and inoffensive old men, women, and children.

From my own personal observation, during the years 1863-1879, at which time I resided in Cuba, I know that if a race of people ought to have their independence they are the Cubans. Under the Spanish rule they are not allowed to have any voice in the government of the island, and are taxed to such an extent that if any city in the United States should try to collect an equal amount per capita it would refuse to pay and revolt in a short time and not stand it as the Cubans have for years.

Why should the United States recognize them? Because they have suffered so much through Spanish misrule and are only trying to be recognized as human beings and of some value to this world. We not only ought to recognize them, but to help to drive the Spanish from this part of the world. We have not to go to Armenia to find work for the Red Cross Society, for in Cuba I have seen men torn from their homes at night, taken on board of a Spanish man-of-war, condemned to exile to the Isle of Fernando Po, and not even allowed to say good-bye to their families. Men taken from trains and shot. Prisoners would be condemned without being allowed any defense, and sent to Habana, but never reach there—shot on the way by the guards, who said they tried to escape.

In February, 1896, I was in Habana; heard some of the shots that sent some of the Cubans to their final resting place. They came from the country under promise of full pardon if they would leave the island; they came under this promise to Habana, went on board the royal mail steamer, and were shot down by the harbor police, acting under the orders of the Government, while talking to their wives and children in their staterooms. These men had come under a flag of truce, supposed to be respected by all nations of the world, but not by the Spanish Government. Under such state of affairs as this a halt should be called and the Spanish rule in America should be made a thing of the past. The nation that should do this is the United States. Instead of going slow in giving the Cubans belligerent rights they should go fast to help them to their independence. These are the ideas of

A NATIVE AMERICAN.

PHILADELPHIA, February 13, 1896.

Those are the ideas of a native American, whose name is here. If the Senator from Maine wants to know it I will give it to him, but I will not put it in the RECORD. That is only a part of the recitals I could bring upon authentic statements of personal knowledge in regard to the ten-years war.

Here is a man, J. Frank Clark, who is the correspondent of the Richmond (Va.) Times, and who writes from Habana under date of March 7, 1896. He goes on to say:

Arrests of civilians under the sweeping provisions of General Weyler's proclamations of February 16 have been made at such a rate and in many cases with so little evidence of guilt that General Weyler was compelled a week ago to issue instructions to his officers to be more careful, as he required more proof than verbal denunciation. Yesterday he issued a circular, in which he stated that absolute proof must be furnished by other than interested parties before accused prisoners will be deported, and warning commanders that they will be held responsible for false arrests. Without doubt General Weyler has in view the effect of this order abroad as well as here, for the manner in which Cubans who have never borne arms against Spain have been dragged from their homes, from their families, the stores, or their farms and thrown into prisons with felons and after a few days' delay placed on board ship for what is probably the vilest penal colony on the face of the earth has become a shame that cries aloud for redress.

General Weyler upon his arrival set at liberty a number of these civilian prisoners whom General Pando had taken from their daily occupation in the eastern end of the Island. I saw twenty of them at the palace one day. They were white, intelligent looking, and bore the appearance of being shopkeepers or clerks. They were not bronzed by exposure to the weather, as all who are in the field are. The only evidence against these men was a paper purporting to be a list of the people who were aiding and communicating with the enemy. It was made up by a Spaniard. Since that time General Weyler has released others captured in the same way. Hundreds have, however, been sent to Ceuta, Africa, and to the Isle of Pines, and the arrests are increasing in number.

DOES WEYLER APPROVE?

General Weyler has removed the alcaldes of all towns in whom he had not absolute confidence, and has appointed the ranking military officers of regular troops or volunteers alcalde or mayor. These men are usually of the grade of lieutenant or major. They possess arbitrary powers. Under the proclamation the life or death of every man, woman, or child in their zone is in their hands. A large proportion of these commanders believe Weyler to be a man of severe measures, a man who will quietly approve any extreme act on their part. They look upon his circulars as intended for effect in the United States. They look for no punishment for summary executions of Cubans who sympathize with the insurgents. They expect praise and promotion for shooting war prisoners as soon as taken. In their reports they are careful to have the prisoners or the peaceful citizens killed found in the field after an engagement, but between the lines the manner in which the victims met their death is not difficult to decipher.

He then gives a number of other cases, which I will not stop to read, but will insert in my remarks:

OTHER MASSACRES.

Dozens of reports of affairs similar in that unarmed citizens are killed by Spanish troops have been received here, but the authorities have placed such obstacles in the way of correspondents that it is impossible to visit the localities and establish the facts. In a dozen cases refugees from towns where fights have occurred state that after the rebels are driven away citizens who took no part were shot down and counted in the official reports as dead insurgents. The Government officials deny these stories, and while it is common talk in Habana that certain affairs were butcheries the correspondents are in most cases obliged to accept the Government version.

I have visited towns where nearly every family had fled in terror, leaving dishes standing upon the tables and everything in disorder, showing the haste in which homes were abandoned. I talked with the few who remained, and was told that the people did not dread the insurgents, but fled from fear of the excesses of the Spanish troops. On the other hand, in some sections where towns have been used by the Spanish, the insurgents have burned the whole town, and the people were left homeless. Other towns which have harbored rebels have been destroyed by the Spanish troops, and the wreck and ruin which is being visited upon the fair Island of Cuba is pitiful to contemplate.

NATURE ALONE IS KIND.

But for the warmth of the climate and the ease with which life is sustained in the tropics thousands would have perished ere this, and the island would be a charnel house before the end is reached. In many towns there have been no provisions for weeks. People have lived by sucking sugar cane and eating plantains. Families have camped for days upon the ruins of their homes in burned districts, sleeping upon the ground nights and crawling under a thatch during the heat of the sun. Those who could have sought refuge in the cities, and the few in proportion who had the means have escaped to the United States, Mexico, or some other country where peaceable citizens are not liable to summary execution.

There is a great deal more of it, but I do not choose to encumber the RECORD with these statements on either side further than to show that a state of open, horrid war exists in Cuba, and it is a war which involves the peace, the property, the rights, the liberties, and the lives of American citizense who happen to be there.

Our treaty of 1795 and all our treaties since that time, though none has really changed the attitude of the Governments toward each other since that date on this question, guarantees to our citizens the right to go into Cuba and reside there and carry on business and the like of that, and gives the same right to Spanish people who come here. It is as much our duty to protect the Spaniards in this country as it is theirs to protect our people in Cuba.

Are they able to do it? Can they do it? The Spanish Government and the Spanish minister, in his memorandum which he sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations, show their utter inability to do it. War is flagrant in that country, without the ability of either side to protect American property and citizens against the other. I merely want to establish that proposition; and it is not a matter of concern to me whether one Spaniard who is called a Cuban is more ferocious than another who is called a Spaniard proper.

That is not a question for us to decide. We are not weighing our sympathies in the balance. Neither our sympatny nor our indignation ought to enter into this case at all. Yet we can not of course avoid it in giving our votes. But the line of action for us to take is to declare that a state of open, public war exists in Cuba and that the laws of war shall apply to it. We can not protect our citizens otherwise. Are we to stand still when we know that our people and their property are being sacrificed in Cuba, and to wait, how long we do not know, ten years or twenty years, for a termination of a guerrilla warfare that exists there, which may amount to the extermination of the native population and almost the entire Spanish army as well? Are we to wait for that result before we can interpose for the purpose of taking care of our people?

These resolutions, as has often been observed, are matters of opinion. We go no farther than the boundary and domain of opinion. The other House put in the opinion that in certain contingencies and events the Government of the United States ought to be prepared to intervene. I like the resolution of the House better than that of the Senate merely because it takes that ground, for if this matter is to continue, and the outrages and the horrors of the ten-years war is to be repeated, as they are being repeated, by the very same people and under the same circumstances, then I say that it becomes our duty to do that which General Grant was so anxious to do—intervene and stop it. Yet we do not undertake on our part to declare for intervention, except that on certain conditions and under certain circumstances it should become a matter of duty on the part of the Government of the United States. That is our opinion, and is only expressed as our opinion.

I expected when I rose to speak on this case, now for the fourth time, that I would have an opportunity of answering some of the flings which have been thrown at the Committee on Foreign Relations, such as that it is a sleepy committee and the like of that, by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. But I believe, sir, that the occasion is one of too great solemnity and too great importance to permit me to thrust myself into this debate personally or as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I can only say that we have most carefully, attentively, faithfully examined into all of the great mass of petitions and of opinions expressed by thousands of American citizens in legislative assemblies and elsewhere, and we have undertaken in forming our opinions, and only to that extent, to conform them to what we believe to be the truth as it has been ascertained and expressed by the great body of American citizens. There is where we stand, in perfect line with the American people in the expression of their candid, honest, sincere, and well-sustained opinion.

Now, it will not do for the purpose of overturning those opinions for anyone to say that that committee must have summoned before it those who were personal eye observers of all these things. American opinion is formed justly and honestly upon the broad facts of the case as they are known to the American people. They have sought for information through the best and most sincere and candid sources of information, for the purpose of informing themselves as to the opinions that they ought to entertain. These are not new to us. They are old opinions. They are opinions that have been crystallized in respect to Cuba and her relations to Spain now for more than forty years—yes, through the whole of this century.

The House resolution now before us and the Senate resolution differ only as a strong expression of opinion differs from one that is stronger and a wide field of consideration differs from one that is wider.

In both resolutions the two Houses have confined themselves to the mere expression of opinions, neither of them having taken any action that is intended to define the legal attitude of the Government or the people of the United States toward Spain or Cuba.

Our attitude toward Spain is that of peace. Our relation to Cuba is that of peace and sympathy.

We have opinions as to the conduct of Spain, in peace and war, toward her "gem of the Antilles" that are disagreeable to that monarchy that we feel at liberty to express; that our people, almost with one accord, have expressed; that we are compelled to express, as they relate to the condition of a people who are so near to our borders, and so intimately associated with our people, socially and commercially; opinions that we would express if Cuba were as distant from us as Armenia is. A decent regard for the liberty that is sustained and encouraged by our own free institutions requires us, at least, to disavow our open or tacit approval of the conduct of Spain toward Cuba for the last thirty years.

In doing this in proper language, which conveys no censure, if we offend against Spain, we disclaim such a purpose, but we will not on that account violate, or conceal the truth. The expression of our opinion on this subject has given grave offense to Spaniards and probably to Spain, which we would deeply regret if they were unjust; as they are not.

These opinions have given serious offense to some cidevant Americans who edit newspapers, and others who write anonymous threats in letters and on postal cards to members of Congress.

That interesting body of emigrés in the great cities of Europe, new pupils in the old schools of feudalism, who, to escape taxation and the duties of American citizenship, and to enjoy the good society to which our coupon bonds admit them and the hospitalities they would otherwise seek for in vain in the kitchens and servants' halls of London, Paris, and Berlin, are very much offended at the American opinion about Cuban affairs that is expressed in the votes of the two Houses on these resolutions.

The newspapers they own and control in New York, London, and Paris flare up in fervid abuse of Congress for responding to the uttered voice of the American people and for daring to utter a word of sympathy for Cuba.

Yet they are not bold enough to attack the 262 votes to 17 in the House and the 64 votes to 6 in the Senate who voted these opinions.

The story of "Johnny Hook," read by the Senator from New York on last Thursday, and the resolutions of the general assembly of that great State, and of Mississippi, which I have read, seem to convince them that they are a little overmatched by the people and the two Houses of Congress, and in their anger they turn upon individuals of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and rend us.

I have never had a very high respect for those foreign princes and prime ministers whose personal familiarity with our refugees from social coventry is sold for money or whose recognition is won by their mean and slavish contributions to their vainglory.

The most degrading phase of contraband diplomacy is the recent travesty of informing our Government, through certain newspaper owners, of the views of European royalty as to American affairs and politics.

Next to that is the meanness of that species of cowardice that selects a single friend of a great movement of the people, voiced in the resolutions of Congress, and assails that movement by making a personal assault on him.

I would not make a personal matter in the Senate of anything that such persons choose to say about me in their newspapers, but the effort to disparage a great public measure by attributing to me a purpose in its advocacy that has no place in my thoughts, and never had, is a wrong against the public welfare.

If I were asked, as I may have been, and as has often been asked on the floor of the Senate in this session of Congress, where we are to get the money to meet the expenses of war, if we should have to meet its horrors, I would answer that we would not find it necessary to borrow it, as our mines would furnish all we might need for that purpose. This is true; but it is no more a reason for going to war than would be the increased value of iron, or coal, or wool, or cotton, or sugar, or copper that would result from war.

The production of both gold and silver would be increased by any foreign war in which we might engage.

I saw the Confederacy arm its soldiery, while the war was flagrant, by digging the iron ore and the coal from the earth to fashion into guns and swords, and the saltpeter from the caves to manufacture gunpowder.

Since that development of the genius of our people I have never feared that the mighty resources of our people will not be equal to any war that may befall us.

Such fears only beset those feudalists who are rich enough to dread the taxes of warfare and the cost of hiring substitutes. If the liberties and rights of our people rested alone upon the shoulders of gamblers in stocks and men who make corners on the food and raiment of the patriotic soldiers who must fight our battles, the bulls and the bears of the great exchanges would crucify the Republic and cast lots for its raiment, in the presence, even, of the thick darkness that would enshroud its death.

No; I would not sacrifice any honest American citizen, however poor, in a cause that is not holier than life and sweeter than all its hopes. Yet I would not sacrifice his liberties or the true honor of his country to secure the comfort or increase the wealth of every heartless monopolist and nabob in Europe and America.

I abhor the man who would sacrifice human life in any cause save that of justice and liberty. It is this that excites my utmost resentment, when I see men, women, and children starved by feudal monopoly in any of its hideous forms. It is this that compels me to despise the minions of monopoly—the craven feudatories—when, for hire, they sell their influence to increase poverty and breed despair, and seek the shelter of our flag to betray our people by vile assaults upon true Americans who would defend them with their lives.

The Senate, that stands in perpetual organization as the bulwark of the Republic—an eternal rock of defense—is the body that these hired traitors assail with unceasing warfare. That they find support in high feudal quarters, and sometimes in the membership of this body, is as true of us as it was in other times when the foundations of government sank and disappeared in anarchy. But our Senate is an everlasting rock of defense to the Republic, and the powers of death will not prevail against it.

Some Senators have done me the injustice, through a total misunderstanding of my position on these resolutions when they were pending in the committee, to charge me with the motive and purpose of fomenting a war with Spain.

I state without hesitancy that the cry of Cuba for justice, humanity, and mercy, in which there thrills a plea for liberty to which we have listened for a half century, has the full right of appeal to all that I am and all that I feel as a citizen of the United States. It has not fallen upon dull ears or a listless and hardened heart. But for the restraints imposed upon me by the solemn responsibilities of my duty as a Senator I would be abreast with the foremost of those tens of thousands of Americans who urge us to decisive intervention in the name of humanity.

But every member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and its records and the records of the Senate will bear me witness that I have moved slowly and with extreme caution in the course of our progress in this matter.

I have not the honor of the acquaintance of the Spanish minister or of any Cuban agents, and I have even been rude in my refusal to receive or communicate with the Cuban agents while this matter was pending in the committee. Above all else I desired to reach impartial conclusions upon the best evidence that was available as to our rights of neutrality by recognizing that open, general war that now exists in Cuba between the people and the Crown. My vote was for delay until we could be reasonably sure of our ground, although I felt that patriots were dying for the cause of liberty while we deliberated about our giving a wound to the pride of the Spanish monarchy. I knew from the past history of Spanish wars, beginning with the conquests of Cortez and Pizarro, and in the Netherlands, and the civil war in Spain at the close of the last century, and in the wars of the Mexican revolution and those of Central and South America, and especially in the great ten-years war for emancipation and civil liberty in Cuba, and the wars for the republic in Spain, that Spanish enemies were all treated as rebels and traitors, and that submission or extermination was the sole alternative of Spanish ferocity.

Extermination is the established penalty for resistance to any demand of Spain when made upon Spanish subjects. If we must support their dominion against alleged insurrectionists, we must also support the utter ruin and destruction of those who rebel against Spanish authority for whatever cause. It is dear price for an American to pay for the forms and ceremonies of international comity and for the good will of a tyrannical despotism.

Yet such seemed to be the demand of our own Government in its long and oft-repeated vigilant watch and guard against our own people which has converted every great harbor on our eastern and southern coasts into a Spanish picket post, on which we have mounted guard with police and soldiers and warships, with their guns pointed at our own shores.

On my part, I have followed these movements of our Government "afar off," but with faithful obedience.

So I waited in silent discontent while the tide of blood still flowed and the fires of desolation swept the beautiful island.

At last the time for action came; the time when threadbare patience could no longer conceal the demand of duty, and the committee took up its responsible task.

I had offered no resolution in the Senate or in the committee, and had the whole field to select from. They were all intense in expression and decisive in their proposed action.

Any one of them would have provoked Spain to war as certainly as a torpedo in the neck of a Spanish bull would excite him to deadly war against the matador.

And yet not one of them that related to belligerent rights was, in law or by intention, in the least degree hostile to Spain.

No decent, law-abiding, or self-respecting nation in Christendom would have treated such resolutions as derogatory to its pride, insulting to its honor, or unfriendly in purpose.

Yet I had read enough of Spanish history in Cuba from authentic statements of our own Government, made directly in the teeth of Spain, to know that any movement, even to lessen the horrid barbarities of Spanish warfare, would cause her to charge upon us as a Spanish bull would charge a red flag in their national sport.

When we took up this mass of petitions lying before me, which is growing daily, I presented a declaration and resolutions that were the mildest possible plea for humanity in the mere conduct of the war. I will ask the Secretary to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the present deplorable war in the Island of Cuba has reached a magnitude that concerns all civilized nations to the extent that it should be conducted, if unhappily it is longer to continue, on those principles and laws of warfare that are acknowledged to be obligatory upon civilized nations when engaged in open hostilities, including the treatment of captives who are enlisted in either army; due respect to cartels for exchange of prisoners and for other military purposes; truces and flags of truce; the provision of proper hospitals and hospital supplies and services to the sick and wounded of either army.

Resolved further, That this representation of the views and opinions of Congress be sent to the President, and if he concurs therein that he will, in a friendly spirit, use the good offices of this Government to the end that Spain shall be requested to accord to the armies with which it is engaged in war the rights of belligerents as the same are recognized under the laws of nations.

Mr. MORGAN. I will have the declaration preceding the resolutions and forming the report of the committee inserted in my remarks without stopping to read it. The Senate is familiar with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report submitted by Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, January 29, 1896, is as follows:

The Congress of the United States, deeply regretting the unhappy state of hostilities existing in Cuba, which has again been the result of the demand of a large number of the native population of that island for its independence, in a spirit of respect and regard for the welfare of both countries, earnestly desires that the security of life and property and the establishment of permanent peace and of a government that is satisfactory to the people of Cuba should be accomplished.

And to the extent that the people of Cuba are seeking the rights of local self-government for domestic purposes, the Congress of the United States expresses its earnest sympathy with them. The Congress would also welcome with satisfaction the concession, by Spain, of complete sovereignty to the people of that island, and would cheerfully give to such a voluntary concession the cordial support of the United States. The near proximity of Cuba to the frontier of the United States, and the fact that it is universally regarded as a part of the continental system of America, identifies that island so closely with the political and commercial welfare of our people, that Congress can not be indifferent to the fact that civil war is flagrant among the people of Cuba.

Nor can we longer overlook the fact that the destructive character of this war is doing serious harm to the rights and interests of our people on the island, and to our lawful commerce, the protection and freedom of which are safeguarded by treaty obligations. In the recent past and in former years, when internal wars have been waged for long periods and with results that were disastrous to Cuba and injurious to Spain, the Government of the United States has always observed with perfect faith all of its duties toward the belligerents.

It was a difficult task thus forced upon the United States, but it was performed with vigor, impartiality, and justice, in the hope that Spain would so ameliorate the condition of the Cuban people as to give them peace, contentment, and prosperity. This desirable result has not been accomplished. Its failure has not resulted from any interference on the part of our people or Government with the people or government of Cuba.

The hospitality which our treaties, the laws of nations, and the laws of Christianity have extended to Cuban refugees in the United States has caused distrust on the part of the Spanish Government as to the fidelity of our Government to its obligations of neutrality in the frequent insurrections of the people of Cuba against Spanish authority. This distrust has often become a source of serious annoyance to our people, and has led to a spirit of retaliation toward Spanish authority in Cuba, thus giving rise to frequent controversies between the two countries. The absence of responsible government in Cuba, with powers adequate to deal directly with questions between the people of the United States and the people and political authorities of the island, has been a frequently recurring cause of delay, protracted imprisonment, confiscations of property, and the detention of our people and their ships, often upon groundless charges, which has been a serious grievance.

When insurrections have occurred on the Island of Cuba the temptation to unlawful invasion by reckless persons has given to our Government anxiety, trouble, and much expense in the enforcement of our laws and treaty obligations of neutrality, and these occasions have been so frequent as to make these duties unreasonably onerous upon the Government of the United States.

The devastation of Cuba in the war that is now being waged, both with fire and sword, is an anxious and disturbing cause of unrest among the people of the United States, which creates strong grounds of protest against the continuance of the struggle for power between Cuba and Spain, which is rapidly changing the issue to one of existence on the part of a great number of the native population.

It is neither just to the relations that exist between Cuba and the United States nor is it in keeping with the spirit of the age or the rights of humanity that this struggle should be protracted until one party or the other should become exhausted in the resources of men and money, thereby weakening both until they may fall a prey to some stronger power, or until the stress of human sympathy or the resentments engendered by long and bloody conflict should draw into the strife the unruly elements of neighboring countries.

This civil war, though it is great in its proportions and is conducted by armies that are in complete organization and directed and controlled by supreme military authority, has not the safeguard of a cartel for the treatment of wounded soldiers or prisoners of war.

In this feature of the warfare it becomes a duty of humanity that the civilized powers should insist upon the application of the laws of war recognized among civilized nations to both armies. As our own people are drawn into this struggle on both sides, and enter either army without the consent of our Government and in violation of our laws, their treatment when they may be wounded or captured, although it is not regulated by treaty and ceases to be a positive care of our Government, should not be left to the revengeful retaliations which expose them to the fate of pirates or other felons.

The inability of Spain to subdue the revolutionists by the measures and within the time that would be reasonable when applied to occasions of ordinary civil disturbance is a misfortune that can not be justly visited upon citizens of the United States, nor can it be considered that a state of open civil war does not exist, but that the movement is a mere insurrection and its supporters a mob of criminal violators of the law, when it is seen that it requires an army of 100,000 men and all the naval and military power of a great kingdom even to hold the alleged rebellion in check.

It is due to the situation of affairs in Cuba that Spain should recognize the existence of a state of war in the island, and should voluntarily accord to the armies opposed to her authority the rights of belligerents under the laws of nations.

The Congress of the United States, recognizing the fact that the matters herein referred to are properly within the control of the Chief Executive until, within the principles of our Constitution, it becomes the duty of Congress to define the final attitude of the Government of the United States toward Spain, presents these considerations to the President in support of the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the present deplorable war in the Island of Cuba has reached a magnitude that concerns all civilized nations to the extent that it should be conducted, if unhappily it is longer to continue, on those principles and laws of warfare that are acknowledged to be obligatory upon civilized nations when engaged in open hostilities, including the treatment of captives who are enlisted in either army; due respect to cartels for exchange of prisoners and for other military purposes; truces and flags of truce; the provision of proper hospitals and hospital supplies and services to the sick and wounded of either army."

Resolved further, That this representation of the views and opinions of Congress be sent to the President; and if he concurs therein that he will, in a friendly spirit, use the good offices of this Government to the end that Spain shall be requested to accord to the armies with which it is engaged in war the rights of belligerents, as the same are recognized under the laws of nations.

FEBRUARY 5, 1896.—Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following concurrent resolution as a substitute for concurrent resolution No. 19, reported January 29, 1896:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the Government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I felt that I owed an explanation to the committee for the mildness of such a response to the demand of our people for a more cogent expression.

I said to the committee, in substance:

"I offer this declaration because it places the United States on ground that no civilized nation can possibly criticise. I do this in the firm conviction that when we listen to the petitions of our indignant people and turn our faces in the direction they are moving, the first step we take, however short, whether it is an inch or an ell, will result in a war with Spain. I keep my eyes fixed steadfastly on that result without reference to its justice, wisdom, or necessity. Spain can not conquer Cuba with her burden of debt and the political dissensions that lurk about the Spanish throne. Spain knows this, and her pride will force her to prefer to lose Cuba in conflict with some great power rather than surrender it as she has done her other American possessions, to a body of insurrectionists whom she despises and denounces in the most opprobrious terms. So far as I am concerned I am convinced that war with Spain is inevitable as the outgrowth of this Cuban affair. It will come at an early day, and nothing but our denunciation of the Cubans can delay the conflict. In voting for this mild declaration I feel that I am in the act of drawing the sword and laying it upon this table, and am saying to Spain. 'Take it up if you will.'"

The committee laid aside my resolutions and adopted, provisionally, a much stronger one than those which I proposed.

At the next meeting the committee adopted my declaration and resolutions and ordered me to report them to the Senate, which I did.

Within twenty-four hours the cable brought us accounts that this overture excited anger in Madrid for its insolence, contempt for its weakness, and derision for its singularity, and with it there came a storm of blustering gasconade.

Campos was recalled, and the temper of Spain was heated to the degree that only Weyler could keep pace with. Weyler was ordered to Cuba. The committee met again and concluded, after anxious discussion, to set aside the resolutions they had ordered me to report, and directed me to report the resolution that passed the Senate after being amended with the addition of the resolution for Cuban independence offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Now, what excuse can there be for the attack made upon me in the Senate, followed by some newspapers in New York, charging me with drawing the sword and challenging Spain to take it up, and that I had said to some person whose name is not mentioned that I desired a war with Spain because it would result in the remonetization of silver?

Why did they not charge that motive to me for the earnest support I gave to Mr. Olney's noble avowal and definition of the Monroe doctrine? Men from the North send me postal cards warning me that Maceo is a negro, a very black one, they say, and advising me to quit the country and consort with him in the Cuban cabinet.

This thrust deserves, at least, a parry. The freedom of the slaves was a prime factor in the ten-years' war in Cuba, which begun at the close of our civil war. In both wars negro troops were used, and with nearly equal savagery. In Cuba, as in our Southern States, the mass of the negro population adhered to their masters. In Cuba the masters took sides with the Government; in the United States the Government was at war with the slaveholders.

General Grant and Mr. Fish, his Secretary of State, desired above all things else connected with Spanish troubles the emancipation of the slaves. The Republicans in Spain adopted the American demand for emancipation, and upon these ideas they dethroned Amadeus and established a Republic. In the time of the Republic an ordinance of gradual emancipation was proclaimed. But the Spanish sugar planters and the New York sugar merchants and refiners found it to their interest to crush out Gomez and Cisneros, who were fighting for the full emancipation of the negroes, and for the independence of the island, and General Grant and Mr. Fish came to believe that the Republic in Spain, having been abandoned in favor of the Crown, that it was better for the Cubans that they should surrender on pledges guaranteeing important liberties to them, and that a republic was then impossible in the island.

General Grant, acting against his personal convictions and the humane sympathies of his nature, sent in his message of June, 1870, refusing to recommend the recognition of belligerent rights for the Cubans. That refusal virtually ended the war, and Gomez became the active promoter of the general capitulation. The terms of that capitulation were in letter and spirit violated by Spain, and Gomez and Maceo returned to take up arms and Cisneros to resume the civil presidency, and the emancipated slaves, one-fifth of the population, united with them to raise again the flag of Cuban independence.

The negro population in Cuba is about in the same proportion that exists in the United States. This added element of military strength accounts, in a large degree, for the great increase of the forces at war with Spain.

Those men of the North mistake me when they assume that I could have any prejudice toward the negro race that would cause me to deny to them good government, safety in life and property, and every personal liberty that I enjoy in our free Republic.

I do not believe, any more than Congress or the people of the District of Columbia believe, that the negro race is a useful or necessary factor in the government of a great Republic. We place the Indian tribes and the Chinese on even a lower scale in political government, while we give them full measure of liberty. But the negro has the same right as the white man to escape from the tyrannical despotism of Spain and to have a fair opportunity to enjoy the true and full value of independence. That blessing, like the air of the heavens, the sweet waters that flow from the green hills, and the safe shelter of the roof tree of home, should be the heritage of every freeman.

I would rather be in the cabinet of a republic with Gomez and Maceo than in the cabinet of the Spanish monarchy with Valmaseda and Weyler.

I gather my impression of the war policy and methods of the Spanish monarchy from the records of impartial history, without any prejudice against these people. The progress of civilization seems to have no effect or tendency to mitigate the stern rule of extermination applied by Spain to all who are found in rebellion against her authority. No country in Europe, and probably none in the world, has suffered more revolutionary changes in government than Spain has had during the present century.

In the previous growth of the Spanish monarchy both hemispheres were watered with innocent blood and dotted with graves of innocent people of all ages and conditions, to extend the dominion of avarice and pride through the destruction of all opposing political or religious parties and sects that Spain had the power to crush. After Protestant Netherlands had fought for her liberties and had lost a full generation in the struggle, Spain's period of decline set in rapidly. Since the year 1800 scarcely a period of three years, on the average, has elapsed without a change of government in the mother country or in the colonies that involved war, attended with great sacrifice of life.

In the transitions of the colonies into independent republics under our great example, this young and then unproved Republic, the near neighbor and sympathetic exemplar of free constitutional government by a course of honorable justice and firm assertion of our rights and the careful observance of duty, maintained its neutrality during the prevalence of wars for independence in the great colonies of Spain.

We did not withhold our expressions of sympathy for the colonies in revolt, or refuse to recognize their rights as belligerents, or their independence when that was won or appeared to be certain of realization; yet we took no part in these wars, and had no thought of taking advantage of them for territorial aggrandizement. These facts should impress Spain with our sense of justice and duty, when, to save our people from suffering the losses and hardships of the present war in Cuba, we seek only to apply the laws of civilized warfare to an open, confessed, and universally admitted state of civil war in that island.

We do not seek to change our relations to Cuba upon any claim of right to interfere in the domestic affairs of Spain in that island any more than we do in Puerto Rico, where war does not exist. Our duty is to our own people, and it is a duty that Spain can not prevent us from performing. We have, in a spirit of forbearance, omitted to demand our rights in the chronic state of war that has afflicted Spain during all this nineteenth century, and have gone no further than to protest against the losses of liberty, life, and property that have been entailed on our people in these Cuban insurrections. We have stood by while our people were being murdered in Cuba and their property confiscated without law or a trial, and only in a few cases have we been able, after long delay, to collect the price of this blood in money. We find now that our forbearance is reckoned with as if it were weakness, and our neutrality is abused by Spain.

I prefer, and our people demand, that Spain shall not destroy our citizens or their property on a credit, but she must hereafter pay as she goes. We no longer choose to permit our people to be persecuted and slain by either party in Cuba under the pretext that neither of them has the power to prevent such wrongs, and if it must be, we will intervene to prevent it, even at the risk of shocking the keen sense of propriety that some Senators are troubled with.

In the midst of the last ten years' war in Cuba Spain, on the 11th of February, 1873, discarded the monarchy and established the republic under Fiqueras. It had been three years in process of full development, but the tendency was all the time toward the republic. Isabella fled to France in 1868, and a triumvirate under Serrano formed a provisional government. Cuba was immediately involved in revolution. Much blood was shed in Spain to promote the republic, and many lives were destroyed in Cuba to sustain the same cause.

The emancipation of the slaves was the avowed task of the Republic of Spain, and in this Government General Grant felt that Cuban independence would ultimately find its greatest ally and friend.

No one could have been more determined than General Grant was that the republican movements in Spain and Cuba should result in the abolition of slavery. This great purpose inspired and strengthened every hope of good that he expected from that revolution both in Spain and Cuba. Spain was striving to put down monarchy at home and to put down the republic in Cuba. Spain, whether it was monarchic or republican, clung to slavery in Cuba, and a large body of Cubans demanded the abolition of slavery and the republic, with national independence.

General Grant was convinced that the success of the republic in Spain would result in the abolition of slavery in Cuba, and that the people of Cuba would not be able, against the opposition of both parties in Spain, to abolish slavery. His policy then became clear and definite. It was to encourage the republic in Spain on the condition that the Republic would abolish slavery in Cuba. This condition was accepted by the republic in Spain and was ultimately accomplished.

The people of the United States were restive under the horrors of the Spanish methods of warfare in Cuba, and in 1870 General Grant sent his message to Congress to inform them of the grounds upon which he discouraged their demand for belligerent rights for the Cubans in arms. This was when the insurrection had progressed only a single year.

Had the United States then recognized the rights of belligerency in favor of the Cubans, it would have united all parties in Spain against the emancipation of the slaves. The great and inspiring hope of a voluntary act of emancipation would have perished and the antislavery men in the United States would have been driven to the alternative of liberating the slaves in Cuba by force, and to the odium of encouraging a servile insurrection in order to promote anarchy for the sake of emancipation. The other alternative, of procuring the freedom of the slaves in Cuba through the creation of the republic in Spain, was free from any strain on American sentiment and was joyfully accepted by the President.

But General Grant would not intervene to repress the people of Cuba in their struggle for independence. All he could do, until emancipation of the slaves was secured, was to await results without interference. His good offices were constantly pressed upon the Republic of Spain for a settlement that would add to their decree of emancipation of the slaves a guarantee of equal rights and liberties to the native white Cubans. This pledge was obtained from Spain, and Gomez and Cisneros laid down their arms and, accepting this pledge, became most active and efficient in persuading the Cuban people to desist from further warfare. The treaty was made and broken by the Spaniards, cruelly broken, and the emancipated slaves are united with the native white people in a renewed demand for the republic, for liberty, for justice, and for the safety of life.

General Grant could not openly declare this great line of policy. That would have been fatal to his success. If our people could have seen it they would have been more patient during the eight years of cruel warfare that followed after the repressive message of 1870. But they felt that their Government was looking with indifference upon the horrible saturnalia of blood and fire which President Grant mentioned, as a warning to Spain, in the message of 1870, and they went alone and in small bands to the devastated islands, to help the patriot people in their war for existence.

General Grant was far from viewing those atrocities with indifference. I will read a letter of Mr. Fish to Admiral Pablo after awhile that will clear that point, and will show the grounds on which I rest our present action. That letter would sustain a line of action far more decisive and effectual than is now proposed. I have not chosen to adopt it, on my part, because I do not wish to give Spain any pretext for any result that her conduct has invited which would seem to cast the blame on the United States.

Let the attitude of Spain toward the native people of Cuba, black and white, find its justification or its excuse in her own policies and counsels, and not in anything short of a positive duty that we shall do.

In my studies of the situation in Cuba and of the duties of Congress connected with it I have taken the message of 1870 as my guide, although I believe it is far too narrow in its limitations upon our rights, and I have found that the facts of the war in Cuba and the law as it is stated in that message bring the case entirely within the most restricted requirements of that paper.

We have never settled the powers of Congress, acting independently of the President, as to mandatory action with reference to the recognition of a state of belligerency or a declaration of war. We do not know what is, or will be, the policy of the President in the Cuban imbroglio. Acting, then, as representatives of States that memorialize Congress and the people who shower petitions upon us, it is wiser that our response to them should indicate clearly the opinions of Congress rather than some decisive act to which the Executive might dissent. When the people and Congress have expressed their opinions in a way that is practically unanimous, if the President does not concur he will assume the responsibility.

The letter to which I referred, Mr. President, is that of Mr. Fish to Admiral Polo de Bernabé, who was at that time the minister of Spain to this country. Mr. Fish says, in some of the places which I will quote, what I will read. I will put the entire part of the letter referring to this matter in the RECORD as an appendix to my speech. On the 10th of September, 1869, the minister of transmarine affairs at Madrid, in an official paper, said:

A deplorable and pertinacious tradition of despotism, which, if it could ever be justified, is without a shadow of reason at the present time, intrusted the direction and management of our colonial establishment to the agents of the metropolis, destroying, by their dominant and exclusive authority, the vital energies of the country and the creative and productive activity of free individuals. And although the system may now have improved in some of its details, the domineering action of the authorities being less felt, it still appears full of the original error, which is upheld by the force of tradition, and the necessary influence of interests created under their protection, which, doubtless, are deserving of respect so far as they are reconcilable with the requirements of justice, with the common welfare, and with the principles on which every liberal system should be founded. A change of system, political as well as administrative, is therefore imperatively demanded.

Mr. Fish says, after quoting this remark:

But while admitting the existence of the injuries which had provoked the outbreak at Yara, the government of the revolution of 1868 refused to remedy them until the armed insurrection should be suppressed. "Spain would already have given all constitutional liberties to Cuba," said Mr. Silvela to General Sickles, "if the unfortunate insurrection of Yara, and the cry of 'Death to Spain,' uttered by some Cubans, had not alienated the sympathies of the nation, and obliged the government to accept the impolitic contest to which it was provoked. The government considers that it can come to no definite decision in regard to the political situation and future government of the Island of Cuba until the insurgents lay down their arms and cease the struggle."

That is the quotation. Then Mr. Fish says:

This would indicate that it is the resistance to admitted wrongs, and not the wrongfulness of resistance, which Spain is endeavoring to repress.

I pass on to some few other extracts. Mr. Fish says:

It must be frankly confessed that there were many persons in the United States who shared the theoretical opinions of the Spanish statesmen, but who could not agree in the diametrically opposite policy which Spain pursued toward Cuba under their directions.

It was natural for the people of the United States to feel an interest in the prosperity of Cuba. This and the reasons for it were well understood at Madrid. Mr. Martos, in the presence of his colleagues, Mr. Becerra and Mr. Rivero, had officially spoken to General Sickles of "the common interests shared by the United States and Spain in Cuba." He said "that whatever retarded the prosperity of the island was injurious alike to both countries; that the welfare of Cuba was of more commercial importance to the United States than to the mother country."

Mr. Fish says upon this quotation:

This wise statesman might have added that the interest of the United States in Cuba was heightened by a desire that the deadly struggle on the island might end in the acquisition of self-government (whether under or free from Spanish rule was, of course, immaterial to an American) and in the abolition of slavery. Such was undoubtedly the fact. The undersigned feels convinced that these views were shared by the mass of the liberal statesmen of Spain, modified probably by the patriotic wish that the island should retain its political connection with Spain. But it could not be expected that foreigners would share in the full warmth of this wish of Spanish statesmen. The mass of the people of the United States certainly gave little heed to the matter beyond the natural preference that a disturbing element of European politics should be removed from the American system.

I must pass on, because the time is drawing near when I must take my seat.

On the 24th of March, 1869—

the captain-general of Cuba issued a decree, which is referred to by Admiral Polo, and from which the following is an extract:

"Vessels which may be captured in Spanish waters, or on the high seas near to the island, having on board men, arms, and munitions, or effects that can in any manner contribute, promote, or foment the insurrection in this province, whatsoever their derivation and destination, after examination of their papers and register, shall be de facto considered as enemies of the integrity of our territory, and treated as pirates, in accordance with the ordinances of the navy.

"All persons captured in such vessels, without regard to their number, will be immediately executed."

A copy of this decree was received at this Department on the 2d of April, 1869, and the undersigned, although but then just entered upon the duties of his office, and greatly pressed with other public matters requiring immediate attention, put everything aside, by direction of the President, and on the next date wrote as follows to the minister of Spain at Washington:

I will only quote from that one paragraph:

This Government certainly can not assent to the punishment by Spanish authorities of any citizen of the United States for the exercise of a privilege to which he may be entitled under public law and treaties.

Mr. President, that is the law of Spain to-day in this war. Mr. Fish says further:

The order to indiscriminately slaughter "all persons captured in such vessels, without regard to their number," could not but shock the sensibilities of all humane persons. The undersigned felt, however, unwilling to object to the execution of the order, except when proposed to be enforced against citizens of the United States.

I am sorry he was unwilling to do that, but he had a great motive, or the President had, which held him in check.

In regard to the second point thus stated by Admiral Polo's esteemed predecessor, the undersigned was constrained by a due regard to universally recognized principles of international rights and duties to declare that, in the absence of a recognized state of war, it was no offense in the sailing vessels and steamers of the United States to carry arms and munitions of war for whomsoever it might concern.

I am sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is not present to hear this overturning of the sedate and sage enunciation of the law made by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee two or three times in this debate.

The undersigned has uniformly said that no government can by the law of nations be held responsible for shipments of arms, munitions, or materials of war, made by private individuals at their own risk and peril. If a state of war should exist, if Spain should be entitled to the rights of a belligerent, parties concerned in the shipment of arms and military supplies for her enemy would incur the risk of confiscation by her of their goods; but their act would involve no ground of reclamation against their government in behalf of Spain; and consequently no right to invoke the aid of that government in preventing the perpetration of the act. Such it is believed is the established law of nations, and such the received rule even when the shipment of arms and munitions is made from the territory of the country whose citizens may be the parties engaged in the introduction of these supplies for the use of one of the belligerents.

Further on Mr. Fish says, when speaking of the decree of the 24th of March:

The objectionable decree of the 24th of March was soon followed by a proclamation of Count Valmaseda still more abhorrent to the sense of the civilized world. By this proclamation, made at Bayamo on the 4th of April, 1869, which reached the Department of State on the 9th of May, the following announcement was made to Cubans who believed with Mr. Castelar, General Prim, Mr. Becerra, Mr. Silvela, Mr. Martos, Mr. Rivera, and other Spanish statesmen, that Cuba was suffering under oppression and wrong which ought to be remedied:

"First. Every man, from the age of 15 years upward, found away from his habitation (finca), and does not prove a justified motive therefor, will be shot."

That is Weyler's decree now, with a little sugar coating:

Second. Every habitation unoccupied will be burned by the troops.

That is in full force under Weyler's decree.

Third. Every habitation from which does not float a white flag, as a signal that its occupants desire peace, will be reduced to ashes.

Women that are not living at their own homes, or at the house of their relatives, will collect in the town of Jiguani, or Bayamo, where maintenance will be provided. Those who do not present themselves will be conducted forcibly.

What will happen to them on the way God only knows. Mr. Fish further says:

The courses of trade and of social intercourse had carried many citizens of the United States into Cuba. When, therefore, this proclamation reached the undersigned, the President thought it right toward Spain that, although scarcely crediting the genuineness of the document, the undersigned should send the following notice to Mr. Lopez Roberts:

"In the interest of Christian civilization and common humanity, I hope that this document is a forgery. If it be indeed genuine, the President instructs me, in the most forcible manner, to protest against such a mode of warfare, and to ask you to request the Spanish authorities in Cuba to take such steps that no person having the right to claim the protection of the Government of the United States shall be sacrificed or injured in the conduct of hostilities upon this basis."

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I wish to announce to the Senate that in the morning, after the disposal of the routine business, I wish to address the Senate on the Cuban question, if there be no objection. I have been waiting for several days, and I am compelled to leave the Chamber now, or I would remain and take the floor after my friend from Alabama has concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice will be entered.

Mr. MORGAN. In my comments upon this matter, I shall be very brief, and shall conclude in a few moments. I desire to omit everything except what is absolutely essential to my purpose to show that there exists in Cuba to-day the same condition of affairs, the same decrees, issued even by the same men that Mr. Fish was denouncing in this letter to Admiral Polo in 1874. That was long after the message of the President of June, 1870, from which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] read a brief extract:

The United States were in a state of war when the orders referred to were issued—

That is, the orders of our people—

Spain had not been slow in forcing upon them in the very incipiency of the rebellion her recognition of a state of war. She does not now recognize that she is herself at war, but appeals, as a precedent for her conduct, to rules prescribed for armies in the field. If she claims the rights, it is but logical that she accept the consequences of a state of war.

I have pointed out in the course of this debate, from the reports of our own consuls, that the Spaniards treat our exports from this country into Cuba as being contraband of war at their will and pleasure. So they claim all the rights of war, but are not willing to submit to any of its disabilities, the very case that Mr. Fish is commenting upon. Says Mr. Fish further:

The undersigned is confident that Admiral Polo will feel a sincere pleasure in thus knowing that his information respecting these instructions has been incorrect. Even had it been correct, the accomplished and generous minister from Spain and the undersigned would alike feel unwilling to contend that two wrongs could make a right.

Even in such case, however, it would be remembered that a worthy precedent might be found in the practice of the United States during a rebellion of the most mighty proportions, pending which not a prisoner was killed in cold blood; not a political crime, however grave, was visited with capital punishment. The soil of the United States remains to this day unstained by the first drop of blood taken from a political offender. Had this example been followed wherever a political insurrection had arisen, many might now be living whose blood cries aloud against the cruelty of some rulers. Christendom generally applauds the example of clemency and generosity which the United States thus exhibited.

The same spirit of generous regard for life and forgiveness marks the policy of the United States in other respects, and makes their penal codes look to the prevention more than to the punishment of crime, and often withholds the enforcement of penalties when the danger against which they are denounced is supposed to have passed. It is with much regret that it is seen from the correspondence with the representatives of Spain for the past five years, and from the frequent complaints (in the note of Admiral Polo, now acknowledged) of the omission of the United States to enforce penalties and inflict punishment, that Spain does not sympathize with the policy of clemency and forgiveness, and seems to regard punishment as the test of the sincerity with which crime is denounced and as the sole means of preventing at least political offenses. The examples of the condition of the two countries must be the criterion to determine the comparative merits of the antagonistic systems.

He then goes into an extensive discussion here of the rights of vessels on the high seas, and speaking of the restrictions imposed upon them and also of restrictions imposed upon land, he says:

In consequence of these severe measures against the persons and properties of Cubans who shared the opinions of the liberal statesmen of Spain respecting the injuries which had been inflicted upon their native country, many fled from the island to the United States. And the undersigned can not disguise from himself that these Spanish subjects, driven from their native country, have attempted to abuse the hospitality of the United States—that they have tried to make use of their safety here in order to regain what they had lost in Cuba, and that they have been restrained only by the perpetual vigilance and zeal of the officers of the United States. Alas! if the ears of the ministers of Amadeo and of the Republic could have been opened to the complaints of their Cuban friends, what criminations might have been spared us!

The very accusation that is made here now by the present minister from Spain against the refugees from Cuba—

I believe, Mr. President, that I shall refrain from further quotations from this very remarkable and very able letter, which covers the whole subject of the present Cuban insurrection. I noticed while that war was in progress Mr. Fish called to the attention of the Spanish Government in this letter to 22 cases of serious outrage against the property and lives of American citizens which remained to be adjusted after the war was over. I do not want to pile up a docket of that kind under these circumstances; I do not want to stand by until murder has been perpetrated, attended with extreme cruelty and outrage, and to wait until some future time when, possibly, this revolutionary movement may be crushed out, for us to demand of Spain as many even as 22 cases of reclamation and damages for wrongs we have suffered.

We have suffered enough; we have spent enough money in standing guard for Spain, and in keeping our people out of Cuba, and in restraining them, and in capturing their property and confiscating it when the slightest proof of conspiracy could be found to exist in regard to a purpose of invasion of Cuba—we have spent enough, and we have suffered enough, and have stood these outrages long enough; and, now that Spain is engaged in a war with Cuba that, evidently, is hopeless, I think, sir, that we may be pardoned if we express our opinion, to say the least of it, that war prevails there, and that those people ought to be entitled to the rights of belligerency, and our people ought to be entitled to the rights of neutrality, and be allowed the benefits of neutrality.

I regret, Mr. President, that I have had to spend so much time in the discussion of this question; I never went into anything with more reluctance; but I have felt compelled to take all this toil upon myself simply because, in the accident of the passage of the resolutions through the committee it devolved upon me to make the report of the action of the committee, which put me in charge virtually of these resolutions.

Sir, when we met in conference we found that the disagreement in these opinions of the two Houses related only to verbal criticisms, and nothing more. I have said before, and I repeat it, that the resolutions of either body would be entirely satisfactory to me; but in the House of Representatives, immediately after we sent our resolution to them, there was reported a resolution which involves a mere difference in stating an opinion and caused no jar upon my feelings or sensibilities. I remembered that we were attempting to do nothing but to express our opinions.

After the resolution of the Senate went over to the House it there met the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which, of course, the House of Representatives felt naturally disposed to adhere. They passed their resolution; it was brought here; we disagreed to the amendment which they proposed to the Senate resolution; and that disagreement brought us into a conference. In that conference we considered both of the resolutions, in fact, the whole programme of our previous action in both committees; and I think that we came to a patriotic conclusion when we determined that the two Houses of Congress, in taking this mild but firm action on our part, would do injustice to the will, to the honor, to the express professions and belief of the people of this country if we should recede and find that we were incapable of agreeing in the method of the expression of our opinions.

There is no preference in favor of the one over the other, except that I believe, as I said to the committee at the time the resolutions were before it, that the passage of the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to the effect that the President of the United States shall use his good offices with the Government of Spain to induce that Government to recognize the independence of Cuba might be considered by that Government, and very naturally I think would be considered by that Government, as an intrusive overture on our part, irritating to their feelings. I have not any doubt that such would be the fact.

Now, I repeat what I have said on several occasions since I have been on my feet to-day. I do not wish to give to Spain or to any nation of this earth any apparent ground for criticising our action. I want us to stand on a line that includes our rights beyond dispute. That is the reason I have been willing to put up with opinions when I believed that acts ought to have been the expression of our opinions. I have never had any doubt that even the expression of an opinion unfavorable to the fanatical and deluded monarchy would be regarded as an act of hostility that would compel Spain to throw down the gage of war.

APPENDIX.

No. 21.

Mr. Fish to Admiral Polo de Bernabé.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 18, 1874.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the reception of the note of 2d of February last, which his excellency Admiral Polo de Barnabé, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain, addressed to him respecting the Virginius, and the assumed relations of the United States toward the insurrection in Cuba.

The pressure of business incident to the session of Congress and a severe indisposition have prevented an earlier reply to that note.

The undersigned has observed with regret in Admiral Polo's note harsh expressions and unwarranted criticisms upon the official conduct of officers of the United States, which he feels confident would not have obtained admission to the paper had they attracted the attention of the accomplished minister of Spain, whose sense of justice would not allow him to give expression to what his sensitiveness and regard for the proprieties of diplomatic correspondence would not permit him calmly to accept.

The undersigned finds in the historical part of Admiral Polo's note many misapprehensions of facts (as the facts are understood by this Government), and many errors of omission, which need to be corrected before entering upon the particular argument respecting the Virginius. The undersigned will endeavor to do this as briefly as possible.

The insurrection which broke out at Yara, in the autumn of 1868, has had the unusual good fortune of having the justice of the complaints, which it alleges in its justification, recognized by those who are engaged in suppressing it. On the 10th of September, 1869, the minister of transmarine affairs at Madrid, in an official paper, said:

"A deplorable and pertinacious tradition of despotism, which, if it could ever be justified, is without a shadow of reason at the present time, intrusted the direction and management of our colonial establishment to the agents of the metropolis, destroying, by their dominant and exclusive authority, the vital energies of the country, and the creative and productive activity of free individuals. And although the system may now have improved in some of its details, the domineering action of the authorities being less felt, it still appears full of the original error, which is upheld by the force of tradition, and the necessary influence of interests created under their protection, which, doubtless, are deserving of respect so far as they are reconcilable with the requirements of justice, with the common welfare, and with the principles on which every liberal system should be founded. A change of system, political as well as administrative, is therefore imperatively demanded."

But while admitting the existence of the injuries which had provoked the outbreak at Yara, the government of the revolution of 1868 refused to remedy them until the armed insurrection should be suppressed. "Spain would already have given all constitutional liberties to Cuba," said Mr. Silvela to General Sickles, "if the unfortunate insurrection of Yara and the cry of 'Death to Spain,' uttered by some Cubans, had not alienated the sympathies of the nation and obliged the Government to accept the impolitic contest to which it was provoked. The Government considers that it can come to no definite decision in regard to the political situation and future government of the Island of Cuba until the insurgents lay down their arms and cease the struggle." This would indicate that it is the resistance to admitted wrongs, and not the wrongfulness of resistance, which Spain is endeavoring to repress.

One of the two great questions at issue between the insurgents and the authorities of Spain was understood to be the future condition of the African race in the island. The insurgents, as early as the 26th of February, 1869, decreed the abolition of slavery "in the name of liberty and the people." This act met with no response from Spain. The eloquent Mr. Castellar, when a member of the Cortes, without the responsibilities of government, said:

"I am an advocate of abolition in Cuba, with a due regard to all intercsts. I am an advocate of colonial reforms, and of every possible liberty to Cuba and Porto Rico."

But when, in the turn of events, he attained to power, he was unable to do anything for Cuba, and retired with slavery untouched and with reforms still a dream.

It can not be a matter for wonder that persons in other lands sympathized with the great and liberal statesmen of Spain in their convictions that a large measure of reform was needed in Cuba, and held that one of the greatest of all was the abolition of slavery. And perhaps less surprise will be manifested that such sympathizers in other lands could not comprehend why such distinguished statesmen should insist upon subjugating the Cubans, who had taken up arms to resist oppression, before consenting to relieve them from the wrongs which they were admitted to be enduring.

It must be frankly confessed that there were many persons in the United States who shared the theoretical opinions of the Spanish statesmen, but who could not agree in the diametrically opposite policy which Spain pursued toward Cuba under their directions.

It was natural for the people of the United States to feel an interest in the prosperity of Cuba. This and the reasons for it were well understood at Madrid. Mr. Martos, in the presence of his colleagues, Mr. Becerra and Mr. Rivero, had officially spoken to General Sickles of "the common interests shared by the United States and Spain in Cuba." He said "that whatever retarded the prosperity of the island was injurious alike to both countries; that the welfare of Cuba was of more commercial importance to the United States than to the mother country."

This wise statesman might have added that the interest of the United States in Cuba was heightened by a desire that the deadly struggle on the island might end in the acquisition of self-government (whether under or free from Spanish rule was, of course, immaterial to an American) and in the abolition of slavery. Such was undoubtedly the fact. The undersigned feels convinced that these views were shared by the mass of the liberal statesmen of Spain, modified, probably, by the patriotic wish that the island should retain its political connection with Spain. But it could not be expected that foreigners would share in the full warmth of this wish of Spanish statesmen. The mass of the people of the United States certainly gave little heed to the matter beyond the natural preference that a disturbing element of European politics should be removed from the American system.

In the rapid progress of events, however, they, in common with the rest of the civilized world, were soon forced to give attention to Cuban affairs. The authorities in that island began to exercise rights of war in time of peace, and to trample out liberties which their superiors at Madrid desired to maintain and extend.

Admiral Polo expresses the opinion that the insurrection "did not find extensive sympathies in the Island of Cuba," and that "it was but a little while before its locality was limited to the eastern part of the island."

Such was not the tenor of the information received at this Department.

It is now more than five years since the uprising, and it has been announced, with apparent authority, that Spain has lost upward of 80,000 men and has expended upward of $100,000,000 in efforts to suppress it; yet the insurrection seems to-day as active and as powerful as it has ever been. And the suggestion that its locality was limited to the eastern part of the island leads one to inquire whether Villa Clara and the other of the Cinco Villas, and the railway between Nuevitas and Puerto Principe, are in that district.

Indeed, until the receipt of Admiral Polo's note, the undersigned had supposed that the extent of the disaffection in Cuba was urged as an extenuating motive for the remarkable series of measures which the undersigned will soon notice.

Soon after the outbreak of the insurrection this Government, of its own accord, without being thereto moved by the representative of Spain, caused inquiries to be made respecting "rumors of a projected expedition against Cuba" from New York, with a view, should circumstances require it, to the issue of such instructions as might be necessary for "the defeat of the schemes in question." The officer charged with the inquiry answered that he had made a thorough investigation, and added:

"It is true that a number of well-known filibusters have opened an office at 498 Broome street, in this city (New York), for the ostensible purpose of enlisting men for the invasion of the Island of Cuba, but really with a view of making money out of the resident Cubans in this city who sympathize with the cause. But I am happy to inform you that thus far they have been unsuccessful."

This fact, which exhibits the anxiety of this Government to perform its international duties, is apparently referred to by Admiral Polo with a purpose of showing a want of diligence on its part in that respect; since, in quoting the report of the officer, the passage which is underscored is omitted.

On the 24th of March, 1869, the captain-general of Cuba issued a decree, which is referred to by Admiral Polo, and from which the following is an extract:

"Vessels which may be captured in Spanish waters, or on the high seas near to the island, having on board men, arms, and munitions, or effects that can in any manner contribute, promote, or foment the insurrection in this province, whatsoever their derivation and destination, after examination of their papers and register, shall be de facto considered as enemies of the integrity of our territory, and treated as pirates, in accordance with the ordinances of the navy.

"All persons captured in such vessels, without regard to their number, will be immediately executed."

A copy of this decree was received at this Department on the 2d of April, 1869, and the undersigned, although but then just entered upon the duties of his office and greatly pressed with other public matters requiring immediate attention, put everything aside, by direction of the President, and on the next date wrote as follows to the minister of Spain at Washington:

"It is to be regretted that so high a functionary as the captain-general of Cuba should, as this paper seems to indicate, have overlooked the obligations of his Government pursuant to the law of nations, and especially its promises in the treaty between the United States and Spain of 1795.

"Under that law and treaty the United States expect for their citizens and vessels the privilege of carrying to the enemies of Spain, whether those enemies be claimed as Spanish subjects or citizens of other countries, subject only to the requirements of a legal blockade, all merchandise not contraband of war. Articles contraband of war when destined for the enemies of Spain are liable to seizure on the high seas; but the right of seizure is limited to such articles only, and no claim for its extension to other merchandise, or to persons not in the civil, military, or naval service of the enemies of Spain, will be acquiesced in by the United States.

"This Government certainly can not assent to the punishment by Spanish authorities of any citizen of the United States for the exercise of a privilege to which he may be entitled under public law and treaties.

"It is consequently hoped that his excellency the captain-general of Cuba will either recall the proclamation referred to or will give such instructions to the proper officers as will prevent its illegal application to citizens of the United States or their property. A contrary course might endanger those friendly and cordial relations between the two Governments which it is the hearty desire of the President should be maintained."

The order to indiscriminately slaughter "all persons captured in such vessels, without regard to their number," could not but shock the sensibilities of all humane persons. The undersigned felt, however, unwilling to object to the execution of the order, except when proposed to be enforced against citizens of the United States.

Almost simultaneously with the receipt of this startling news, Mr. Lopez Roberts, on April 5, 1869, made of the undersigned the request referred to by Admiral Polo, that the President should issue a proclamation to restrain military expeditions against Cuba, accompanying the request with allegations "that piratical expeditions are in preparation against the legitimate government of Spain in Cuba," and that "arms and ammunition are sent there in sailing vessels and steamers."

In regard to the second point thus stated by Admiral Polo's esteemed predecessor, the undersigned was constrained by due regard to universally recognized principles of international rights and duties to declare that in the absence of a recognized state of war it was no offense in the sailing vessels and steamers of the United States to carry arms and munitions of war for whomsoever it might concern. The undersigned has uniformly said that no government can by the law of nations be held responsible for shipments of arms, munitions, or materials of war made by private individuals at their own risk and peril. If a state of war should exist, if Spain should be entitled to the rights of a belligerent, parties concerned in the shipment of arms and military supplies for her enemy would incur the risk of confiscation by her of their goods; but their act would involve no ground of reclamation against their government in behalf of Spain, and consequently no right to invoke the aid of that government in preventing the perpetration of the act. Such it is believed is the established law of nations, and such the received rule even when the shipment of arms and munitions is made from the territory of the country whose citizens may be the parties engaged in the introduction of these supplies for the use of one of the belligerents.

In regard to the first point thus taken by Mr. Lopez Roberts, the undersigned could not but observe that the allegations respecting alleged piratical expeditions were not only wholly unsupported by proof, but were in themselves extremely improbable.

It is quite competent for a State to apply the term of "piracy" by its municipal acts to any offenses, however trivial, and to affix to them punishments it may deem appropriate. But in thus applying the title of a crime known to international law to offenses created by municipal law, it can not invoke upon the latter penalties which international law denounces against the crimes which the nations of the world recognize as "piracy."

Within its own territorial jurisdiction the application of terms and of epithets, or even the denunciation of punishments, except so far as they may offend humanity or the civilization of the age, might not be objected to; and the undersigned does not at present feel called upon to deny that the penalties thus denounced may be enforced (without right or question by other powers) upon those who may commit the acts to which these terms are applied within the territory of the state enacting the municipal law. But it would be inappropriate to apply either such definitions of crime or penalties to matters occurring without its territorial jurisdiction, or in discussions with other powers.

Piracy, as an offense against the unwritten but universally recognized law of nations, has been made the subject of many definitions. The definition by Wheaton, as explained by his commentator, Dana, would probably be recognized by the courts of all civilized powers.

Wheaton defines this crime "to be the offense of depredating on the seas without being authorized by any sovereign State, or with commission from different sovereigns at war with each other"; and Dana, in his note upon this definition, says "to constitute piracy jure gentium, it is necessary, first, that the offense be adequate in degree—for instance, robbery, destruction by fire, or other injury to persons or property—must be committed on the high seas and not within the territorial jurisdiction of any nation; and, second, that the offenders, at the time of the commission of the act, should be in fact free from lawful authority, or should have made themselves so by their deed, or, as Sir L. Jenkins says, 'out of the protection of all laws and privileges,' or, in the words of Duc de Broglie, 'quin'a ni feu ni lieu'; in short, they must be in the predicament of outlaws."

It did not appear to the undersigned from any evidence that was laid before him at that time by Mr. Lopez Roberts, or from any other source, that any parties were undertaking or contemplating military expeditions from the United States against Cuba, or were proposing to make any "piratical expeditions."

The undersigned therefore felt constrained to reply, on the 17th of the same April, in the following language:

"After a careful examination of Mr. Roberts's note, the undersigned fails to perceive the necessity or the propriety at this time of a proclamation by the President of the United States such as Mr. Roberts desires.

"The publication of an instrument of the character asked by Mr. Roberts would be the exercise of a power by the President which is resorted to only on extraordinary occasions and when peculiar circumstances indicate its necessity. Such a power is not to be invoked lightly, or when the laws are in unquestioned vigor and efficiency, are respected by all persons, and are enforced by the ordinary agencies.

"At present this Government is not aware of any invasion of the Island of Cuba, or of any other possessions of Spain threatened from the United States, nor is any such believed to be in the course of preparation. Mr. Roberts has, on several occasions, intimated to the undersigned the existence of individual or private attempts in different parts of the country to violate the neutrality laws of the United States. In every such instance, as Mr. Roberts very justly admits in his note, the proper officers of the Government have been called upon immediately to vindicate the supremacy of the law, and no single instance is known or is believed to have arisen in which their interference, thus invoked, has not been efficient to prevent the apprehended violation."

The justice of these views of the undersigned on the 17th of April, 1869, have been amply vindicated by subsequent events.

Instead of resorting to the exceptionable and uncertain measure of a proclamation, this Government availed itself of the agency of special and peremptory instructions to executive officers; and by this means succeeded in preventing the formation of military expeditions in every case referred to by Admiral Polo, except in the case of the Catharine Whiting, and in that case it entirely broke up the proposed expedition by the use of force.

The objectionable decree of the 24th of March was soon followed by a proclamation of Count Valmaseda still more abhorrent to the sense of the civilized world. By this proclamation, made at Bayamo on the 4th of April, 1869, which reached the Department of State on the 9th of May, the following announcement was made to Cubans who believed, with Mr. Castelar, General Prim, Mr. Becerra, Mr. Silvela, Mr. Martos, Mr. Rivera, and other Spanish statesmen, that Cuba was suffering under oppression and wrong which ought to be remedied:

"First. Every man, from the age of 15 years upward, found away from his habitation (finca), and does not prove a justified motive therefor, will be shot.

"Second. Every habitation unoccupied will be burned by the troops.

"Third. Every habitation from which does not float a white flag, as a signal that its occupants desire peace, will be reduced to ashes.

"Women that are not living at their own homes, or the house of their relatives, will collect in the town of Jiguani, or Bayamo, where maintenance will be provided. Those who do not present themselves will be conducted forcibly."

The courses of trade and of social intercourse had carried many citizens of the United States into Cuba. When, therefore, this proclamation reached the undersigned, the President thought it right toward Spain that, although scarcely crediting the genuineness of the document, the undersigned should send the following notice to Mr. Lopez Roberts:

"In the interest of Christian civilization and common humanity, I hope that this document is a forgery. If it be indeed genuine, the President instructs me, in the most forcible manner, to protest against such a mode of warfare, and to ask you to request the Spanish authorities in Cuba to take such steps that no person having the right to claim the protection of the Government of the United States shall be sacrificed or injured in the conduct of hostilities upon this basis."

Admiral Polo now attempts to defend these orders by saying that—

"Such rigorous measures are not confined exclusively to Spain; that the code of instruction for armies in the field published by the War Department of the United States during the civil war which terminated in 1865 authorized the destruction of every kind of property belonging to the enemy, and the penalty of death on every one who, in a section of territory occupied or subjected by one of the Federal armies, attempted to resist said army or the authorities which it had established."

The United States were in a state of war when the orders referred to were issued. Spain had not been slow in forcing upon them in the very incipiency of the rebellion her recognition of a state of war. She does not now recognize that she is herself at war, but appeals, as a precedent for her conduct, to rules prescribed for armies in the field. If she claims the rights, it is but logical than she accept the consequences of a state of war.

The instructions for the government of armies of the United States in the field, referred to by Admiral Polo, were promulgated on the 24th of April, 1863. The undersigned takes the liberty of quoting several passages from them, which sufficiently illustrate the humane and Christian spirit which pervades them—a spirit characterized by Dr. Bluntschli as "en corrélation avec les idées actuelles de l'humanité et la manière de faire la guerre chez les peuples civilisés."

"Martial law is simply military authority exercised in accordance with the laws and usages of war. Military oppression is not martial law; it is the abuse of the power which that law confers. As martial law is executed by military force, it is incumbent upon those who administer it to be strictly guided by the principles of justice, honor, and humanity, virtues adorning a soldier even more than other men, for the very reason that he possesses the power of his arms against the unarmed.

"Military necessity admits of all direct destruction of life or limb of armed enemies and of other persons whose destruction is incidentally unavoidable in the armed contests of the war.

"Nevertheless, as civilization has advanced during the last centuries, so has likewise steadily advanced, especially in war on land, the distinction between the private individual belonging to a hostile country and a hostile country itself with its men in arms. The principle has been more and more acknowledged that the unarmed citizen is to be spared in person, property, and honor as much as the exigencies of the war will admit.

"The United States acknowledge and protect, in hostile countries occupied by them, religion and morality; strictly private property; the persons of the inhabitants, especially those of women, and the sacredness of domestic relations. Offenses to the contrary shall be rigorously punished.

"Modern wars are not internecine wars, in which the killing of the enemy is the object. The destruction of the enemy in modern war, and indeed modern war itself, means to obtain that object of the belligerent which lies beyond the war. Unnecessary and revengeful destruction of life is unlawful."

The undersigned is confident that Admiral Polo will feel a sincere pleasure in thus knowing that his information respecting these instructions has been incorrect. Even had it been correct, the accomplished and generous minister from Spain and the undersigned would alike feel unwilling to contend that two wrongs could make a right.

Even in such case, however, it would be remembered that a worthy precedent might be found in the practice of the United States during a rebellion of the most mighty proportions, pending which not a prisoner was killed in cold blood; not a political crime, however grave, was visited with capital punishment. The soil of the United States remains to this day unstained by the first drop of blood taken from a political offender. Had this example been followed wherever a political insurrection has arisen, many might now be living whose blood cries aloud against the cruelty of some rulers. Christendom generally applauds the example of clemency and of generosity which the United States thus exhibited.

The same spirit of generous regard for life and forgiveness marks the policy of the United States in other respects, and makes their penal codes look to the prevention more than to the punishment of crime, and often withholds the enforcement of penalties when the danger against which they are denounced is supposed to have passed. It is with much regret that it is seen from the correspondence with the representatives of Spain for the past five years, and from the frequent complaints (in the note of Admiral Polo, now acknowledged) of the omission of the United States to enforce penalties and inflict punishment, that Spain does not sympathize with the policy of clemency and forgiveness, and seems to regard punishment as the test of the sincerity with which crime is denounced, and as the sole means of preventing at least political offenses. The examples of the condition of the two countries must be the criterion to determine the comparative merits of the antagonist systems.

Prior to this time (namely, on the 12th of February, 1869), a decree, with an explanatory statement, had been issued by the captain-general, taking from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts a large class of crimes, and forcing American citizens charged with such crimes to be tried before a court-martial, in violation of the provisions of the treaty of 1795. When it is remembered that this decree was issued about the time when it was officially announced to the undersigned that "the rebels have no communication with each other, they occupy no place as a center of operations, nor have they in the whole island a single city, a single town, a single village or hamlet, nor even a point on the coast where they might collect their forces and date their orders and proclamations," Admiral Polo will comprehend the magnitude of this assault upon the rights secured to citizens of the United States by the treaty of 1795.

The English translation of the text of this decree is as follows:

"In use of the extraordinary faculties with which the provisional Government of the nation has invested me, I decree the following:

"ARTICLE 1. Crimes of infidencia shall be tried by ordinary court-martial.

"ART. 2. Prosecutions already commenced shall follow the legal process prescribed by the laws for the tribunals of justice.

"ART. 3. All aggressions, by act or by word, against any of the delegates of the Government, shall be considered as a crime against the authority, and will subject its author to trial by court-martial.

"DOMINGO DULCE.

"HABANA, February 12, 1869."

"SUPERIOR POLITICAL GOVERNMENT OF THE EVER-FAITHFUL ISLAND OF CUBA—OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

"For the better understanding of the decree published yesterday (the 12th of February), it is made known that under the word infidencia, which is made use of in article 1, are understood the following crimes: Treason, or lesa nacion, rebellion, insurrection, conspiracy, sedition, harboring of rebels and criminals, intelligence with the enemy, meetings of journeymen or laborers and leagues, expressions, cries, or voices subversive or seditious, propagation of alarming news, manifestations, allegations, and all that, with a political end, tends to disturb public tranquillity and order, or that in any mode attacks the national integrity.

"It is also made known that robbery in uninhabited districts, whatever may be the number of the robbers, and in populated districts, if the number of the robbers be more than three, shall be tried by court-martial, as also the bearers of prohibited arms. And by order of his excellency the superior political governor, the same is published in the Gazette, for the general knowledge."

On the 15th of April, 1869, the same policy which had prompted the authorities in Cuba to deprive citizens of the United States of personal rights guaranteed to them by treaty, led to a decree of embargoes of property, which, so far as it applied to the properties of citizens of the United States, was also in direct violation of the rights secured by the treaty of 1795. The publication of this decree was followed by the publication of another decree (made on the 1st day of April), interfering with the free alienation of property on the island. And two days later another decree was published, creating an administrative council, to take charge of the embargoed estates. Under the operation of these several decrees a vast amount of the property of citizens of the United States is understood to have (illegally, and in violation of law and right) come into the possession of subjects of Spain, without having yet been accounted for or refunded.

When these decrees came to the knowledge of the undersigned he addressed the following communication to the predecessor of Admiral Polo, under date of April 30, 1869:

"I am instructed by the President to inform you that this Department has received from the United States consulate in Cuba a decree dated the 1st day of April current, and promulgated by the captain-general of the island on the 15th of this month, which virtually forbids the alienation of property in the island, except with the revision and assent of certain officials named in the decree, and which declares null and void all sales made without such revision and assent.

"In view of the intimate commercial relations between Cuba and the United States, and of the great amount of American property constantly invested there in commercial ventures as well as in a more permanent form, the President views with regret such sweeping interference with the rights of individuals to alienate or dispose of their property, and he hopes that steps may be speedily taken to modify this decree so that it shall not be applicable to the property of citizens of the United States, and thus prevent disputes and complaints that can not fail to arise if its execution is attempted as to such property."

It is with regret that the undersigned finds himself unable to accept the declaration in Admiral Polo's note, made in connection with the seizure of private estates and the transfers of private property, that it was not without waiting for manifestations of disloyal sentiments and purposes that the decrees were made respecting the sales and embargoes. The undersigned is of opinion that a recurrence to the correspondence which he has had the honor to conduct with the Spanish legation in this capital, and through the legation of this Government at Madrid, will recall many instances of interference with the private rights and property of citizens of the United States who have had no connection with the insurrectionary movements in Cuba, and many where Spain has practically admitted the precipitancy of her officers in their haste to lay hands on private property, and has in many instances promised, and in a very few instances has granted, the restoration of property thus unlawfully seized. And in this connection the undersigned must be permitted to express the regret with which he observes the introduction into a diplomatic note of the cases of "eminent banking and commercial houses of New York and other places," which, by agreement between the two Governments, have been referred for adjudication to an international commission, and the prejudgment and denunciation of these eminent houses as having "lent their names to a pretext."

On the 7th of July, 1869, the captain-general of Cuba decreed:

"ARTICLE 1. There shall continue closed to import and export trade, as well for vessels in foreign commerce as also those in the coasting trade, all the ports situated from Cayo Bahia de Cadiz to Punta Mayso, on the north, and from Punta Mayso to Cienfuegos, on the south, with the exception of those of Sagua la Grande, Caibarien, Nuevitas, Gibara, Baracoa, Guantanamo, Santiago de Cuba, Manzanillo, Santa Cruz, Zaza, Casilda, or Trinidad, and Cienfuegos, in which there are established custom-houses or collection offices.

"Those who attempt to enter the closed ports or to hold communication with the coast shall be pursued, and, on being apprehended, prosecuted as infractors of the laws.

"ART. 2. In accordance with the same, there shall also be prosecuted vessels carrying powder, arms, or military supplies.

"ART. 3. The transportation of individuals for the services of the insurrection is much more grave than that of contraband, and will be considered as an act decidedly hostile, being proceeded against in such case as an enemy, the vessel and its crew.

"ART. 4. If the individuals to which the preceding article refers come armed, they will afford proof in fact of their intentions, and will be tried as pirates, the same as the crew of the vessel.

"ART. 5. There shall also be held to be pirates, in conformity with law, vessels which may be seized bearing a flag not recognized, whether the same be armed or not as vessels of war.

"ART. 6. On the high seas contiguous to those of this is land the cruisers shall confine themselves to exercise over such vessels as may be denounced, or those that by their proceedings excite suspicion, the rights stipulated in the treaties signed by Spain with the United States in 1795, with Great Britain in 1835, and with other nations subsequently, and if in the exercise of these rights vessels should be found recognized as enemies of the integrity of the territory, they shall be brought into port for the corresponding legal investigation and trial."

This extraordinary decree caused a profound sensation in the United States, and the undersigned, as soon as it was received, addressed a note of inquiry to the predecessor of Admiral Polo, dated July 16, 1869, the material parts of which he takes the liberty of transcribing, as Admiral Polo seems to be under a misapprehension respecting it:

"The decree of the captain-general, De Rodas, assumes powers and rights over the trade and commerce of other peoples inconsistent with a state of peace, and which the United States can be expected to allow their vessels to be subjected to only when Spain avows herself to be in a state of war, or shall be manifestly exercising the rights conceded only to belligerents in the time of war.

"The first article of the decree proposes to close certain ports, embracing a large extent of the Island of Cuba, against the peaceful commerce of foreign countries. Without contesting the right of a government in time of peace to exclude from its ports the trade and commerce of a friendly people, the undersigned assumes that the exercise of this power is to be understood purely as a municipal act, to be executed and enforced wholly within the recognized exclusive jurisdiction of Spain, and only as to ports which are in the possession of the Spanish authorities. In case the success of the insurrectionary party should put any of the ports declared to be closed in their possession, the United States, as a maritime nation, will regard an effective blockade to be necessary to the exclusion of their commerce.

"The second article of the decree is vague in the absence of the limits within which it proposes to prohibit the carrying of powder, arms, or military supplies.

"The transportation on the high seas, in time of peace, of articles commonly known as contraband of war is a legitimate traffic and commerce which can not be interfered with or denounced unless by a power at war with a third party in the admitted exercise of the recognized rights of a belligerent. The freedom of the ocean can nowhere and under no circumstances be yielded by the United States. The high seas contiguous to those of the Island of Cuba are a direct pathway of a large part of the purely domestic trade of the United States. Their vessels trading between their ports in the Gulf of Mexico and those of the Atlantic coast pass necessarily through these waters. The greater part of the trade between the ports of the United States on the eastern side of the continent and those on the Pacific Slope of necessity pass in sight of the Island of Cuba.

The United States can not, then, be indifferent or silent under a decree which, by the vagueness of its terms, may be construed to allow their vessels on the high seas, whatever may be their cargo, to be embarrassed or interfered with. If Spain be at war with Cuba, the United States will submit to those rights which public law concedes to belligerents. But while Spain disclaims a state of belligerency, or until the United States may find it necessary to recognize her as a belligerent, the Government of the United States can not fail to look with solicitude upon a decree which, if enforced against any vessel of the United States on the high seas, can not but be regarded as a violation of their rights that may lead to serious complications.

"The sixth article of the decree refers to certain rights claimed to be stipulated by the treaty entered into between Spain and the United States in 1795.

"The undersigned desires to call the attention of Mr. Roberts and of the Government of Spain to the fact that the treaty of 1795 confers upon neither of the contracting parties any rights on the high seas over the vessels of the other in time of peace.

"The articles of the treaty of 1795 from I to XI, inclusive, define and regulate the reciprocal relations and obligations of the parties without reference to either party being engaged in war. The portion of the treaty from the twelfth article to the eighteenth contemplates exclusively their relations as neutrals, the duties and powers of each toward the other when one or the other may be engaged in war with a third party. The eighteenth section recognizes and regulates the right of visit or of approaching time of war, for the inspection of the passport and the identification of the nationality of a vessel of commerce by the vessels of war, or by any privateer of the nation which shall be at war. It confers no right; it limits and prescribes the manner of exercising a belligerent right when such may exist.

"The clear object and intent of this provision of the treaty is the avoidance of discussion and annoyance and the prevention of abuse or indiscretion in the exercise of a belligerent right. Its location in the treaty, the recognition of the right of a privateer (who has no existence except in war) as having the same power and right in the particular referred to with a national vessel of war, and the whole scope and aim of the eighteenth article of the treaty, established beyond possibility of question that it refers only to the rights which one of the parties may have by reason of being in a state of war.

"The treaty authorizes nothing but the inspection of the passport of the vessel of trade met with, while the sixth article of the decree of General De Rodas contemplates a search as to the character of the vessel beyond the limitation fixed by the treaty.

If Spain be engaged in the war, it is essential to the rights, as well as to the definition of the duties, of the people of the United States that they be publicly and authoritatively advised thereof and admonished as to their obligations and liabilities in their new relation with a friendly power. And such admonition admits of no avoidable delay in view of the vast commerce that will thus be subjected to restriction, limitation, and possible detention.

"The undersigned therefore respectfully desires to be informed by Mr. Roberts, at the earliest practicable moment, whether, in the issuance of this decree, it is to be understood by the United States that Spain recognizes that she is in a state of war and claims the rights of a belligerent.

"The undersigned has the honor further to say to Mr. Roberts that the Government of the United States can not fail to regard the continuance of the decree referred to, or any exercise on the high seas near the Island of Cuba, by any vessel of war or privateer of Spain, of the right to visit or board any vessel of the United States, under color of the provisions of the treaty of 1795, as involving the logical conclusion of a recognition by Spain of a state of war with Cuba.

"Before concluding, the undersigned begs to call Mr. Roberts's attention to the very grave complication which might ensue from any interference with a vessel of the United States engaged in a lawful voyage, passing near the Island of Cuba. The United States maintain the right of their flag to cover and protect their ships on the high seas.

"In conclusion, the undersigned expresses the hope that Mr. Roberts will speedily be at liberty to announce the formal abrogation of a decree which causes so much serious apprehension to the Government of the United States, and against which this Government feels bound most earnestly to remonstrate."

In deference, as it was understood, to these views expressed by the undersigned on behalf of this Government, the decree of the captain-general was modified as follows on the 18th of July, 1869:

"In view of the determinations adopted by the Government of the United States of America, as reported by his excellency the minister of Spain in Washington, under date of the 15th instant, and which were published in the Official Gazette of the following day, and in order at the same time to relieve legitimate commerce from all unnecessary interference, in use of the faculties which are conferred upon me by the supreme Government of the nation, I have determined to modify my decree of the 7th instant, leaving the same reduced to the first five and essential articles."

In consequence of these severe measures against the persons and properties of Cubans who shared the opinions of the liberal statesmen of Spain respecting the injuries which had been inflicted upon their native country, many fled from the island to the United States. And the undersigned can not disguise from himself that these Spanish subjects, driven from their native country, have attempted to abuse the hospitality of the United States—that they have tried to make use of their safety here in order to regain what they had lost in Cuba, and that they have been restrained only by the perpetual vigilance and zeal of the officers of the United States. Alas, if the ears of the ministers of Amadeo and of the republic could have opened to the complaints of their Cuban friends, what criminations might have been spared us!

Admiral Polo, in his review of the vessels which, he says, have taken or attempted to take men and arms from the United States to Cuba, speaks particularly of the Mary Lowell, the Salvador, the Grapeshot, the Catherine Whiting, the Hornet, the Lillian, the Upton, and the Virginius. He also makes reference to the Florida, the Edgar Stuart, the Anna, the Fanny, and the Webster.

The imperfect and in many respects erroneous manner in which Admiral Polo has referred to the vessels which he has named, and his entire neglect to notice the many proofs of the constant vigilance and of the anxious desire of the United States to perform all their international duties to Spain, make it necessary for the undersigned to give a brief review of what was actually done by the United States in respect of these matters.

It may give precision to the review to first define succinctly what the United States understand to have been their duties toward Spain as a neighbor and as a friend.

The repeated references by Admiral Polo to the doctrines laid down in the course of the discussion at Geneva induce the undersigned to say at the outset not only that the particular references and citations are from the argument of counsel, which in forensic discussions among all nations is permitted to take a wider latitude of expression than is usual in official or judicial statements, which are supposed to express settled convictions; but also that these discussions at Geneva were predicated upon the admission of a recognized state of war; and that if Spain is prepared to concede that there is a state of war in Cuba, with belligerent rights in each party to the conflict, and shall accede to the three rules set forth in the treaty of Washington, then the United States may be prepared to concede to Spain what they claimed of Great Britain at Geneva, namely, that their duties as a neutral toward Spain as a belligerent will not thereafter be fully performed by simply acting upon information which may be furnished by Spanish agents, without themselves originating any action; that, in the language of their own countercase at Geneva, "they would not thereby be relieved from the duty of an independent, diligent, and vigilant watchfulness in order to prevent evil-disposed persons from violating their neutrality."

But the undersigned is also constrained to insist that the idea of neutrality in international discussions is inseparable from the idea of a belligerency to which the neutral is not a party; and to repeat that he is unable to comprehend how propositions for the regulation of the conduct of a neutral in a state of war can be pertinently applied to the conduct of one sovereign state toward another friendly sovereign state in time of peace. Thus, when Peru, between whom and Spain a state of war existed, requested the United States to detain a large number of vessels of war, which certain contractors were constructing within the territories of the United States for Spain, it became the duty of the United States to detain the vessels; but, when the assent to their release was given by Peru, it was not regarded by Spain or by the United States as any violation of international duty to permit the vessels to be constructed and delivered and dispatched, notwithstanding the existence of an armed insurrection against Spain in Cuba. Nor can it be claimed that the United States have been guilty of any neglect or want of duty in allowing Spain on more than one occasion to make use of their public dockyards for the preparation of vessels of war.

So far as relates to the past, Spain has never been willing to concede that a state of war exists in Cuba. The rights and duties of the United States toward Spain, therefore, from the commencement of the insurrection, are to be measured by the rights and duties of one nation toward another in case an insurrection exists which does not rise to the dignity of recognized war.

What one power in such case may not knowingly permit to be done toward another power, without violating its international duties, is defined with sufficient accuracy in the statute of 1818, known as the neutrality law of the United States.

It may not consent to the enlistment within its territorial jurisdiction of naval and military forces intended for the service of the insurrection.

It may not knowingly permit the fitting out and arming or the increasing or augmenting the force of any ship or vessel within its territorial jurisdiction, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of the insurrection.

It may not knowingly permit the setting on foot of military expeditions or enterprises to be carried on from its territory against the power with which the insurrection is contending.

The learned and accomplished minister of Spain, toward the close of his able discussion of this subject, cites the authority of Lord Palmerston to establish that a sovereign power "should not permit its territory to be made use of as a place of shelter, from which communication should be carried on for the purpose of disturbing the tranquillity of the neighboring states."

These duties of good neighborhood were recognized by this Government more than a quarter of a century before Lord Palmerston made the speech referred to by Admiral Polo; and the neutrality law of 1818 was then enacted for the purpose of defining the acts of disturbance which should be prevented, and of providing a punishment for such persons as might be found to be guilty of them.

But a friendly government violates no duty of good neighborhood in allowing the free sale of arms and munitions of war to all persons, to insurgents as well as to the regularly constituted authorities; and such arms and munitions, by whichever party purchased, may be carried in its vessels on the high seas, without liability to question by any other party. In like manner its vessels may freely carry unarmed passengers, even though known to be insurgents, without thereby rendering the government which permits it liable to a charge of violating its international duties. But if such passengers, on the contrary, should be armed and proceed to the scene of the insurrection as an organized body, which might be capable of levying war, they constitute a hostile expedition which may not be knowingly permitted, without a violation of international obligation.

During the late Franco-German war each party was free to purchase arms and munitions of war in this country, and did so, and Frenchmen whose hearts were with their struggling countrymen at home, or Germans who wished to join the invading armies of Germany, were free to leave the shores of the United States for that purpose, so long as they left as private citizens, unarmed, and without engagement made in this country to enter the service of a belligerent. They did thus leave, in vessels of several different nationalities. Neither this Government nor any other neutral government which may have allowed its merchant-marine to transport the arms and munitions of war or the passengers to Europe was guilty of a violation of its duties as a neutral.

Even recognized war, therefore, can not oblige neutral nations to contract the right of their citizens to engage in such commerce, which is lawful in time of peace, or to abridge the liberties of persons enjoying the protection of their flag, to such a point as to render illegal either of these proceedings, although in time of actual war the transportation on the high seas of articles known as contraband of war is to be made subject to the right of capture. But in time of peace no vessel of war has the right to capture, or even to interfere with, molest, or detain upon the high seas a regularly documented vessel of another power.

This doctrine is not new in the intercourse of nations.

On the 10th day of April, 1858, Mr. Cass, then Secretary of State of the United States, wrote to Lord Napier, the envoy of Great Britain:

"Undoubtedly a right vested in the armed cruisers of one state to stop and examine the merchant vessels of another might be so exercised as to contribute toward the suppression of crimes upon the ocean. But this power of armed intervention might also be exerted at the expense of the maritime rights of the world. Such an exercise of force, so liable to be abused, will never meet the concurrence of the United States, whose history abounds with admonitions warning them against its injuries and dangers. They have no disposition to surrender the police of the ocean to any other power, and they will never falter in their determination to enforce their own laws in their own vessels, and by their own power, and to oppose the pretensions of every other nation to board them by force in times of peace. * * *

"To permit a foreign officer to board the vessel of another power, to assume command in her, to call for and examine her papers, to pass judgment upon her character, to decide the broad inquiry whether she is navigated according to law, and to send her in at pleasure for trial, can not be submitted to by any independent nation without injury and dishonor. The United States deny the right of the cruisers of any other power whatever, for any purpose whatever, to enter their vessels by force in time of peace. No such right is recognized by the law of nations. As Lord Stowell truly said, 'I can find no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of states upon the high seas, except that which the right of war gives to belligerents against neutrals. No nation can exercise a right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the ocean, except upon the belligerent claim.'"

On the 8th of June, 1858, Mr. Dallas, the minister of the United States in London, had an interview with Lord Malmesbury at the foreign office on the subject of the detention and visitation of documented vessels of the United States by British cruisers on the high seas. Lord Malmesbury furnished Mr. Dallas with a written minute of the conversation which then took place:

"Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to justify or excuse such acts on the part of their officers as have been complained of by the United States Government, if they are truly reported. Her Majesty's Government recognize the principles of international law as laid down by General Cass in his note of the 10th of April, and that nothing of the treaty of 1842 supersedes that law. Her Majesty's Government, however, think it most indispensable in the interest of civilization and the police of the seas that there should be a power of verifying the nationality of a vessel suspected, on good grounds, of carrying false colors.

"Her Majesty's Government would wish to learn from the United States Government their views in detail on this point, in the hope that some mutual arrangement, by way of proceedings, to be executed by our respective officers, may be found effective without being offensive. The French have lately proposed and laid down this one, viz, that a boat may be sent alongside of a suspected ship, and may ask for papers, but not, unless invited, board the vessel. Such is our arrangement with France. Lord Malmesbury has given Mr. Dallas a copy of our instructions to our officers. Pending our negotiation on the above point, orders will be given to discontinue search of United States vessels."

On the 16th of the same June the Senate of the United States unanimously adopted a resolution—

"That American vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, bearing the American flag, remain under the jurisdiction of the country to which they belong, and therefore any visitation, molestation, or detention of such vessel, by force, or by the exhibition of force, on the part of a foreign power is in derogation of the sovereignty of the United States."

It is also understood that the enlightened Government of Spain has, in the recent case of the Deerhound, recognized the justice and force of the principle thus established in practice by France, Great Britain, and the United States.

That vessel was dispatched from Plymouth, England, with a cargo of arms, ammunition, and military clothing, destined for the Carlist insurgents in the north of Spain. She was captured by a Spanish cruiser on the high seas off the coast of Spain and taken into port. Lord Granville demanded her release, saying:

"Her Majesty's Government can not acquiesce in the competency of the Spanish Government to refer to a prize-court the case of the Deerhound; neither can Her Majesty's Government admit that legal jurisdiction can be assumed by the Spanish Government over a British ship which, in time of peace, has been seized upon the high seas by a public ship of Spain."

The Government of Spain surrendered the Deerhound, and Mr. Carvajal informed the representative of Great Britain—

"That if her release was agreed upon, it was only because of her having been captured in neutral waters."

The learned minister of Spain seeks to maintain, by a citation from an eminent English publicist, that this right of transportation may be subordinated by the necessities of self-preservation in the government which is contending with an insurrection. It is not necessary for the undersigned to assent to or to deny the justice of this proposition in the extreme case and with the great limitations stated by Sir R. Phillimore. But the acute intelligence of Admiral Polo can not fail to perceive that the supposed act of self-preservation is none the less an act of war because alleged to be done in self-defense; and the undersigned can not permit himself to assume that Spain maintains that such an invasion of the territory of another power as Phillimore refers to would confer upon the courts or military authorities of the invading nation the right to try and condemn, for alleged crimes, persons who might be captured on neutral soil. In the case of the Virginius, had Spain, after her capture by the Tornado, restored her and her passengers and crew to the United States, to be dealt with according to their laws, the appropriateness of the citation from the British publicist would appear to be more manifest.

Admiral Polo also cites an extract from a speech by Lord Lyndhurst in the House of Lords, in March, 1853, in which the learned jurist endeavored to convince that distinguished body that by the laws of England—

"If a number of British subjects were to combine and to conspire together to excite revolt among the inhabitants of a friendly state, and those persons, in pursuance of that conspiracy, were to issue manifestoes and proclamations for the purpose of carrying that object into effect; above all, if they were to subscribe money for the purpose of purchasing arms to give effect to that intended enterprise, such persons would be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to suffer punishment, and that foreigners residing in England are punishable by the common law precisely in the same manner, and to the same extent, and under the same conditions as natural-born subjects."

In view of events which have taken place since that speech was delivered, the undersigned might, were it necessary, feel disposed to doubt whether Lord Lyndhurst correctly interpreted English law, as understood by its administrators. But it is needless to dwell upon that consideration, because, as the undersigned has already pointed out, the United States have not left the character of that class of acts to be determined by unwritten common law, but have provided by statute which of them, if committed, should be regarded as criminal, and punished accordingly.

In the same connection Admiral Polo refers to a decision of a British court respecting the law of libel. It is not understood what precise bearing upon the present discussion this reference is intended to have. If it be intended to suggest the propriety or the expediency of limiting the freedom of public discussion in the United States upon the Cuban insurrection, the reply must be courteous but peremptory and distinct, that the suggestion can not be entertained. This Government tolerates the greatest freedom and latitude of discussion of public subjects. It even permits, without objection, a journal in New York, which is currently reported to receive pecuniary support from official Spanish sources, to indulge in language vulgarly abusive and libelous toward the President of the United States and the undersigned, and calculated to excite disrespect toward the Government and to destroy confidence in the institutions of the country.

The amiable and just minister of Spain will not ask a government which permits such freedom in a foreigner to restrain its own citizens within narrower limits. And it will probably occur to him that a comparison of the tone, temper, and modes of expression of the journals of this country (where no censorship prevails) toward Spain, with those of the journals of Madrid and Habana (where it is understood that the government assumes the responsibility of controlling what shall appear) toward the United States, will show that the American press is quite as temperate, wise, moderate, and just as is the Spanish.

The undersigned will now proceed to show that the United States have faithfully performed all their international duties toward Spain during the existing insurrection.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 18, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 17, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, as I understood the reading, the Journal states that the Senate amendment to House bill No. 5564 was concurred in. According to my understanding of the motion of my colleague [Mr. DINSMORE] and the action of the House upon that motion, the amendment was nonconcurred in.

The SPEAKER. The statement should be that the amendment was nonconcurred in. The correction will be made.

The Journal as corrected was approved.

The SPEAKER. In connection with the same bill the Chair omitted by some oversight to put the question on agreeing to the request of the Senate for a conference. The Chair now desires to state that the House yesterday nonconcurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. On that bill the Senate requested a conference, and the motion to agree to that request was made, but not put. Without objection, the request of the Senate for a conference will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1816) for the relief of Michael Ryan; and

A bill (H. R. 5229) for the relief of George H. Lott.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7250) to amend "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LACEY in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7250) to amend "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman, I suppose, will make a statement concerning the bill before proceeding to its consideration by sections?

Mr. PAYNE. The bill will be open to general debate, of course.

Mr. McMILLIN. The reason I make the suggestion is that I desired that my colleague, Judge TURNER, who has had this matter under investigation, being on the subcommittee which brought in the bill, should be present, and if the purpose was to proceed otherwise than by general debate it was my intention to have asked for the reading of the bill.

I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to amend certain portions of what is known as the customs administration act, an act that became law on the 10th day of June, 1890. The customs administration act is the culmination of a number of years' investigation upon the subject of a speedy, an honest, and a full collection of the revenues of the Government under the tariff. That bill inaugurated in some respects an entirely new system of general laws upon the subject. Under the former laws the questions of value and classification were determined in the first instance by the single appraiser and what was termed a merchant appraiser. The law of 1890 provided for a Board of General Appraisers, who sat in review of the decisions of the local appraisers, both upon the law and the facts; and the law of 1890 made this decision of the Board of General Appraisers conclusive on the fact so far as the value of the goods was concerned. But it provided for a review by the circuit court of both the law and the facts in reference to the classification of the merchandise. Of course the classification of the merchandise was often, if not generally, the more important fact to be determined. We have had experience under this law of 1890 now for about six years, and it has been found generally to have saved a good deal of revenue to the Government as well as prevented a good deal of fraud in the collections of the revenue. At the same time, years of experience have developed various weak spots in the law with reference to which the consensus of opinion of those who have been engaged in administering it is that there may be found some remedy.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible to enact any law that will make all men honest. No law can be framed to collect the revenues of the Government where the duties are ad valorem that is not open to evasion by reason of fraud, fraudulent invoices and fraudulent valuations, even though the invoices and the valuations are made under the oath of the importer, and the experience under this law up to the present time has been that various methods of evasion have been resorted to to escape the payment of duties. The most favored one is that of importing goods on consignment. For instance, a large manufacturing concern will have a local agent in New York, generally some clerk, to whom the goods are consigned, and as there is no sale there is no necessity for any declaration of sale, or for any false affidavit as to sale, and the value depends, largely—entirely, so far as the declaration of the importer is concerned—on the honesty and truthfulness of the importer of the goods.

In such case it has been found difficult for the appraiser to get at the true value of the importations. The law requires that the values on which the duties are to be assessed shall be the market value on the day of the export at the port of exportation, in usual wholesale quantities. It very often happens, also, that an importer will buy from the foreign manufacturer the entire output of his factory for a season. Bills have been imported amounting to £100,000 in the course of the year, where the importer on this side takes the entire output of the mill or factory, and of course he purchases at a lower price in this manner than if he purchased in the usual wholesale quantities; and yet the invoice may truthfully specify the price paid when the goods were bought, while at the same time, as a matter of fact, the rates will perhaps be 5 per cent below what the goods could be bought for by another importer from the same place, purchasing in the same market, in usual wholesale quantities.

Now, the object of the law of 1890 was that you provided thereby for a review of the facts by the general appraisers after the importer had made his declaration. Appraisers in the first instance were to be appointed who would find out the exact market price, in usual wholesale quantities, on the day of importation, at the place from which the goods were imported. This involved, on their part, not only an examination of witnesses at the port where the goods were imported, but also involved the collection of facts in various ways; by correspondence with the consuls residing abroad, and otherwise; by ascertaining from trade journals the value of the goods; and sometimes they were driven to entirely different methods in order to find out the true value; because it sometimes happens that a factory will run for a whole year on a particular style of goods peculiar to that factory—no other factory making the same kind of goods—and hence there was no other market price and no market price for that particular class of goods outside of that particular factory. If, therefore, the importer bought the entire output of the factory at 5 per cent below the wholesale prices, which he would be charged if the importations were made in the usual wholesale quantities, of course it was impossible, or next to impossible, to get a true valuation of the goods.

There was no market price for that particular kind of goods. The appraisers resorted, under that law, to different methods of calculating or getting at the market value. In the first place, they endeavored to ascertain the market price, in the usual wholesale quantities, of similar goods, or goods approaching this particular importation in character. Then they were also authorized, under section 8 of the law, to resort to the cost of production abroad, adding to that whatever cost there might be for rent of mills, for wear and tear of mills, interest on investment, insurance, cost of agents, and all that sort of thing, and in that way to use the matter of cost as an element in determining the value of the goods.

We have added an amendment to this bill which also authorizes them to ascertain the market value of that same kind of goods in this country, at the place where the goods are imported, and by figuring back, deducting the cost of the importation, of freight, etc., to ascertain as nearly as possible the market price or the cost price of those goods at the port from which they were exported. Not that any of these methods is to be used by the appraisers as the exclusive method by which they shall ascertain the market value of those goods, but they may use any or all of them for that purpose.

Another design of the law of 1890, and perhaps one of the most important features in that law, was that the President should appoint these nine general appraisers, who should be at the outset or who should become experts in their vocation, having a technical knowledge themselves as to the different classes of goods, able themselves to judge, able from inspection of the goods, from analysis, from examination, to calculate the cost of those goods, and by comparison with similar goods to be able to establish the market price, and the market price in usual wholesale quantities at the port of exportation on the day on which they were exported. That was one of the principal designs of the law. They were to be divided into boards of three, to whom these questions were to be referred.

Now, of course, the House will readily see that if the law provided that if these boards of appraisers should have these general powers, and could use their own knowledge as well as the evidence that was taken down before them in fixing prices or in reporting facts as to classifications, and afterwards the court should review those facts, the court not having the technical knowledge of the appraisers, the court not having the information which the appraisers might receive from consuls residing abroad, and having, as the court would have in many instances, other evidence before it in regard to the facts, might come, and courts have come in some instances, to an entirely different conclusion from that to which the appraisers came, whereas if the court had had all the knowledge before it upon which the appraisers acted it would have found the same facts in regard to those goods, both in regard to the classification and the value.

The law of 1890 did not seek to make this board of appraisers a court in which counsel should appear and contests should be made and suits should be tried; but rather their duties were to be similar to those of boards of assessors for taxation in different States, and they were to act similarly to boards of assessors. They might hear evidence, but they could take their own general knowledge, their own technical knowledge, into account.

In the several States the action of boards of assessors may be reviewed upon certiorari, but not upon the facts; they may be reviewed upon the law in the case. There must be some summary method in order to reach the true value as a subject for taxation, either in local taxation in the several States or in collecting revenue duties. It often happens that the attorneys for the importer would produce before the appraiser only a portion of their evidence, leaving out the principal part of it, and after the appraisers had made their determination in one way the attorneys would go before the circuit court and produce all their evidence, evidence that was not produced before the board of appraisers, and in that way they would make confusion and reverse rulings, and make costs to the Treasury and of course cost to their clients.

We have sought to remedy some of these evils in this bill, in the fourteenth and fifteenth sections of it. We provide that the findings of fact by the general appraisers shall be final and conclusive upon all parties, officers of the Government, importers, and every one interested. In the first place, the facts are established by the local appraiser, and the assessment of duty is made. Then there can be an appeal from the local appraiser to the Board of General Appraisers. The latter can hear evidence. They can ascertain the facts. They can use their own technical knowledge which they have gained by years of experience. They can take into consideration the information which they receive from consuls who investigate abroad, and after they have received all this information, witnesses on the part of the importer, as well as witnesses on the part of the Government giving in their testimony—we say that their determination as to the fact, both in regard to value and in regard to classification, shall be final and conclusive.

But we do not take away the right of appeal upon questions of law. These can be reviewed by the circuit court of appeals, and to the circuit courts of appeals we give jurisdiction to hear those cases and to hear those appeals. We provide that the board of assessors shall report their findings of fact; that they shall not report their evidence, but simply the findings of fact and their decision thereon, and that the circuit court of appeals may review the questions of law. They may send a case back to the appraisers for findings of fact upon some other question which they deem important to the solution of the question of law; and when they have received the final findings of fact from the board of appraisers those findings of facts are conclusive. We also provide for an appeal from the circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court. Either the Supreme Court may certiorari the case or the circuit courts of appeals may by their own motion allow an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Do you provide that this board of appraisers shall have the power to administer oaths, and that a prosecution for perjury can be maintained against anyone who appears before them?

Mr. PAYNE. I think that is in the section that we did not amend—a section in the original bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The reason I ask is, that I was informed that it was not. I do not claim to be posted, and I ask you the question, because as I understand the proposition you propose to make this a final decision upon the facts, the same as a referee would make.

Mr. PAYNE. I would say in our amendment we have made no provision of that kind, and I may be in error in saying that it is in the original act. I think it is there, however.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I only ask, then, if the gentleman does not think it ought to be, so that there would be some penalty on those who swear falsely?

Mr. PAYNE. I think so. I think every man who makes his affidavit and gives his testimony in any case ought to be held under the pains of perjury if it is false, and if that is not in here I think it ought to be.

I would say that in adopting this amendment the committee have been guided by the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury, by the board of appraisers, and also by a report of a commission which was formed in 1893, of which ex-Secretary Fairchild was the president, and, with ex-Collector Magone, Mr. Dunn of Arkansas, a former member of Congress, and another gentleman, composed the commission. They very strenuously recommend the amendment of section 15 which we have adopted, and also section 7.

Another evil that has grown up under the present law is the multiplication of protests. For instance, a case arises as to a particular class of goods. Perhaps the hat-trimmings case is a good illustration. Every importer of that class of goods, even where the duty does not amount to more than $5, makes his protest. It costs him nothing—simply the drawing up of a protest. It is probably done by a lawyer who takes the case on shares, and the drawing of the protest does not cost anything, and then the protests will lie there for years until some other man has taken a case to the Supreme Court and got a decision. If that decision is against the Government, immediately all these protestors make a claim for the remission of the duty. The chances are all in their favor. If they win they get the duty back; if they lose they lose nothing. In the meantime they have paid the duty in the first instance, and they have sold their goods to the customers and to the consumers without a farthing of reduction on account of the protest fee. The profits in these cases, I am told, are usually divided between the importer and the attorney who is lucky enough to have had a case on conditional fees, in what proportion I am unable to state exactly.

These protests figure up in the thousands. They are not only a source of labor and annoyance to the Government, but they are encouraged under the law and under the present administration of it. Various methods have been suggested to get rid of this evil. The best suggestion that the committee has had made to them is this, recommended by all those who are familiar with the administration of this law, some who are Government officials and some who are not—the requirement of a fee of $2 to be paid for every protest, to be paid by the importer in the first instance, and to be refunded to him only in case he shall eventually succeed in the protest. And we have incorporated that amendment in the bill.

Another important change that we have made in the law or propose to the law is that in reference to additional duty in case the value of the goods as fixed by the appraisers exceeds the value of the goods as declared in the invoice by the importer. Under the law, if a man imports $2,000 worth of goods on which the duties are 50 per cent, we will say, and on which the duty would be $1,000, and the value of the goods is raised by the appraisers 10 per cent, say to $2,200, he would simply have to pay $1,100 in duty; or, in other words, he would have to pay the duty at the same rate upon the additional value. He would not have to pay a farthing more of duty than he would had he made an honest statement of the value in his invoice and declaration and fixed it at $2,200 in the first instance.

Now, if the valuation by the appraisers exceeds the valuation in the invoice as fixed by the importer more than 10 per cent, then he has not only to pay the duty upon the goods at the valuation of the appraisers, but also additional duties, which have been construed by the Secretary to be penal duties. These additional duties are at the rate of 2 per cent over the total value of the invoice as fixed by the appraisers for every 1 per cent of increase in the appraisers' value over the value fixed by the importer. Taking the same cost of importation of $2,000 at the importer's value, increased to $2,250, or more than 10 per cent by the appraisers, he would have to pay $1,100 in duty, and also, exceeding 20 per cent, 2 per cent for every 1 per cent of increase, 20 per cent upon the full $2,200, or $440 penal duties in addition thereto.

The result of that is that whenever a man wants to defraud the revenue and undervalues his goods for that purpose he is very particular not to undervalue them more than 10 per cent. He works up just as close to that line as he thinks safe, because he knows that if he gets his goods through at his own valuation he saves 10 per cent of their value, and that, at the worst, if his valuation is increased by the appraisers only 10 per cent, he will still pay only the duty that he would have to pay if he had invoiced the goods himself at their true valuation. The committee think that system is wrong. They think it offers a premium upon fraud and holds out a temptation to undervaluation, and they propose that the increased duty because of undervaluation shall begin at the very point where the valuation of the appraisers exceeds the valuation of the importer, and shall be 1 per cent for every 1 per cent of increase.

Thus, if a man imports goods at a certain valuation of his own and the appraisers add even 1 per cent to that valuation, the duty will be increased not only to the proper rate that he would have to pay according to the valuation of the appraisers, but also 1 per cent upon the total appraisers' valuation of all the goods for every 1 per cent of increase, so that if the valuation is increased by the appraisers 5 per cent, the importer pays not only the ordinary duties but an additional duty of 5 per cent upon the whole invoice as valued by the appraisers. Take an example: A man imports $2,000 worth of goods at 50 per cent duty, yielding a thousand dollars of revenue; his valuation is increased by the appraisers 5 per cent, making $2,100; that would make the duty, at 50 per cent, $1,050; but in addition to that, on the plan the committee recommend, there will be a duty of 5 per cent upon the $2,100, which makes an additional duty of $105 as a consequence of the undervaluation by the importer.

This plan removes the temptation to undervalue goods down to 10 per cent below what they are really worth, or even to 1 per cent below what they are really worth. The objection has been made to this that in some cases and on some classes of goods it is impossible even for experts to agree upon values so closely that the difference between them will not be 3 or 4 or 5 per cent, and as to some classes of goods this may be so. For instance, novelties, things that are for a passing fashion and that have never been in the market before, experts might very well differ in their valuations of such goods 5 per cent or even 10 per cent, but those goods are almost an infinitesimal percentage of the total amount of importations. Then, in addition to that—and this is a consideration that greatly moved the committee in making their recommendations—the importer of the goods knows better than any other man living what their market value is. He knows it at the time he imports them.

It does not make any difference whether they are consigned goods or purchased goods or the exclusive output of a factory, the importer knows better than any other man their market value at the date of importation. Therefore, let him state honestly and truly in his declaration the value of the goods in usual wholesale quantities on the day of importation, and he need have no cause for fear. Why? Because he can bring his witnesses before the appraisers and prove the actual market value of the goods and prove it more definitely and with greater certainty than any counterproof can be made, and if he is honest in his declaration and honest in his proof the committee believe that no such importer will ever suffer because we place this increase of duty at the line of the increase of valuation by the appraisers over the valuation of the importer.

But on the other hand, even if some innocent man does suffer, we believe it is due to the Government, we believe it is due to the great mass of honest importers, that there should be some punishment for undervaluation, beginning at the very point of undervaluation. Hence we have fixed it at 1 per cent increase of duty for every 1 per cent increase of valuation by the appraiser's over the importer's valuation. The importer can not only be heard before the local appraiser, but he can also be heard before the General Appraisers. He has full opportunity for a hearing, and we have no doubt that the law, as it has been administered by the present Board of Appraisers, and as it is proposed by the recommendations of the committee, will result in a more faithful collection of the revenue from those who seek to evade it, and at the same time will be beneficial to those who come in honestly and are willing to pay their dues to the Government under the tariff law.

There are other amendments which the committee have proposed which are of minor importance, and yet some of which are of considerable importance in the administration of the law. Some of them are intended to compel the importer to specify in detail all the charges in his invoice, all the facts upon which he makes up his valuation. Another source of fraud is in the fact that the importer under the present law states the price at which he bought the goods in one currency while the exchange upon that currency was in his favor, and then pays the duty upon another basis of currency. The committee limit his statement, therefore, not to the currency in which he bought the goods, but propose that—

If the merchandise was actually purchased, the declaration shall also contain a statement of the currency and the amount which was actually paid for the merchandise by the purchaser.

To the same section we have added a provision which, if we can secure the legislation which this bill asks for from other Governments, will subject a foreign exporter to the pains and penalties of perjury if he makes a false affidavit in a foreign country. Under the present law these declarations are taken before our consuls; and those officers being, of course, not authorized by the local laws to administer oaths, there is no punishment for false swearing before them in connection with invoices. They might just as well be signed without the formality of an oath so far as punishment is concerned. Great Britain already has a law upon her statute books authorizing her local officers to administer oaths in these cases in her own ports where these declarations are made by the exporter, and providing punishment for false swearing in such cases. We have added to section 3 an amendment which after a certain lapse of time will, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, prevent the importation of any merchandise unless the exporter in the foreign country has first made the necessary declaration or affidavit before a local officer of that country empowered to administer such oaths, the oath being administered under a local law which will make false swearing punishable. We believe that, upon suitable notice, laws similar to those of Great Britain on this subject will be enacted by all these foreign countries, because exportations from those countries to this, except at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, will be prevented after a certain time unless such laws are enacted. In this way we expect to get some hold on the other side where there is false swearing in connection with the exportation of merchandise to this country.

Mr. WALSH. Why is the matter left in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. PAYNE. Because it must be a matter of negotiation. None of these other countries now have such laws except Great Britain. We must give the lawmaking power of the different countries time to act. We can not fix a rigid rule and say that such action must be taken before a certain date. So we leave the matter in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, he being in full accord with this provision of the law. We believe that in this way the change can be brought about without friction, and sooner and better than it could if we should adopt a positive enactment of law to apply after a certain date.

Mr. WALSH. But you give the Secretary of the Treasury, under this section, general discretion as to the taking of the oath.

Mr. PAYNE. If a particular country does not pass a law authorizing the oath to be administered before its local magistrates, we must of course give the Secretary of the Treasury this general discretion as to the requirement of the oath. If there is no officer in the foreign country authorized to administer the oath, of course we should not undertake to say that goods shall not be exported from that country to this unless we give the Government of the country time to act. The lawmaking power must have proper opportunity to get together and act on the question.

Mr. WALSH. Is not an affidavit taken falsely before a notary public in any of these other countries punishable by the pains and penalties of perjury?

Mr. PAYNE. Unless the officer is authorized by law to take affidavits in such cases, the oath would not be worth the paper on which it is written, so far as punishment for perjury is concerned.

Mr. HEPBURN. Could not a remedy be provided by enacting that in case the oath or statement accompanying the invoice or indorsed upon it should be found by our appraisers to be incorrect, our consul should be prohibited in future from taking the oath or declaration of the person who had made that false statement? Could we not in that way guard against the possibility of that person continuing to engage in the export trade to this country?

Mr. PAYNE. Possibly such a provision might have been put in this bill as an additional remedy. It would be rather drastic, because the person making the exportation to this country may make a mistake. Upon questions of value there is always room for differences of judgment or opinion. We thought that the provision in the bill was at least a step in the right direction. If it should not work successfully, perhaps some suggestion like that of the gentleman from Iowa might help the efficiency of the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does not this whole matter illustrate the absolute necessity of abolishing the ad valorem system of collecting revenue from customs?

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman from California and myself would have no difference of opinion on that question.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then, why not just present that kind of a bill and give us good, sound Republican specific duty taxation in our customs laws?

Mr. PAYNE. Simply because we are trying now to put before this House a bill which shall become a law. If we were simply "playing to the galleries," we would introduce the other kind of a bill for purposes outside of this Chamber and outside of the question of making the bill a law. I hope to be able to join with the gentleman from California in the Fifty-fifth Congress in enacting the sort of a law which he suggests. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You hope, then, to have such a bill signed when it has been passed.

Mr. PAYNE. In section 4, we simply provide for a particular statement in invoices by requiring the importer to state the name of the consular district in which and the name of the place from which the merchandise was procured, and the place of production or manufacture. This is simply to close one door of fraud which now exists. Persons go back into the interior—pretend to send goods from an interior town where there is no market. We propose to require that there shall be a statement of the consular district and the place of production or manufacture. And at the end of the section we also provide for the penalty of the bond—we provide the terms and condition of the bond—which seems to have been left out of the original act, the penalty to be double the estimated duty.

In section 5, we make a proviso, as follows:

Provided further, That no person holding a license to transact business as custom-house broker, under the provisions of section 23 of the act of August 28, 1894, shall be designated to administer oaths and take acknowledgments under the provisions of this section, and the power to administer such oaths and take such acknowledgments is hereby revoked as to all persons so licensed to transact business as custom-house brokers at the date of the passage of this act.

Under the present law the oaths are usually administered by custom-house brokers. Of course this is a practice that ought not to be allowed, because the brokers are really the agents of the importers and take the oaths of their own clients. We have had some suggestions with reference to the oaths of brokers since the bill was reported, and shall offer a further amendment to cut off brokers, their employees and clerks, from taking the oaths.

Other amendments to the section make more specific the language of the declaration.

The amendments to section 7 are those to which I have already alluded in regard to making the additional duty 1 per cent for every 1 per cent of increased value. Now, we have made this an additional duty, not a penalty, and we have prescribed in the law that neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor anyone else shall have the power to remit this additional duty. We believe that when a penalty is put into the law or a remedy is inserted the only way to induce a strict observance of the law is to make the penalty or the remedy certain of enforcement. If some one has power to remit it, it will be usually remitted, and the importer will undervalue, with the idea that in the end he will get the additional duty remitted. So we have provided that this additional duty shall not be remitted under any circumstances. But we have also put a limit upon the amount of the additional duty, which is not contained in the present law, and say that it shall never exceed more than 50 per cent. We also provide that when the value is increased beyond 50 per cent the goods shall be forfeited to the Government.

Mr. ARNOLD of Rhode Island. Is there any penalty for the importer making false specification of the goods?

Mr. PAYNE. There is the usual penalty for fraudulent specifications, and if the fraudulent importation exceeds in value 50 per cent, the goods are forfeited to the Government. The limit under the old law, on the amount of increase in the appraised value over the imported value, was 100 per cent where the goods became forfeited to the Government. We have placed it, as I have already said, in this bill at 50 per cent instead. There is this to be said in reference to the matter, that when there is a case of forfeiture it is a case in the courts and for the jury to determine upon the facts presented. So that nobody is to be deprived of his property without due process of law and after a trial of the case.

In section 10, we have provided, at the end of the section, as follows:

And the local appraisers, or persons acting as such, shall state for the information of the collector the character and component material of the merchandise.

This is simply an additional specification provided.

At the end of section 11 we provide an additional means by which the appraisers can get at the exact value of the goods, in the following words:

Provided also, That it shall be lawful for appraising officers in determining the dutiable value of such merchandise to take into consideration the wholesale price at which such or similar merchandise is sold or offered for sale in the United States, after deducting estimated duties thereon, the cost of transportation, insurance, and other actual and necessary expenses from the place of shipment to the United States and a reasonable commission, if any has been paid, not exceeding 6 per cent.

This is simply an additional method by which they can ascertain the value of the merchandise, and we also provide at the end of section 13—

That the general appraiser who acted originally in a case shall not be one of a board to decide the same case.

Of course the value of that amendment is apparent without any explanation on my part.

In section 14, we have provided that in case of a notice of dissatisfaction by the importer he shall give notice in writing—

Setting forth therein distinctly and specifically and in respect to each entry or payment the reasons for his objections thereto—

That is the present law so far, but we add—with a sample of the articles or merchandise, where the same are of a kind that a sample can be conveniently attached to and accompany said notice, and where the character or quality of the articles or merchandise is in question, attached to or accompanying said notice, certified or authenticated by the appraiser or appraising officer as being a part of the particular importation as to which the protest is made.

The simple effect of that provision being to carry a sample of the goods, with the papers in the case, for the examination of the Board of Appraisers, and that is the object of the amendment. That section also includes the provision, to which I have already alluded, to require the payment of the sum of $2, to be known as a protest fee, etc.

Mr. WALSH. Is there any penalty for a false sample?

Mr. PAYNE. Not any more than there would be for a false affidavit.

Mr. DALZELL. That is covered by the general law?

Mr. PAYNE. It is covered by the general law in relation to frauds upon the Treasury—the general section.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Should not provision be made in this bill for the appointment of counsel to appear before the General Appraisers?

Mr. PAYNE. We think not, for this reason: This is a question of assessment really, and counsel would be as much out of place and the hearing of witnesses would be as much out of place as would counsel and witnesses and testimony and examinations and the turning into a court of the local boards of assessors in States.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is not this the Board of United States General Appraisers?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. And does the gentleman from New York say that the employment of counsel before such a Board would be out of place?

Mr. PAYNE. I do.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is the gentleman not aware that there is an existing provision of law by which counsel are now employed, and that that provision of law is found in the general deficiency bill of June 30, 1895?

Mr. HOPKINS. This does not interfere with that law.

Mr. PAYNE. We do not repeal that provision.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No, that is very true, but here is a new statute covering the general subject-matter, and there ought to be a provision in this statute for the permanent employment of such counsel.

Mr. DALZELL. But this statute purports to be an amendment to the other. That is all it is.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that under the law as it now stands counsel are employed under a provision inserted in the general deficiency bill of 1895. Now, as in this bill you are treating of the whole subject-matter, why should you not cover the employment of counsel in this bill?

Mr. DALZELL. Because this bill does not undertake to do anything but amend certain particular sections of the existing law. As the gentleman will see, it is entitled "A bill to amend an act," etc., and certain specific sections of that act are taken up and amended. The law that the gentleman refers to still remains the law, of course.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Well, the difficulty with the existing law is this, that the appropriation of $3,500 is inadequate.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is a matter to be determined in the appropriation bill when the payment of counsel is provided for. It would not be a part of this bill anyway.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It might come in as a new provision. In any act amendatory of another act you can insert absolutely new provisions of law.

Mr. PAYNE. But this bill is not to provide new offices and to fix their salaries at all. It is simply to amend certain provisions of existing law, leaving the rest of the law as it is and leaving the provision for counsel as it is. Now, if that salary is inadequate it can be remedied in the appropriation bill. I will say further to my colleague that this bill will be read through by sections. It answers the gentleman's question to say that there is no amendment to this bill that provides for counsel.

Mr. DALZELL. Or that interferes with existing provisions in that regard.

Mr. PAYNE. Or that interferes with the provision of law to which the gentleman refers.

Now, section 15 I have alluded to before. It is an entirely new section, and provides for the finding of facts by the Board of General Appraisers, and for the review of the case upon questions of law only by the circuit court of appeals, instead of the United States circuit court, as at present.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The old administrative act provides also for a review of questions of fact. Why is that omitted from the present bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I made quite an elaborate statement in reference to that, and it would require me some time to repeat it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I was not present and did not hear it. Probably I should have been delighted if I had been here to hear it.

Mr. PAYNE. We shall reach that in the reading of the bill by sections later.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I suppose the gentleman will explain the meaning of the provision in line 23, on page 24, that the evidence taken by the Board of General Appraisers shall not be considered by the court.

Mr. PAYNE. This is all the same scheme we have defined in this bill to make the findings of fact by the Board of General Appraisers final and conclusive, and have done that by appropriate and proper language.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I have no doubt the language is proper, but I doubt the propriety of the language.

Mr. PAYNE. I believe that the decisions of this Board upon questions of facts should be final, for the reason that they make them not only on the evidence produced before them, but from their general knowledge as experts and from the information they receive from the consuls at foreign ports, and other evidence that they can not reproduce before a court, and hence I say it is not on the findings only, and not on the evidence introduced before the court. Our design is, and I believe it is in the line of a better administration of the law and the protection of Government revenue, and for the protection of honest importers, to make their conclusions of fact final and only allow the courts to review the question of law. That is the reason.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is it not true, as a matter of fact, that the courts upon appeal have found as many errors in the findings of fact by the Board as in the law as administered by them?

Mr. PAYNE. On the other hand, the evidence before the committee was that very seldom had they been reversed upon questions of fact, and it is only in questions where the court had acted upon different evidence from that upon which the Board of Appraisers acted. That is, in some cases they were reversed on questions of fact when the Board had acted on the theory of this present law, that they should take into account their own knowledge and experience with similar goods and their own information; and the court had reversed them because the court had before it different testimony as to the facts from that which the appraisers had. In other cases the importers had kept back a part of the evidence, so as to take an appeal to the court, and had appeared before the court with new witnesses upon new questions of fact, and, of course, different results followed.

Now, I believe that these general appraisers, one of whom is often appointed by the court to report upon additional facts, are amply qualified and competent, and should be, under this law, to find upon the questions of fact; and when they have found, I believe that, for the purposes of taxation, their findings on questions of fact should be as conclusive and final as are the findings of the local board of assessors in the gentleman's own State upon questions of the value of property.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the whole question would go up to the court if there is an appeal from the appraisers. That is all that is asked here—that all questions relating to the importation should go up on the appeal; and the gentleman will undoubtedly admit that if the facts are found hostile, the importer would have but very little chance on his appeal.

Mr. PAYNE. Sometimes yes, and sometimes no.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the facts are found against a man there is not much chance for him in any court.

Mr. PAYNE. If you have had your day in court there ought not to be.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It is important that they should have a correct finding of facts as well as that they should have a correct finding of the law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But my friend from New York, if the gentleman and the gentleman from New Hampshire will permit, ignores the fact that upon the question of facts this man has never had a day in court. He has had a day before the appraisers only.

Mr. PAYNE. In the first place, he has had a day before the local appraisers, and then he appeals from the local appraisers, and he has a day before the General Appraisers, where the facts are all under review, and they have an opportunity to find them one way or the other.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And then when he gets a hearing there is no opportunity to hear him on the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. He has had an opportunity in two courts, if you choose to call them so, upon questions of fact—two opportunities to be heard as to findings. Now you still want to continue that to the circuit court of appeals, and afterwards, I suppose, to the Supreme Court.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will permit me, if the case has arisen where there is no board of general appraisers, there would be an appeal from the individual appraiser to the general Board, and when he goes before the other board, his case having been heard before an officer of the Government whose natural predisposition is to enforce the law roughly against the importer, he never has a judicial review in regard to the facts, a determination of the rate of duty that he is to pay; and I submit that is not right.

Mr. PAYNE. On the contrary, both the natural inclination and the practice of the appraisers are not to injure the importer, and their findings of fact lean toward the importer.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There is a difference of opinion on that subject.

Mr. WALSH. This bill does not give the importer the right to be represented by counsel?

Mr. PAYNE. There is nothing said about it in the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

On motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, by unanimous consent, the time of Mr. PAYNE was extended.

Mr. PAYNE. The remainder of section 15 gives the circuit court of appeals jurisdiction to hear and determine these appeals from the Board of General Appraisers, and also provides for a review by the Supreme Court in certain cases. It is not necessary for me to go into particulars on that branch of the subject.

The only amendment in section 19 is made by striking out the words "for importation to the United States or consigned to the United States for sale" and inserting "in usual wholesale quantities"; so that it will read:

SEC. 19. That whenever imported merchandise is subject to an ad valorem rate of duty, or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof, the duty shall be assessed upon the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise, as bought and sold in usual wholesale quantities at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets of the country from whence imported and in the condition in which such merchandise is there bought and sold in usual wholesale quantities.

This is simply an amendment in the direction of the original bill making the provision more definite and specific.

Section 2 of this bill provides for the establishment and equipment of sampling works or the leasing of buildings—

For the sampling and assaying of imported silver ores and other ores containing lead, at the ports of Elpaso, Tex.; Northport, Wash., and Bonners Ferry, Idaho, and at such other ports as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the interests of the revenue demand; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in case of importation of said ores at ports at which no facilities as above are provided, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to send a portion thereof to any port having said facilities, at which port said portion may be sampled and assayed. The collector at the port of importation shall thereupon liquidate the entry upon said assay.

That involves an appropriation not to exceed $45,000, and is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as necessary for the proper enforcement of the present tariff laws in respect to lead ores and silver-bearing lead ores. It seems to be absolutely required for the protection of the revenue that something of this kind should be done, and the Secretary recommends that the points named in the bill are the points at which it is necessary that these sampling and assay works should be established at once. The committee will offer an amendment providing that one-fifth of each cargo of ores shall be sent to these works, because it seems to be necessary that as much as that shall be sent. But the reason for this requirement will be explained when the amendment is offered.

Section 3 simply preserves the rights accrued under the present law at the time these amendments shall go into effect—all rights of appeal and other rights that have accrued up to that time.

Section 4 provides that the act shall take effect on and after July 1, 1896. It is necessary that this act shall not take effect until some time after its passage, because there must be time to give notice to consuls and other officers of the United States residing abroad of the change in the law, and July 1, 1896, being the beginning of the ensuing fiscal year, was chosen as the most appropriate time for the act to go into operation.

That, Mr. Chairman, is all that I desire to say at this time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, in view of the suggestion made by the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and in order to make the statement as to this bill complete, I want to call attention to the fact that section 16 of the existing administrative law contains this provision:

SEC. 16. That the General Appraisers, or any of them, are hereby authorized to administer oaths, and said general appraisers, the boards of general appraisers, the local appraisers or the collectors, as the case may be, may cite to appear before them and examine upon oath any owner, importer, agent, consignee, or other person touching any matter or thing which they, or either of them, may deem material respecting any imported merchandise, in ascertaining the dutiable value or classification thereof; and they, or either of them, may require the production of any letters, accounts, or invoices relating to said merchandise, and may require such testimony to be reduced to writing, and when so taken it shall be filed in the office of the collector, and preserved for use or reference until the final decision of the collector or said board of appraisers shall be made respecting the valuation or classification of said merchandise, as the case may be.

The next section provides:

SEC. 17. That if any person so cited to appear shall neglect or refuse to attend, or shall decline to answer, or shall refuse to answer in writing any interrogatories, and subscribe his name to his deposition, or to produce such papers, when so required by a general appraiser, or a board of general appraisers, or a local appraiser or a collector, he shall be liable to a penalty of $100; and if such person be the owner, importer, or consignee, the appraisement which the general appraiser, or Board of General Appraisers, or local appraiser, or collector, where there is no appraiser, may make of the merchandise, shall be final and conclusive; and any person who shall willfully and corruptly swear falsely on an examination before any general appraiser, or Board of General Appraisers, or local appraiser, or collector, shall be deemed guilty of perjury; and if he is the owner, importer, or consignee, the merchandise shall be forfeited.

So that there was no necessity for making any additional provision in the amendment now suggested by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. That does not give the right to the importer to have witnesses subpœnaed?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. I was answering the suggestion made by the gentleman from California, that there is no provision in the amendment suggested by the committee clothing the Board of General Appraisers with power to administer oaths, or making a false oath taken before them perjury.

Mr. WALSH. My suggestion was addressed to the remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that the importer had his day in court.

Mr. DALZELL. That is an entirely different matter, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has already replied to his colleague on that point.

Mr. WALSH. I did not understand him to say that the importer had power to compel the Board to issue subpœnas for witnesses in his behalf, or anything of that kind.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know how that is. I understand, however, that the practice is to call such witnesses.

Mr. WALSH. The Board may do it, but there is nothing to compel them to do it, so that the importer can not really be said to have his day in court.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia addressed the Chair.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know how much time is required for general debate. Perhaps we might fix a limit if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] will make some suggestion.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I do not think, so far as I have any information, that there is any disposition to prolong the debate on this side. If the gentleman from New York will allow the debate to proceed, I think he will find he can reach a vote at a very early time. I only wish to say that this bill contains some good things, and some other things that in my individual opinion are not so good. These reforms are in the direction of a more rigid enforcement of the customs laws. So far as I am concerned, I do not care to protest against the rigorous administration of the tariff laws. My sympathies would be in the direction of a facilitation of imports in another way; I mean by lightening the rates of duty. So long as these rates remain, I am willing that they should be rigidly, impartially, and expeditiously enforced.

I think some of the increases of rigor provided for in this bill might have been omitted. My effort in the committee was to mitigate them to some extent. But I am bound to admit that one of the changes in what is called the penal duty in the seventh section of the original act, and the removal from the Secretary of the power to remit the penalty—these provisions and some others are, I think, rather severe. But as they seem to have the approval of those who are now charged with the administration of the law, and were recommended by that gentleman whose name is given to the commission mentioned by the gentleman from New York, and whose practical judgment in this field I most thoroughly admire and appreciate, and are supported by the majority of the committee, I stand, as it were, between the upper and the nether millstone, and I submit.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with what has just been said by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], concerning some of the provisions of this bill. I concur with him that there are many good features in the bill, but I would say with even stronger language than he has used that there are other features which I can not commend at all. I will very briefly call attention to them, and when we get to the consideration of the measure under the five-minute rule they can be more elaborately argued and amendments offered.

Sir, the first provision of the bill to which I wish to call attention is the one which was discussed by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], by which they propose to take away in this bill, in toto, from any court recognized as a court in the United States, the right to pass upon the facts involved in a controversy arising out of an importation. Let this not be forgotten—that you are taking away by this bill the only right that the American citizen who makes an importation has to a rehearing by a court of the United States of the matter in controversy. It is true that he has at first a hearing before the appraiser, or rather it would be a more correct statement to say that the appraiser fixes the value. He may then be heard by the Board of General Appraisers. But heretofore the right has existed on the part of the importer to appeal the controversy to the courts of the United States on questions both of law and fact if he was dissatisfied with the decision of the Board of General Appraisers. This right of appeal on the facts is taken away by this bill. Now, it is true that the gentlemen supporting this measure see fit to call this Board of General Appraisers a court. It discharges some of the functions that are ordinarily discharged by a court, but it can with no more propriety be called a court than the original appraiser might be so called.

Not only that, but as has been stated by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] the recommendations of the gentleman—Mr. Fairchild—whose suggestions in other regards were taken in framing this bill, have not so far as I have been able to ascertain from the reading of the bill been followed in these matters. The commission with which that gentleman was connected, as well as the Treasury Department, urged strenuously that the right should exist in the Board of General Appraisers to send the whole record back for complete record if they thought the prior action not sufficient as to matters either of law or of fact. Even that right is taken away by the bill. If the Board of General Appraisers—this so-called court, which is called upon to adjudicate questions of law and of fact—should be unable to make up a decision on the record as submitted to them, the right does not exist, as was recommended by Mr. Fairchild, to send the record back. That is my understanding from my reading of the bill. If I am in error I want to be corrected. I had to glance hastily at the newly printed bill and therefore may not have gotten an accurate idea of this point.

Mr. PAYNE. We have followed exactly the recommendations of Mr. Fairchild, which is, that if in rendering a decision on a question of law the court should find it necessary to have additional information upon matters of fact, it may send the record back for an additional finding upon the matter of fact. That is all that Mr. Fairchild recommended upon this question; and we have followed his recommendation exactly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I stated, Mr. Chairman, I might be in error as to that point, because the bill as now printed does not contain the italics which were in the former print, and in my hasty investigation I supposed I was correct in the statement I have just made.

Mr. PAYNE. And further, if the gentleman will permit me, we have followed, I will say, exactly Secretary Fairchild's recommendation in regard to the construction of section 15, with the exception that we have put in the clause, in distinct terms, giving the circuit court of appeals jurisdiction in these cases. We thought that there might be a doubt as to the matter, in the way the provision was originally drawn, but that is the only change from the recommendation of Secretary Fairchild.

Mr. McMILLIN. As to the next point—and I am glad that the other feature is retained—let me say the revision of these cases, as made up by the record and passed on by the court, can not subsequently be reviewed by these officers. Hence the right of appeal, on the facts presented, is practically taken away. The record as made up is to stand, and the Board is not required to return to the court of appeals any of the evidence taken by them in the case. Their adjudication of facts on the record must stand, and even the right to amend the record does not increase or warrant the power of the appraisers by which they can overrule the original ruling of the appraiser on the question of facts presented.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another feature to which I wish to call the attention of the committee very briefly. I was convinced when this matter was pending in committee that it was a subject that I should antagonize there, and I feel it of sufficient importance to justify me in antagonizing it here on the floor of the House. It is this: Under the proposition as it first came to the committee, in reference to the appraising board, where there was a difference between the invoice value of the importation and the real value, the bill undertook to fix the penalties that were called penal duties, or additional duties, to those carried by the law. As I conceive, it was very wisely provided there that the penal duties should not attach unless there was a difference of at least 10 per cent between the invoice value of the importation and the findings of value of the board of appraisers. It was at first thought by the committee that this difference might be fixed at 5 per cent, and I confess that I might have been content with 5 per cent; but when the committee undertakes to fix the penalty on the invoice because there is a difference between the invoice and the value as fixed by the appraisers which is less than 5 per cent, I think they go into an impracticable administration of the law and undertake to fix penalties for that which is impossible.

We had extensive hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means. We had hearings on the part of every class of feeling with reference to tariff for protection and penalties through the whole range of the subject, and we had members of the board of appraisers themselves before us. And when all men who came before the committee to testify agreed that the difference of opinion between even experts as to the value of imports would vary from 5 to 10 per cent on an invoice, it suggested to me the propriety of so framing this portion of the bill that its enforcement might be practicable and its operations reasonable. The expert said that it would be wholly impracticable for two men to come to the same conclusion as to the value of the goods to such an extent that the difference between them would amount to no more than 1 or 2 or even 5 per cent on the valuation. And yet the committee proposes to attach a penalty when there is a difference of 1, 2, 3, or 4 per cent, when one of the greatest experts introduced before the committee said that no two men could reach even approximately the same conclusion as to the value of the goods. He favored these changes in the main, except the one I am indicating, and I do not know how he stood on that. But in regard to this question of valuations he said that any man who would be a sufficiently competent expert on silks, say, to fix the value of an importation unerringly within 10 per cent on the foreign amount could command $20,000 a year in any of the great wholesale houses of the country, for he would be a phenomenon.

Mr. STEELE. Let me ask the gentleman if this was not recommended by Secretary Fairchild?

Mr. McMILLIN. I am not positive as to his exact recommendation in this respect.

Mr. STEELE. And also the present assistant treasurer?

Mr. McMILLIN. As I was saying, I do not recollect Secretary Fairchild's recommendation. The recommendation of Mr. Hamlin on this subject is contained in the bill as drawn.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Fairchild also recommended it.

Mr. McMILLIN. That may be.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to go into the discussion of the question further at this time. I only desired to say that it seems to me wholly impracticable to undertake to fix a penalty for every increase of duty where a man is honestly trying to perform the duties of a good citizen and is conducting his business in an honest and legitimate manner. It is manifest that where there is such difference of opinion as to the values of commodities existing even among experts it would be very easy to trump up charges against the honest merchant and subject him to gross and serious hardships. Believing such to be the case, I thought it necessary to call the attention of the House to the fact, and shall not detain the committee longer until we proceed to consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the passage of this act in its entirety, because I believe it will better provide for the collection of the revenues. Regardless of our opinions on the tariff question, we all ought to agree that the customs laws should be enforced, and that if additional legislation is necessary to carry them into effect it should be enacted.

I am especially interested in section 2 of the pending bill, because it provides better facilities for the collection of the duties on lead-ore importations, and it is for the purpose of urging the necessity for that legislation that I ask the indulgence of the House for a short time.

The lead-mining industry in the United States has been confronted with many difficulties. The demand for lead in this country has always been greater than the supply, and we have yearly had large importations of lead. The State which I have the honor to represent in this House is very largely interested in the lead-mining industry, producing annually about one-fourth of the total lead product of the whole United States. The Director of the Geological Survey, who is charged with the collection of information on this subject, estimates that in the calendar year 1894—this being the last calendar year as to which we have information on the subject—we produced in the United States 162,686 short tons of lead. Of this amount Colorado produced 50,000 tons; Idaho, 33,000 tons; Utah, 23,000 tons; Montana, 9,000 tons, and Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, California, Missouri, Wisconsin, and Tennessee the balance. The imports of lead-silver ore for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, amounted to 37,289,610 pounds, on which duties were paid amounting to $559,344.23, while there was imported for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, 44,783,181 pounds, with duties paid at $339,274, thus showing an increase of 20 per cent in the quantity imported, with a decrease of 40 per cent in revenue.

The total imports of lead for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, were 174,546,752 pounds, of which 124,878,009 pounds came from Mexico, and 12,094,603 pounds from British Columbia. Of the balance, in round numbers, 10,000,000 pounds came from the United Kingdom, and 26,000,000 pounds from Belgium. The lead from the United Kingdom, Belgium, and other nations came in the shape of pigs and bars, having been originally mined largely in Spain and Italy. Statistics therefore show that for the last fiscal year three-fourths of our competition in the matter of lead production has been from Mexico, and more than half of the other fourth has been from the nations of the south of Europe.

In my State there is invested in this industry, at a low estimate, not less than $25,000,000, and more than 25,000 people, directly or indirectly, are sustained from this industry. Of the entire cost of production 85 per cent is paid to labor, the value of the lead in the ground not being over one-fourth of a cent per pound. Lead miners are skilled laborers and have always received wages as such in this industry in Idaho and elsewhere throughout the United States. The average of wages paid for a series of years has been from $2.50 to $4 per day. The great lead-producing nations with which our country comes in competition are Spain. Italy, Greece, Mexico, and Australia. Our importations in the past have come largely from Mexico and Spain. More than three times as much lead-silver ore was entered at the port of Elpaso, Tex., from Mexico during the year 1894 than at all the other ports of entry in the United States. The base bullion importations pass largely through the port of New York, and most of this comes from Mexico. It will be seen, therefore, that Mexico and Spain are the two principal nations which compete with our producers in the lead markets of the United States. For this reason those engaged in lead mining here have labored under disadvantages such as have not been felt by any other industry of like proportions in the United States.

It is a well-known fact that the wages paid the laborer in Spain and Mexico are lower than is received for like service in any other country in the world outside of Asia and Africa. The miner in Mexico, if he may be dignified by that name, receives from 40 to 60 cents per day, while the miner in Idaho and the entire Rocky Mountain region receives at the present time from $2.50 to $3.50 per day. In addition to this, transportation charges are not equalized. The smelting plants of the United States, where lead ore is sold, are located at Kansas City, Omaha, Denver, Aurora, Ill., and in New Jersey. It costs $14 per ton to ship lead ore from the Cœur d'Alene mining district, in Idaho, to Denver, and $16 per ton to Omaha, while, owing to water competition part of the way, and other causes, lead ores are shipped from Mexican ports to Aurora, Ill., and to New Jersey for less than $8 per ton; in other words, the transportation charges are about one-half, while the labor cost does not exceed one-fourth what the same charge is to the lead producers in Idaho. It is therefore absolutely impossible to compete successfully unless we have tariff protection, and that protection is extended in its fullness and entirety by a law honestly and faithfully administered. The necessity for this has always been recognized by our Government. Under the McKinley law the duty on the lead contents of lead-silver ore was 1¼ cents per pound and the duty on pig lead was 2 cents per pound. Under the present law, known as the "Wilson bill," the duty is three-fourths of a cent per pound on the lead contents of lead-ore importations and 1 cent per pound on pig lead.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose now to urge especially the necessity for additional protection to the lead-mining industry. I am aware that a protective tariff measure of any kind can not now become a law, much as our industry needs it. I am also not unmindful of the fact that a material change in our tariff law can not at the present time be brought about. For years, however, it has been apparent to all those who have given any attention to this question, that large quantities of lead in the shape of lead-silver ore have been imported into the United States upon which the duties levied by law have not been paid. I believe that more extensive violations of the revenue laws have taken place in the matter of these importations than in any other known to our system.

The fact that silver-lead ores when imported come in large quantities, always by the carload and often by the train load and ship load, and the further fact that these ores contain at least two mineral elements. to wit, lead and silver, has made this a fruitful field for those who desire to evade the payment of the duties prescribed by law. The efforts of those interested in lead production in the United States have been put forth to prevent this violation of law, but so far they have been unsuccessful. As fast as some amendment to the revenue laws was secured which was intended to correct the evil those whose interest it was to violate the law have found some other method equally effective. Under the former statute the Treasury Department, following a precedent that had no application, held that when silver-lead ore was imported into the United States, if the value of the silver in the ore was greater than the value of the lead, then it was to be classified as silver ore, and was to be admitted free of duty. Under this ruling the lead producers of Mexico found it possible to import into the United States thousands of tons of silver-lead ore annually without paying a cent of duty thereon. In order to evade entirely the payment of duty it was only necessary to show that the value of the silver contents of the sample selected from the importation was greater than the value of the lead contents. This was most successfully done by a false sample, but under such ruling could be legally done by an honest sample if the ore were properly graded with respect to its silver composition. The Government, therefore, under this ruling lost thousands, I may say hundreds of thousands, in revenue, and the lead miners of the United States were forced to compete with the lead miners of Mexico.

This error was corrected by a change in the statute when the McKinley law was passed, making the lead contents dutiable regardless of whether it was greater or less in value than the silver contents of the ore. Unfortunately, however, a reduction of 50 per cent was made in the duty in the Wilson bill, so that our lead miners were not long permitted to enjoy the advantages which this statute would otherwise have given them. They have therefore been denied even the protection it was manifestly intended they should receive for many years. In this connection I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this industry has been forced to compete, not with English-speaking nations, not with France and Germany and the States of northern Europe, but with the toilers of the Mediterranean and Mexico, the poorest paid labor in the world. Moreover, during the last quarter of a century the value of silver in the silver-lead ores, such as are produced in the Rocky Mountain region, has, owing to the demonetization act of 1873, been constantly decreasing, until to-day it is worth less than half its value prior to the passage of that act. The joint product of our mines being lead and silver, we have therefore suffered from this fearful competition and from a constantly decreasing market for our product, which under the law enjoyed little or no protection.

Lead to-day is worth about $2.90 per hundred pounds, less than it ever has been before in the history of our country; the year 1894 showing an average price of $3.12 per hundred pounds. Our large lead-silver mines are on the verge of being compelled to close down owing to the extraordinarily low price of their joint product. This would make millions of capital idle, and throw thousands of miners out of employment and force them to enter into competition with others in the already overstocked labor markets of the United States. The margin of profit has been annihilated in this industry, and if the present low price of lead is to continue the lead-silver mines of the Rocky Mountain region can not continue in operation. This ought not to be so, and would not be so under normal conditions.

Mr. Speaker, the lead-mining industry in my State alone is capable of furnishing an annual output, under proper protection, of at least 60,000 tons, thereby increasing the production of the United States sufficiently to supply the entire demand.

Some of the smelting interests in the United States have opposed the lead producers in the matter of a proper tariff protection to this industry in the past. This is contrary to the established policy of the United States, and it is scarcely discernible at first blush why the interests of the smelter and the producer should be antagonistic. As a matter of fact, these interests should not be opposed to each other, and had it not been for the unfortunate location of some of the smelters there never would have existed any antagonism between these industries. Owing to their location some of these smelters have found it to their advantage to purchase foreign ores in large quantities. It has been claimed by them and others interested in foreign lead-ore importations that it is necessary to have foreign lead ores, or more so-called wet ores, to be used for fluxing purposes with our so-called domestic dry ores. This reasoning is not founded on fact, because it is well known that for some time there has been a dearth of dry ores at these smelters and a premium has been paid for them. It is also a well-known fact that the lead ores of my State and of the Rocky Mountain region generally are more than sufficient to smelt all of the dry ores produced in the United States. The average per cent of lead in ores produced in the Cœur d'Alene mining district is from 50 to 60, while 1 ton of ore from the districts of Idaho is sufficient to smelt 5 tons of so-called dry ores. These smelting interests have contended that there is a shortage of fluxing ores and that the policy of the Government should be to increase importations of lead ores from Mexico for fluxing purposes and to aid in smelting the dry ores of the United States. There is nothing in this contention, as the history of this product so abundantly shows. The ores produced from the mines in the United States can be smelted without the addition thereto of any foreign ore, the statement of these smelting interests to the contrary notwithstanding.

The present bill is not intended to in any wise change the tariff law, but solely for the purpose of aiding in the collection of the revenue therein required. It provides for the erection of the Government sampling works at the ports of Elpaso, Tex., Bonners Ferry, Idaho, and Northport, Wash., and such others as may be designated by the Secretary, as the interests of the revenue may require. At these ports the large silver-lead ore importations take place. We have not had an honest sample of lead-ore importations for the reason that the temptation and opportunities for fraud were so great that it has always been accomplished. These statements are not made as coming from the producers, but they can be and are substantiated by the revenue officers. We are simply asking the passage of a law which will enable the strict enforcement of a revenue statute already enacted.

Mr. Speaker, representing the lead-ore producers, I ask in their behalf that every pound of lead imported into the United States shall be required to pay the duty levied by law. The importance of this will be appreciated when it is understood that under the law the duty of three-fourths of a cent a pound is levied and collected on the entire importation if the lead contents of the ore predominates in value; while on the other hand, if the sample and assay shows that it does not predominate in value, the duty is collected only on the amount of lead actually contained in the ore as shown by the sample. In the past this has not been done for the reason that the Government has had no proper facilities for ascertaining the lead contents of imported ores. These ores, when imported, have been generally shipped to the smelters in bond and the sampling has been done by those who either imported the ore or purchased the same from the importer. If a Government official was present when the sampling was done, he was a low-salaried subordinate official who, if not corrupted, could be easily deceived. It has never been the policy of the Government to permit those directly interested in the importation to determine the quantity or value thereof for the purpose of estimating the revenue, and that rule should not be deviated from in this instance.

Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the lead producers and lead miners I ask that the Government exercise the same care in the collection of this revenue as it does in the matter of all other importations. The present bill provides that the Government itself shall do the sampling and assaying at works erected, established, and owned by the United States for that purpose. The bill further provides, as amended by the committee, that at least one-fifth of the importation shall be thus sampled and assayed. If this is properly done by Government officials at Government sampling works, and the entry liquidated in accordance with the sample, I believe the door to fraud will be closed.

On this question there should be no difference of opinion. Whether the Representatives of this House favor a tariff for protection, a tariff for revenue, or absolute free trade with regard to the importation of lead ore, they all ought to agree that the law upon the statute books should be enforced, and that if it can not be enforced as it at present exists, legislation in aid thereof should be passed to accomplish the purpose.

In behalf of the interest of the Government, which means many thousands of dollars in revenue annually, and in behalf of the lead producers and miners of the United States generally and of my State in particular, I ask the enactment of this law.

I have appended to my remarks tables showing statistics of production, consumption, importation, and prices of lead in the United States.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, this bill, to my mind, is one of very great importance. From the cursory examination which I have been able to make of it, I approve of that which it contains; and whatever criticism I desire to make is with regard to those matters of primary importance that it does not contain.

I have heard the statement made by those that I think were competent to speak, and I have heard it repeated over and over again, that the Government lost, in the collection of its revenues, $50,000,000 each year through fraudulent undervaluation at the port of New York. I had at one time some opportunity to investigate these matters. I ascertained this fact, Mr. Chairman, that it is not American citizens who are engaged in the importing trade; that more than two-thirds of all the dutiable importations into this country come through the port of New York, and that fully 75 per cent of the imports at the port of New York are made by foreigners, and more than 50 per cent of them are mere consignments. It has got to be such a matter, I might say, of scandal that there are very many of our own merchants dealing in foreign merchandise who will not attempt to import the merchandise they desire to sell, but they buy it, duty paid, from these consignees in the city of New York.

I remember hearing one of the largest merchants in the city of Chicago say, three or four or five years ago, that his house had not imported a yard of silk from Lyons for ten years; that they could not do it; that the manufacturers would say to them, "We will sell to you at New York. Our agents are there." I remember hearing another Chicago merchant say that his firm had not imported kid gloves for years, because they could buy them more cheaply, duty paid, in the city of New York than they could import them and pay the duty.

Mr. Chairman, in an investigation that I once made I ascertained this astonishing fact, that less than 4 per cent of all the invoices received at that port during a period of three months were changed in any particular from the valuation fixed by those persons most interested in undervaluation.

When you remember that a single item would change the character of this invoice so that it would become incorrect and pass into another channel, and there are often many hundreds of items in a single invoice, it is safe to say that not 1 per cent of all the foreign values fixed on these importations are ever changed in the custom-house at New York. We accept, as a rule, the valuation fixed by those persons most interested in undervaluation. Therefore it is necessary that something should be done to correct this. I know that there are aids; that there must be a declaration on the part of the importer, and that that must be submitted to the consul and verified by him. As a matter of fact that is a mere matter of form. No oath is required; it is a mere statement that is indorsed upon the invoice and a verification by our consular officer. As a matter of fact he never sees the importation. He has no opportunity for inspection. He can not assert from knowledge that the true price or value of the article is stated in the invoice. As a matter of fact these certifications are signed in blank, and are attached by some subordinate whenever the party interested presents his invoice, and the $2.50 is always collected. Then it comes to our port and the entry is sought to be made. The declaration is filed under oath. Who takes the oath? Not the importer, not a reputable merchant, but one of the hundreds and thousands of customs brokers that infest the custom-house in the city of New York—some of them reputable men, and some of them men whose employment perhaps is because of the facility with which they can take oaths.

Now, these are the men who verify these invoices; and then our examiners in the appraiser's office accept, as I have said, 96 per cent of all of them as implying verity, and accept their valuation. Now, it does look to me as if there is a remedy. It is true that the persons who sign these declarations that are sent to the United States are beyond the jurisdiction of our laws that propose to punish perjury; but there is a way to reach them. Suppose that importation is made and that it is raised to a penalty of sometimes, say, 50 per cent—as in a few cases I have known. Suppose that there is an increase in the valuation by our officers. I would say, then, to the consul that he should be forbidden to certify statements made by that importer. Let him feel that he must deal fairly and honestly with us and give us true values in his invoice or he can not trade with us. That would stop it more effectually than if the oath was administered within our own jurisdiction, where we might punish him.

Another means by which the customs revenue is constantly harmed, in my judgment, grows out of the methods pursued. There is not one word in this bill in regard to this great evil. We are pursuing, gentlemen, precisely the same methods in the port of New York that we did fifty years ago. Here will come in a French liner with 16,000 packages of merchandise. It will be unloaded in eighteen hours from five hatchways, all provided with steam appliances, and yet we send precisely the same number of inspectors to superintend that work and look after the interest of the customs that we did fifty years ago, when a 500-ton brig would anchor out in the harbor and take fourteen days or twenty days or thirty days to unload her cargo by the slow processes then in use. We send two customs officers on board each of these vessels whose duty it is to see what merchandise comes from the vessel, and the disposition of it. It may take four channels as it leaves that vessel, and yet these two men are expected to do all of this work, and do it, so far as it is done, alone and unaided.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There are always two men at each hatchway.

Mr. HEPBURN. I beg your pardon; that is not the fact. There are two to a vessel, and these two go into the little glass custom-house on the wharf, and the only business that they do, and the only thing that they know, is to see that the reserve packages that are to go to the appraisers' store are not sent in some other direction. That is all they do. I have been there from day to day; I have seen the operation of it, and I am talking about what I know. I have examined nearly every one of these inspectors under oath, and reported the testimony to the Treasury Department, and I know that I am talking the true facts in regard to this matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have put the question to many and many an inspector under oath, "How do you know there were not fifty packages of silk or fifty packages of champagne not on the manifest of this vessel that was delivered on that wharf and distributed throughout this city?" And every one of them answered, "I do not know and I could not know." I had formerly some such idea as my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] seems to have as to the manner in which this business was done. I supposed it was done in a businesslike way. I supposed that these inspectors would check every package as it came from the hold of the vessel and that they would see where it went. But instead of that, when I came to investigate, I found that they went into this little customs room (called "the custom-house") on all the principal wharves, and that their business was simply to see to it that the 10 per cent on packages reserved for the appraisers' stores got there, and even that they did not always know.

These packages are unladen. They are distributed by the officers of the steamship companies, not by the officers of the United States. Some one prepares a ticket showing the packages upon the dray. That is sent back to the two inspectors. They examine the permits for landing or distribution that they have received, and see to it that none of these particular packages are covered by the permits. That is their business; that is what they do. If there is an order for unloading at night, the same two men and no more are there. They are the guests of the steamship company; they have the best stateroom that stands vacant. They get from the steamship company $10 each for this extra service, and as long as that unlading is going on, night or day, these two men alone are charged with this duty. Now, I do not find anything in this bill to remedy that state of things.

Mr. DALZELL. Can you suggest a remedy?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir; I could suggest a remedy.

Mr. PAYNE. What is it—appoint better men?

Mr. HEPBURN. I could suggest a remedy.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, do so.

Mr. HEPBURN. The difficulty is this: The steamship companies that are doing business in New York and the importers who are doing business there dominate the customs officers of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. The trouble, then, is in the officers more than in the law?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I do not think it is, because I would make the law so stringent that the officers would have to do their duty. One trouble, Mr. Chairman, is this: In the politics of this country, by both the great parties, the four great offices connected with the collection of the revenue at the port of New York are regarded as local offices, belonging to the spoils of either party in the city of New York. There is the trouble. Here is a great national office, that of collector of the port of New York, where one hundred and twenty-five millions of our revenue are collected annually. A New Yorker is always collector of the port of New York; a New Yorker is always appraiser of the port of New York; a New Yorker is always naval officer at the port of New York; a New Yorker is always surveyor of the port of New York. There are 2,300 employees to be appointed by these officers, at salaries ranging from $800 to $5,000 a year. The men who are appointed to these great offices and changed with each National Administration have all that they can do in looking after the politics of their offices, superintending the appointments, making the necessary changes, dividing them equally among the representative districts, holding the scales of justice fairly between the various assembly districts of that city.

There is one of the great troubles. Why, sir, as an illustration of how this operates, let me call your attention to this fact: In one year recently 90,000 first-class cabin passengers landed at the port of New York, and there was collected that year from the personal effects or the importations of those passengers an average of $1.11 per head. Now, everybody who knows anything at all about the situation, knows that there was something wrong there.

Another difficulty: Merchandise coming to the port of New York is entered in large quantities for warehouse purposes, where it may remain for three years before the entry for consumption takes place. That merchandise is in the custody of the warehouseman. He pays all of the expense of the surveillance on the part of the United States. I remember one instance where a warehouse on a given day contained, by estimate, $15,000,000 worth of merchandise. There was a storekeeper there to superintend that building, which had eight openings for the reception of merchandise and the same number for taking it out. That storekeeper testified that he never saw anything that came in and never saw anything that went out, that he made all his entries from data furnished to him by the clerks of this concern, and very many of the entries in his books were found to be in the handwriting of those clerks. Now, although the law required that there should be an inventory taken every year and an inventory taken whenever the storekeeper was changed, it was found that in that warehouse there had not been an inventory taken for seven years. What was to prevent that merchandise in bond being taken out the next day after it was stored and put into consumption, the importer having the use of his money during all the time, and then, the day before the expiration of the three years, making his entry for consumption, paying his duties, and hiding the whole transaction in the bosoms of himself and of the storekeeper?

Mr. WALSH. May I ask when that investigation was made?

Mr. HEPBURN. It was made in the year 1891 or 1892. These practices have grown up. They do not belong to one Administration or another. They grow out of the fact that while the chief officers—the collector, the surveyor, the naval officer, the appraiser—are changed with the change of the Administration or oftener, there is below those officers a chief who is not changed; who is retained from Administration to Administration as a valuable officer; kept there year after year and term after term, his politics being of such an adjustable character that he can meet all exigencies of changing Administrations. Thus the thing goes on—the same old "grind" and the same old methods. On one occasion, when one of these officers had his attention called to the fact that the statutes peremptorily required that there should be an inventory each year of the merchandise in each bonded warehouse and an inventory whenever there was a change of the storekeeper, he replied, "That statute has become obsolete." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that all the propositions of the committee embraced in this bill are in the nature of improvements. I especially approve that provision with regard to limiting the character of the appeal to be taken from the General Appraisers. It must be remembered that these appraisers as a rule have been selected with great care. The President in making his selections was exceedingly fortunate, it seems to me, with reference to a majority of them. Some of the best experts in this country are now upon that Board. It was expected when they were appointed that this would be the case; that the persons selected would have a great store of information upon the subjects coming before them; that when they would look at a particular article their knowledge of its manufacture, the locality of its production, cost of material and of labor would give them accurate ideas with regard to what ought to be the market value.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that was the idea that controlled the organization of that Board. It is not a court in a certain sense. It is not a court in that its findings must always be dependent upon the evidence adduced. It is a commission. It is what it claims to be, a board of expert appraisers. There are in my belief no better judges to be found in the United States upon the questions submitted to this Board than the three active men upon the Board who try the great majority of these cases. They are Mr. George Tichenor, Judge Somerville, and Mr. Lunt, men of rare intelligence, of great experience, of large observation. No other men have had the opportunities they have had to acquire the knowledge which will enable them to enter just and wise judgments. Just think, Mr. Chairman, after those three men have investigated a question, have heard such evidence as may be brought before them, have utilized their particular experience and their remarkable opportunities for observation—after all their qualifications have been brought to bear upon the decision of the question—imagine appealing the matter to a New York City jury [laughter]—I can not think of anything more ludicrous—and a jury usually organized, in feeling at least, to decide against the customs officers.

This bill makes a provision which I would not have put in it if I had been drafting it. I believe that the decision of those General Appraisers ought to be final with reference to the facts; and that the courts ought to be required to accept it as final. Why, Mr. Chairman, think of it! This is a revenue measure. I undertake to say that the importer of foreign merchandise into this country has no rights that the Government is bound to respect save those that it chooses to give him. He is seeking a privilege; and he can have that privilege upon our terms; and Congress would have a right to say, if it saw fit, that the finding of the collector in the first instance should be final, or that the action of the appraisers should be final; certainly it may say that the action of this appellate Board shall be final.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman mean that he would have the decision of the Board of Appraisers final both as to law and fact?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; but as to matters of fact.

Mr. DALZELL. It is so provided in the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; here is a provision that the court may send the matter back for additional findings.

Mr. DALZELL. But except in that instance the finding of the Board of Appraisers is final.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the necessity for such a measure as this has become apparent in practice. It has grown to be the habit of certain importers not to make their case before the appraisers. Unwilling to make it there, they prefer to take it to the appellate court and there introduce their proofs. Some remedial legislation has been attempted once or twice, but it has been futile. Now the importers will be required by stress of circumstances to put in their whole case and to give the Board of General Appraisers the benefit of whatever information they may have.

I want to say a word further with regard to the authentication of the declaration of entry which is to be made. I believe the committee ought to have required that this be made by the importer. Under the existing law it is made by an irresponsible agent, who may never have seen the merchandise or know anything about it; who has perhaps never seen the invoice until within an hour of the time that he makes oath upon it. Yet he makes the statement that the values stated are the true values in the country of import at the time of importation. He is not responsible in a criminal sense; he is only responsible in case there is an increase; and this under the old law was a very inconsiderable responsibility, because only in the rarest instances did the increase ever reach penalty. I have seen many and many an invoice in which the increase of value was 8 per cent, 9 per cent, 9½ per cent—anything to keep it below 10 per cent, where the penalty would attach. In that case the importer was not in any sense responsible. I think we could correct this by requiring the oath to be made by the importer. It would sometimes, I admit, be an inconvenience; but, in my judgment, it would save millions to the revenue.

I think the committee have done well in reporting the provision requiring a fee in case of protest; but I do not think they have gone far enough. The fee ought to attach to every assignment in the process. Under existing circumstances a protest in practice means really nothing to the officer to whom it is addressed. It is not intended for that purpose. It is intended for future use in case of litigation. And a process will sometimes contain a hundred different assignments, without any particularity as to which is at that time relied upon. Take it in the hat-trimmings cases, for instance. It had been the habit to protest that everything—and the protest was made broad enough to cover that clause of the tariff bill—the protesters claiming that the duty on hat trimmings was 20 per cent, while the Government was collecting 50 per cent, treating them as manufactures of silk. Now, some cases have been decided against the United States in the Supreme Court already; and the difference between these two sums amounts in the port of New York alone—or did amount at the time I last investigated the matter—to some $34,000,000; and that is a claim that is now being urged against the Government of the United States. Under that clause they imported bolts of velvet very many yards long and 18 inches wide and called it hat trimmings. Everything that can possibly enter into the manufacture or the trimming of a hat is called hat trimmings, and under the decisions of the Supreme Court thus far the contention of the importer has prevailed; and the only safety of the Government is this, that when they try the specific cases before a jury it is hard to convince a jury that a bolt of velvet 100 feet long and 18 inches in width is a hat trimming; and so they can not always get the judgment in their favor.

Mr. DALZELL. Not even from a New York jury.

Mr. HEPBURN. Not even from a New York jury, whatever they may get from a Philadelphia jury. [Laughter.]

I hope the committee will not stop with this bill, admirable as it is, but will go on and correct some of the other glaring abuses which ought to be corrected, and which would result in supplying the Government with something or other to fill up our annual deficit. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think now we ought to fix a limit upon the general debate. As I understand it, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] would like thirty minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to have a brief time myself.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that all general debate be closed in one hour.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. May I suggest to the gentleman that I would like eight or ten minutes myself?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think there will be any difficulty in giving the gentleman that time out of the hour. I make that request, Mr. Chairman, that the general debate be limited to one hour.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. As to the division of the time, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York for ten minutes, if that time will be agreeable to him.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have been in this House since last December and thought when I came here that I came from a city of some importance. But this is the first time that I have had the pleasure of listening to such an extended dissertation on the city of New York and the methods in vogue at its custom-house. I asked the gentleman while on the floor what time he referred to in the statements he was then making. He said 1891. The history is a little ancient, and administrations have since changed. But at the same time I will say, for the benefit of those who are believers in ultra civil-service reform, that the doleful administration of the custom-house in the city of New York, as pictured and graphically described by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], is the result after the civil-service system had been in vogue in the custom-house in the city of New York for eight or ten years.

But, sir, while it seems from the remarks of some of the speakers that an effort has been made to make this a question of revenue and a party question, it is really too important to be considered from any party standpoint. There are two features of the bill which, in my opinion, would work great injustice to the merchant, especially the penalizing clause for undervaluation of imports, as well as the clause relating to appeals.

The gentleman from Iowa said that this is a board of appraisers, not a court. It is a board of appraisers. But an importer has not his day in court; he goes before the Board and takes such justice as they may see fit to give him, and nothing more. The appraisers are men who are appointed by the Government for this special duty. It must be assumed that they have the interests of the Government at heart, and that they are against the importer nearly always. They may issue processes if they see fit; they may refuse to issue the process if they see fit; and so an importer is absolutely without remedy and has no right, and has not, in the usual acceptation of the term, his day in court until he reaches his appeal.

Now they seek to take from the importer the right of appeal—not absolutely the right of appeal, for they still allow the circuit court of appeals to review the questions of law alone. But, my dear sir, in a tribunal constituted as is the board of appraisers in our ports of entry, why the most important question that an importer can have decided by a court of appeals is necessarily the question of fact, and he has not an opportunity to demonstrate the facts he claims to exist. He has no process at hand to secure the attendance of witnesses and their testimony, and place the facts before the board of appraisers. Besides that, upon the question of undervaluation, the principle is no doubt a splendid one. It is that undervaluation of goods, dishonest importations, should be prevented; and those who undervalue goods, dishonest importers, and those who aid or abet them in any of the ports of the nation, should be punished not only by penal duties, but in other ways if you can accomplish it.

But to penalize a man who imports, when he honestly goes beyond the limit, say one-half of 1 per cent, or 1 or 2 per cent, is carrying the matter to too great an extreme.

In this House there are probably from 150 to 200 lawyers. We had a discussion the other day as to the value of the services of judges, marshals, and district attorneys. You saw what a difference there was between us, almost in every part of the House, as to the value of those services.

Take your suit of clothes and ask a tailor in the city of Washington what that suit of clothes is worth, and ask another the same thing, and you will find that they vary from 1 to 5 per cent. Take an article of jewelry, a watch, or a diamond, and ask the opinion of experts as to its value, and you will find that they differ from 1 to 10 per cent.

So I think some allowance ought to be made for an error in judgment, and I shall at the proper time offer an amendment by which a merchant or an importer who makes an honest mistake of from 1 to 5 per cent shall escape the penalty; but if he goes over that, or over 6, or whatever in the judgment of the House is proper, then he should be penalized. It seems to me that by bringing it down to 1 per cent, or the half of 1 per cent, it is calculated to draw too strict a line on the importer. It is bringing the principle to a drastic conclusion.

The administration of the custom-house in the city of New York is as good as the administration of any custom-house in the whole of the United States. The incumbent of that office, a resident of New York, was recommended to that office by the best business men in New York City, and he carries on a thorough businesslike administration of that office. He has earned the respect of all parties and all classes of citizens. Nearly all his subordinates are civil-service appointees, and if any complaint is to be made for maladministration, I judge from the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], it is in the department of appraisers, and that is the only department where officers are appointed for life. Now, gentlemen, it is your experience that wrongdoing does not grow up in one or two days or one year. It is the bank cashier who has occupied his office for twenty years, and who has become the trusted and confidential man, who makes the defalcation. So it is with the appraisers. Their terms should be shortened. They ought not to hold positions for life, as some of them do.

Again, some reform should be made by which merchants who are rivals in the same line of business should not be on any board of appraisers with those whose interests are affected by their decisions, because that creates jealousy, and is apt to create a prejudice in the minds of the men upon whom an appraiser is passing judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, the sure and certain mode to prevent fraudulent invoices on foreign importations is by specific duties in the tariff, and on all articles upon which it is not practicable to have a specific duty only, then by combining a specific duty with an ad valorem duty would reduce in part the inducement for false invoicing.

This bill is a great improvement on the existing law regulating the collection of duties, but I do not propose to discuss directly any of its provisions. The importation of the products of foreign countries average annually from seven hundred and fifty to eight hundred and fifty million dollars in valuation at the point of shipment. As a rule, about one-half of these imports are admitted duty free.

I desire to call the attention of the committee briefly to two points in a tariff which are pertinent to the collection of revenue. First, a tariff with reasonable protective duties is the best of any to raise revenue until the home market is supplied, or nearly so, by the protected article. The question of revenue is the great one in adjusting a tariff, and next to that is protection to home industries. The second point to which I wish to call attention is that as the amount of home production of a protected article increases the importation of a like foreign article decreases, and the price lessens until the home market is supplied by the home article, when the price will be less than at any former time. On the first point, that a protective tariff is the best for raising revenue, the following table of a few articles of importation, taking the last fiscal year of the McKinley tariff and the first year of the present tariff fully proves the proposition.

In these 12 articles the valuation in 1895 is greater than in 1894 by.. $23,903,372
And the revenue collected is less 7,493,988

The articles of pure luxury are increased in amount of importation, but the revenue collected on them is less on the larger importation in 1895 over 1894.

The entire dutiable imports in the fiscal year 1892 was $369,402,804, and the revenue collected in customs was $174,124,270.

The amount of dutiable imports in 1895 was $368,736,170, being almost the same amount as in 1892, but the revenue collected from customs in 1895 was $147,901,218—twenty-six millions less than in 1892. The excess of exports over imports in 1892 was $202,875,686; in 1895 it was $75,568,200.

Tin plate is a good illustration of the point that protective duties are best for raising revenue, at least until the home industry is fully developed. The following shows the amount of importation and duties collected under the different rates since 1889:

	Quantity imported.	Valuation.	Duties collected.	Rate of duty per pound.
	Pounds.			Cents.
1890	674,664,458	$20,746,428	$6,746,645	1
1891	1,057,711,501	36,355,580	10,577,115	1
1892	403,030,785	11,793,299	8,801,358	2.2
1893	613,679,990	17,252,219	13,500,960	2.2
1894	436,780,713	11,655,638	9,609,175	2.2
1895	534,514,907	12,936,295	7,336,748	1.1

With an importation in 1893 of 60,984,468 pounds less than in 1890, the duty collected was $6,754,315 more than in 1890. But the opponents of a protective tariff would probably say that this increased revenue was only adding so much more to the cost to the consumer.

The following table shows the foreign importation, the home production, rate of duty, and revenue collected, with the market price of tin plate for a series of years, and steel billets from which the plates are rolled:

Year.	Foreign importation.	Home production.	Rate of duty per pound.	Average duty collected.	Average price per box 108 pounds I. C., 14 by 20.	Average price per gross ton steel billets. Pittsburg.

1895	534,514,907	193,801,073	1.1	7,336,748	4.22	16.58

In the fiscal year 1890 the foreign importation of tin plate was 675,000,000 pounds in round numbers; the rate of duty was 1 cent a pound. Customs revenue collected, $6,746,645. In 1893 the import was 614,000,000 pounds, round numbers, being in round numbers 62,000,000 pounds less in 1893 than 1890, the rate of duty being 2.2 cents per pound. Customs revenue collected in 1893 greater than in 1890, $6,754,315. In the fiscal year 1895, the first year under the existing tariff, the import was 534,514,907 pounds, being 97,734,194 pounds more than the year 1894, the last of the McKinley tariff, when the rate of duty was 2.2 cents a pound; and the customs revenue on this almost 100,000,000 pounds more was $2,272,427 less than in 1894.

In 1882, when the importation was 430,746,895 pounds, and the rate of duty was 1.1 cents per pound, and none was made at home, the price per box, 108 pounds, of I. C., 14 by 20, tin plate in New York, wholesale, was $5.20 per box. In 1894, when we imported only 6,000,000 pounds more, but made at home 139,223,467 pounds, the price was $5.28, the price per box not varying much between the dates when the duty was 1.1 cents a pound and when it was 2.2 cents a pound. In 1882 not a pound of tin plate was produced in this country. In 1895, 193,801,073 pounds were produced, one-fourth of the entire consumption of the country, and the same kind of a box of tin plate then sold wholesale in New York for $4.22, and last January the same kind of box sold for $3.80, being lower than ever at any time before.

The effect of protective tariffs, instead of enhancing prices, is to reduce them in all cases where natural facilities exist for the production of the protected article, so as eventually to supply the home market.

It is home competition that reduces prices to the consumer. In such cases, as the home production increases the importation of the like foreign article decreases, and the price of the protected article in our market is lessened until the home market is supplied by the home article, and then the price will be less than at any former period. The fact is conclusively proven by a comparison of the selling prices for a series of years of pig iron, steel rails, tin plate, and almost any other protected product.

The following table shows it would be true of the home production, the importation, and the market price of pig iron, from 1870 to 1895, inclusive:

Years.	Production, gross tons.	Imports, gross tons.	Average price, gross ton.	Rate of duty per ton.
1870	1,665,178	153,283	$33.25	$7.00
1880	3,835,191	700,864	28.50	7.00
1890	9,202,703	134,955	18.40	6.72
1891	8,279,870	81,916	17.52	6.72
1892	9,157,000	82,891	15.75	6.72
1893	7,124,502	62,936	14.52	6.72
1894	6,657,388	23,747	12.66	4.00
1895	9,446,308	16,239	12.00	4.00

In 1890, when the home production of pig iron was 5,367,512 tons more than in 1880, and the importation was 565,909 tons less, the selling price was $10.10 per ton less, the duty being only 28 cents per ton less.

Since 1890 the home market has been practically supplied by home production, and pig iron, No. 1, anthracite, is now selling at $12 per ton; being $21.25 per ton less than in 1870 and $6.40 less than in 1890, the duty only $2.72 less.

In 1868 was the beginning in this country of the manufacture of steel rails for market, and the following table shows a like result in this industry since that time.

Year.	Imported, in gross tons.	Product, in gross tons.	Price, in currency.	Duty.
1867	145,579	2,277	$166.00
1868	223,287	6,451	158.50	45 per cent.
1869	279,610	8,616	132.25
1870	356,387	30,357	106.75
1871	505,538	34,152	102.50	$28 per ton.

In 1880, when the home production of steel rails was 833,996 tons more than in 1870 and the importation was 215,110 tons less, the selling price was $39.25 per ton less than in 1870. In 1890, when the home production was 1,007,072 tons more than in 1880 and the importation was 141,073 tons less, the selling price was $35.75 per ton less than in 1880. Since 1890 the home market has been supplied by home production and the market price has been reduced, so that steel rails are now selling at $24 per ton, being $4 per ton less than was the amount of the first duty imposed on steel rails. Since 1880, twenty million tons of steel rails have been made in this country.

But without the duty of $28 per ton from 1870 to 1880 there would not have been made in this country during the year 1887 2,000,000 gross tons of steel rails, and annually since sufficient to supply the home market. Who will say that it would have been better to have bought abroad, no matter at what price, the 20,000,000 tons of steel rails that have been made in this country since 1880? The advantages of the amount of taxable property created in the States by the development of this vast industry; the amount paid in wages to labor; the amount of transportation for the railroads in bringing together the crude materials and distributing the finished product; the furnishing of clothing, provisions, dwellings, and all other material and supplies for the labor necessary for this production and for the persons dependent upon it, would all have accrued not to our people, but to the people of the country from whom we bought.

The country that produces for itself the products consumed by its people has both the articles produced and the money paid for their production instead of but one of these values, as would be the case in buying abroad. A protective tariff by which labor is secured the supplying of the home market gives to it at the same time the ability to buy.

Without the means to buy, what difference does it make to him what a thing sells for? High or low is of no consequence to him unless he has wherewith to pay. As the Irishman said: "Shure, it would make no difference to me if the Astor estate was to be sold at $500, I couldn't buy a cint's worth of it."

Cheapness is of no consequence without the ability to buy. The consumer buys cheapest in all cases where he pays easiest. A laborer buys a coat for $12, and his wages are $2 a day. It takes him six days to pay for the coat. Suppose that the same quality of coat, precisely in every way, sells at $9 and the wages of the laborer are $1.50 a day, it takes six days to pay for the coat. In that case the $12 coat is just as cheap, as the $9 one is really no cheaper to him than the one that sold for $12. But suppose his wages are $1.25 a day and the coat costs $8, then it takes almost the wages of six days and a half to pay for the coat. In that case the $8 one is dearer to him than the $9 or the $12 coat.

Free traders and most writers on political economy assume that no matter what the pay of the laborer may be, it is just as well for him, provided everything he buys is graded relatively to the price he receives for his day's work. That is, if he receives $1 per day it is just as well if the price of everything he buys is half what it would be if he received $2 per day.

That might be true if his only object in life is a bare subsistence and he is never to accumulate anything from his earnings; but if he is to save anything then the larger the price he is paid for his labor, even though everything else be in proportion, the greater the opportunity for saving. This statement as to wages and prices called the purchasing power of a dollar is the only plausible reason free traders can give for reconciling labor to their theory. But in the way it is used it is simply stating a mathematical proposition, which is correct in mathematics but wholly incorrect when applied to business transactions.

Should the laborer receive $1 per day and pay 5 cents a pound for sugar and $6 a barrel for flour and 10 cents a pound for beef, would it be possible in ordinary times of peace, should his wages go up to $2 per day, that sugar would be 10 cents a pound and flour $12 a barrel and beef 20 cents a pound? His wages could be doubled, but it would be a rare state of things, even if possible, that everything he buys should at the same time be doubled in price. That might be the case if his wages regulated the price of what he buys. But the price of all agricultural products is regulated not by his wages, but mostly by short or abundant crops. His rate of wages has nothing whatever to do in fixing the price of agricultural products or of the groceries and provisions that he might buy at the store.

The only way to test the advantage of wages compared with the price of things would be on a percentage of what he could save from his earnings. Say he could, by proper economy, save one-tenth of his wages. If he is paid $1 a day, then his savings would be 10 cents. If he is paid $2 a day, they would be 20 cents. In one case it takes ten days to save a dollar, in the other, five—though he should pay twice as much for everything he buys.

In the course of regular business, not including stock and bond speculations or mining ventures, individual fortunes are made by economizing the profits in the production and the exchange of the products of labor. If that is done by our own citizens, the fortunes thus accumulated are expended as a rule in the communities where they were made; some in costly living, which, however, gives greater employment to all kinds of labor; some in munificent charities which will last as long as human suffering; some in great public improvements, constructing new arteries of trade and channels of commerce that will last as long as the mighty rivers they span or the granite mountains they scale—all contributing to the wealth, the greatness, and the glory of our country.

So that while a tariff arranged with reasonable protective duties is best for revenue it at the same time builds up all the great industries of the country.

We reach a true idea of the rate of wages at different times by a comparison of what it costs the laborer to live. If the laborer to-day with ordinary economy can save 10 cents on the dollar—10 per cent of the wages he receives—then supposing he receives $2 a day he can save 20 cents. It would take him half as long to earn a dollar in the one case as in the other, though he might pay twice as much for everything he buys.

Labor has the greatest interest in supplying the home market in all cases where climate and soil will admit its being done to advantage. Why open our markets to the products of foreign countries, where misery and want sit at the fireside of the laborer? Why should we bring the same state of things to the fireside and home of American labor?

In the first place, a protective duty raises the greatest revenue; secondly, a protective duty gives to the laborer of this country the supplying of the home market in all cases where climate and soil will admit of its being done. Thus we add to the greatness and glory of the Republic in all branches of industry and lay the foundations for a higher, nobler, and better civilization. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask consent to append to my remarks a table showing the condition of the steel-rail industry from its beginning in this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I hope the gentleman will also give statistics in regard to steel rails.

Mr. GROW. I have asked consent with reference to steel rails, because I had not referred to the table while speaking, though I stated the fact.

The table is here appended showing the condition of the steel-rail industry:

Production and prices of American Bessemer steel rails, imports of steel rails, and prices of English steel rails, from 1867 to 1894.

In the following table the prices of British steel rails at British ports from 1867 to 1878, inclusive, are taken from a statement presented by Mr. H. V. Poor to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in February, 1880; for 1879 the price is an average from Fossick's Chart, an English statistical publication of high standing; and from 1880 to 1893, inclusive, the prices have been averaged from weekly English quotations in the New York Iron Age. Mr. Poor's figures represent average quotations.

All the other figures in the table are compiled from the statistical records of the American Iron and Steel Association. The cost in currency at American ports of English steel rails is obtained by reducing the gold price per ton free on board to American currency and adding the duty, and also by adding for the years from 1867 to 1889, inclusive, $3 for freight, insurance, and commissions, and $1.50 for the same items for the years 1890 to 1893, inclusive. The imports from 1867 to 1871 and from 1890 to 1892, inclusive, include both iron and steel rails.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] will have consent to publish statistics in connection with his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, instead of debating the pending question upon its merits or pretending to do so, it might perhaps be more appropriate and more within the scope of my purpose if I should present a question of high parliamentary privilege. We are discussing a revenue bill; and the framing of such a bill is the one highest and most exclusive function of this House and of every parliamentary body. But, sir, I have sat here as a new member of this House, and from the beginning of the session I have heard gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber on nearly every question that came up cite the "by your leave" of the head of a Department as the condition under which the pending measure was to be considered. Scarcely any bill, public or private, has been brought before this high legislative body of the American people—the exponent of the legislative prerogatives of the people in the person of their representatives—without some member rising and asking, "Is the Secretary of that Department, is the head of that bureau, on record before this Congress with a report in favor of the measure?" as if that were an inevitable condition of legislation by the representatives of the American people.

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that this Congress would agree to consider a revenue bill—a measure which, according to the evolution of free government and the history of parliamentary institutions, has been recognized by the Constitution of the United States as the one high privilege of the House of Representatives—I had hoped that such a bill at least might be considered without some gentleman citing that the Secretary of some Department or other favored this or that provision. [Applause.] Yet, during this discussion, I heard my friend from Idaho [Mr. WILSON], who comes here representing a great people of this Republic, born out of the hearts and the homes of all the centuries of the Atlantic Coast, of all the centuries that have been home making and liberty building in this land: that have contributed of the best blood, the hearts and lives of the best sons and the best daughters that the East could furnish to go and build Commonwealths like that of Idaho and the rest of the Western part of this Republic—I heard that gentleman, representing in this House all its development from the earliest centuries until the present, rise and commend the approval of this House to a feature of a revenue bill because the Secretary of a Department was in favor of it.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me?

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Of course.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. I did not ask whether any head of a Department approved the measure. I stated that my people approved it, and that the head of the Department also joined in its approval.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in my view, in this forum of the lawmakers of the American people, it would be sufficient for the gentleman to say simply that his people and the people of the country are in favor of it. That should be ultimate with him and with me and with the other members of this House as Representatives.

I am a new member, and doubtless I shall soon pass away from this House, but I hope that there are within this Hall some members on both sides of the Chamber—I hope there are representatives of the great party of Democracy, that has represented from the time of Thomas Jefferson the great throbbing heart of a party devoted to the people as the people; I hope that gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, as the exponents of the party of Abraham Lincoln and of human liberty—I hope that whether I pass away or not there are other members of this House on both sides of the Chamber who will sit here long enough to have it established as the imperative rule that if any member on either side cites the opinion of any Department officer or any bureau officer of this Government for any purpose except as furnished by said official in answer to a call for information, such a representative of the American people in this House shall be in contempt of Congress. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is one which should have, and I trust has, no politics in it. It is simply an attempt to discover the best way to execute the collection laws of the country, and the Committee on Ways and Means is to be congratulated that it has produced so good a bill as that which is now before us for our consideration.

I should not say a word, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the bill or utter a word of criticism upon it if it were not so good that it can be made approximately perfect, and the few words which I do wish to utter on this question are more in the nature of suggestion than of criticism.

We were all greatly interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in which he particularized the methods of doing business in the custom-house of the great port of this country. I have no special criticism to make on that point, nor upon his remarks, for in a general way I agree with him. But undoubtedly it is true that in some matters of detail he was in error, and that the facilities for committing fraud upon the customs revenues in the great port of New York are not so great as he has represented them to be. He would find if he went to one of the great landing wharves, where the foreign steam vessels are unloading in New York, that it is difficult if not impossible to take a package from the landing wharf unless accounted for, and if it is ordered into the warehouse it must be accounted for there, and if it is an article that goes into consumption the duty must be paid or secured to be paid before it can be removed. He would find greater difficulties, I apprehend, in withdrawing the goods from the warehouse than he has claimed to exist.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Now, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Does the gentleman speak from actual knowledge or from hearsay?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I speak from both.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman from Iowa spoke from actual knowledge of the facts, as I understand it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. He spoke from investigation. I speak from actual contact with the business, from official connection with it, and from personal observation.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I have but a very limited time and would prefer not to be interrupted in what I am saying.

Mr. HEPBURN. I only wanted you to correct some of the things that you have already said. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If I had time, I should be very glad to indulge the gentleman, and will be pleased at any time when there is sufficient opportunity to discuss these material points and other points connected with the administration of our customs laws with him.

The gentleman from Iowa pointed out how easily frauds could be committed on the customs revenues, and spoke particularly of the declaration before the foreign consuls, and asserted that foreigners who import goods into this country are entitled to no consideration from this Government. As a matter of law, that is true. But it is equally true, Mr. Chairman, that the citizens of no foreign country are bound to respect or obey the laws of this country with reference to importations unless within our jurisdiction. So it is as broad on one side as on the other. But when the lawmakers of our country shall arrive at the conclusion, which has been advocated from the foundation of the Government to the present time, that duties should be assessed, not on the foreign values, but upon the actual value at the custom-house in this country when they come in direct competition with the goods manufactured here of a similar character by American labor, and that the value on which the duties are to be assessed is to be settled by a board of appraisers as learned and practical as the gentleman suggests, then we shall have come to a condition of affairs that will justify us in making a proper estimate of what the duties will be for any coming year. It will be very accurate, indeed, because we shall know, in comparison with the articles we produce, if they are produced here at all, just what the value will be, what the rate of duty will be, and what will be the aggregate of collections. The committee has proceeded in a slight degree in this line in the proviso on page 18, of section 11, where they say:

Provided also, That it shall be lawful for appraising officers in determining the dutiable value of such merchandise to take into consideration the wholesale price at which such or similar merchandise is sold or offered for sale in the United States.

If the committee had gone a little further, and adopted the whole of the suggestion to which I have referred, we should have arrived at a conclusion which, although not without difficulty, yet would have made fraud upon the revenues of the Government almost impossible.

I wish to refer briefly to section 15, where I have a word of criticism to offer. Under this section all questions of fact are to be determined by the appraisers and no tribunal can subsequently pass upon a question of fact raised. Under the administrative act of 1890 this is not so. The courts passed on the law, and the facts also, and the boards of appraisers were required to pass on to the court to which an appeal might be taken a statement of all of the facts and the evidence taken by them upon the pending question, and yet this bill provides, in section 15, that the Board of General Appraisers shall not return to the said circuit court of appeals any of the evidence taken by or before them in the case.

Why not, if the purpose is to ascertain exactly the duty and the quantity of duty which should be assessed upon any given importation? If it is the intention to obtain an honest and just determination of the question, why should not all of the evidence which is before the board of appeals be passed on by the tribunal or court to which the appeal is taken? I certainly can not comprehend any reason why this should not be done; but the findings of fact are all excluded. Now, the findings of fact are generally determinative of the question of the duty to be assessed. The point of law is brief and simple, in comparison with the questions of fact, because the law generally specifically settles what the duty is if it is determined what the article is upon which the duty is assessed; but when we come to the point of the rate of duty, come to those questions where the duty is assessed according to the principle of law, there comes the gist of the whole controversy, and under this bill no appeal will lie from that determination. To this section of the bill I express my dissent and enter my protest.

There are some other matters in connection with this bill which I think could have been improved along the very lines of progression which the bill itself presents; but the grand overlying principle of it all, which is necessary in order that the duties assessed by this Government should be accurately determined and honestly collected, is that they shall be assessed upon the valuation which they have when they enter this country, and not when they leave the foreign country, when they enter directly into competition with the goods that are manufactured in this country, and are about to enter into the consumption of our people. I hope that the Committee on Ways and Means, in this Congress or in some subsequent Congress, will carefully consider this phase of the question, and will let us have a tariff which shall be Americanized and popularized in its every branch and upon every subject.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill by sections.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 4. That, except in case of personal effects accompanying the passenger, no importation of any merchandise exceeding $100 in dutiable value shall be admitted to entry without the production of a duly certified invoice thereof as required by law, or of an affidavit made by the owner, importer, or consignee, before the collector or his deputy, showing why it is impracticable to produce such invoice; and no entry shall be made in the absence of a certified invoice, upon affidavit as aforesaid, unless such affidavit be accompanied by a statement in the form of an invoice, or otherwise, showing the actual cost of such merchandise, if purchased, or if obtained otherwise than by purchase, the actual market value or wholesale price thereof at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported, the name of the consular district in which and the name of the place from which the merchandise was procured, and the place of production or manufacture; which statement shall be verified by the oath of the owner, importer, consignee, or agent desiring to make entry of the merchandise, to be administered by the collector or his deputy, and it shall be lawful for the collector or his deputy to examine the deponent under oath touching the sources of his knowledge, information, or belief in the premises, and to require him to produce any letter, paper, or statement of account in his possession, or under his control, which may assist the officers of customs in ascertaining the actual value of the importation or any part thereof; and in default of such production when so requested, such owner, importer, consignee, or agent shall be thereafter debarred from producing any such letter, paper, or statement for the purpose of avoiding any additional duty, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under this act, unless he shall show to the satisfaction of the court or the officers of the customs, as the case may be, that it was not in his power to produce the same when so demanded; and no merchandise shall be admitted to entry under the provisions of this section unless the collector shall be satisfied that the failure to produce a duly certified invoice is due to causes beyond the control of the owner, consignee, or agent thereof: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may make regulations by which books, magazines, and other periodicals published and imported in successive parts, numbers, or volumes, and entitled to be imported free of duty, shall require but one declaration for the entire series. And when entry of merchandise exceeding $100 in value is made by a statement in the form of an invoice the collector shall require a bond for the production of a duly certified invoice in a penal sum which shall be double the amount of the estimated duties, and in the sum of $100 if the merchandise be entered free of duty; and when it shall be found on liquidation of the entry thereof that said merchandise is exempt from duty, or subject to a specific duty, and that the amount of duty assessable thereon is not dependent upon the price or value thereof, in such cases the bond given for production of a duly certified invoice may be canceled, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, without requiring the production of such invoice.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to a difficulty that will arise under this section, where a pro forma invoice is filed and the undertaking is made that the true invoice will be furnished. That bond is absolutely worthless, for the reason that unless you have the true invoice it is impossible for you to recover upon the bond, and that becomes an incentive not to furnish the invoice. It results in the absolute nullification of this whole section requiring an invoice. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, for the reason that at one time not long ago there were 14,000 of these bonds in the hands of the district attorney of the city of New York, nct one of which could he successfully bring suit upon, and you might just as well not have a bond, for the reason that you can not establish the damages unless you will make the same liquidated damages and require the court to assess that amount in case of the failure to produce the true invoice. This is substantially the old law. I think that this section is a good one, if you will insert there a provision that will treat the penalty in the bond as liquidated damages and let the language be so forcible that the court must assess judgment in that amount.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that this section was reviewed both by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the appraiser who appeared before the committee, and they never raised the question raised by the gentleman from Iowa, but they did think that the penalty of the bond should be prescribed in the act. Hence we have added, on that suggestion, an amendment which is all new matter, from line 8, page 6, to the end of the section, where it prescribes—

In a penal sum which shall be double the amount—and so forth. All they suggested was that we fix this penalty in the bond. They seemed to think that the only difficulty was the lack in that respect, that the statute had failed to fix the penalty of the bond, and if the penalty of the bond was fixed under this provision in double the amount, as is required under this provision, and with the limitations that follow, that was all that was necessary to make this section effective.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will think for a moment, suppose you bring an action upon this bond for a failure to produce the true invoice. The entry has been made under the pro forma invoice. Now, how will you secure a recovery for anything more than mere nominal damages? How can you prove the damages? The measure of damages undoubtedly would be the loss that the Government suffered through the undervaluation—the difference between the true value and the value stated in the invoice. Now, if there is no invoice, how can you establish that? You never can have a recovery, and you will be in precisely the same condition as the Department was under the old law. This was substantially the law prior to 1890, and there were these 14,000 bonds in the hands of the district attorney for the district of New York at one time. I did not observe this before, or I should have called the attention of the gentleman to it. If you will make this liquidated damages, you will obviate the difficulty.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. To what case does the gentleman from Iowa refer, in which it was held that these bonds could be recovered upon only in the way in which the gentleman has stated?

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not recall a case, but I know that the district attorney for a long time refused to bring suit, because he could not secure recoveries in the absence of the invoices.

Mr. PAYNE. There was nothing in the law that required any penalty in the bond at that time.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am speaking of the old law, prior to 1890.

Mr. PAYNE. Prior to that there was no penalty.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, yes; there was a penalty.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I think the gentleman's criticism is rather extreme on the language of the present bill. It strikes me that way, if the gentleman will permit me to say so.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman suggest a way in which a recovery can be had for more than nominal damages in the absence of the invoice?

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will look at this language, commencing with the sentence in line 4:

And when entry of merchandise exceeding $100 in value is made by a statement in the form of an invoice, the collector shall require a bond for the production of a duly certified invoice in a penal sum which shall be double the amount of the estimated duties, and in the sum of $100 if the merchandise be entered free of duty.

Now, will not that statement answer the purpose, giving the value on the invoice, and then the penalty would be double that?

Mr. HEPBURN. That would be a penalty on the bond, but I am speaking about an action. When you come to recover on the bond you have got to establish the measure of damages. Now, what will be the measure of damages, if the gentleman will permit me, in that case?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. If the gentleman from Iowa were presiding in a court I think he would undoubtedly hold that the prosecuting attorney could approximate the damage by any evidence he could offer.

Mr. HEPBURN. The amount of the damages would be the undervaluation, and the invoice is required in order to secure the Government against undervaluation.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, if they do not produce the invoice, how can you recover anything more than nominal damages?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman assumes that there can be no approximation of the damages in the absence of the invoice. In that absence could not the prosecuting attorney prove the damage by any other kind of proof accessible that is known to the law?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would submit to the gentleman that it would be impossible in the absence of the invoice to recover anything more than mere nominal damages.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman will understand me that I suggest that the failure to produce the bond is a breach of the bond.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understand that the failure to produce the invoice is a breach of the bond.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. And the measure of the damages, as the gentleman has stated. We ascertain what that damage is to the Government and undertake to prove, in any competent way the attorney may see fit, that the court would admit, approximately, the measure of the damages.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have failed to make myself understood by the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. PAYNE. I think there is something in the criticism of the gentleman from Iowa. I do not see in such a case as that how anything more than nominal damages could be recovered, unless the Government should be able to prove that. By not producing the duly certified invoice the question of the amount of damages could not be determined, and the Government would be defeated by reason of that. I think there is something in the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Does not the man who fails to comply with the bond take the risk of having damages assessed at a higher rate?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; but suppose the pro forma invoice—the invoice in form, I believe it is called in the bill—does approximate the real value of the goods, so that the Government loses nothing, it should have the right to require the duly certified invoice, and to enforce the requirement by a recovery of more than nominal damages on the bond.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. In a case like that which the gentleman now puts, as I understand it, there is no damage suffered by the Government.

Mr. PAYNE. Say the case is correctly stated by the criticism of the gentleman from Iowa, that this leaves it for determination upon the pro forma invoice instead of the duly certified invoice. It makes it merely a formal invoice to act upon, and damages could be recovered. I think there is something in the gentleman's criticism.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman assents to the proposition laid down by the gentleman from Iowa, that the Government is precluded from recovering any damages except nominal, except where the man furnishes his bond.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call attention to the fact that there is nothing before the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to strike out the last word, then.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. On the basis of the motion just made by the gentleman from New York, without having personally examined this question, it strikes me, from the statement made by my friend from Iowa, that the Government is not precluded from bringing a suit for damages in any way.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think it is; but the question is, can the Government collect any damages that would make it a punishment if the importer should resort to the pro forma invoice instead of the duly certified invoice, and——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. But the gentleman is aware that the appraisers have very large powers and agents going about all over the world——

Mr. PAYNE. That is all true.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia (continuing). To prove undervaluations.

Mr. PAYNE. Still, I think we should not approve a pro forma bond.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will permit me, I insist that it is absolutely impossible to recover unless you have that invoice. There is no other evidence that you can have. How can you establish the fact that there has been undervaluation unless you have that invoice? That is the first point, the starting point, and the difference between the valuation in that invoice and the true valuation would be the measure of the damages; so you must have the invoice in order to show the variation that there is between the two, that variation constituting the actual damages that the Government suffers. Therefore, with all due respect to the gentleman from Georgia, I do not see how it is possible in any instance to recover without that evidence; nothing else can take its place.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to have this section passed over for the present and we can return to it later.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That whenever merchandise imported into the United States is entered by invoice, one of the following declarations, according to the nature of the case, shall be filed with the collector of the port, at the time of entry by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent; which declaration so filed shall be duly signed by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, before the collector, or before a notary public or other officer duly authorized by law to administer oaths and take acknowledgments, who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive such declarations and to certify to the identity of the persons making them, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and every officer so designated shall file with the collector of the port a copy of his official signature and seal: Provided, That if any of the invoices or bills of lading of any merchandise imported in any one vessel, which should otherwise be embraced in said entry, have not been received at the date of the entry, the declaration may state the fact, and thereupon such merchandise of which the invoices or bills of lading are not produced shall not be included in such entry, but may be entered subsequently: Provided further, That no person holding a license to transact business as custom-house broker, under the provisions of section 23 of the act of August 28, 1894, shall be designated to administer oaths and take acknowledgments under the provisions of this section, and the power to administer such oaths and take such acknowledgments is hereby revoked as to all persons so licensed to transact business as custom-house brokers at the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "four," in line 17, page 7, the following: "nor any agent or employee of such broker"; also, after the word "broker," in line 21, insert "and their agents and employees."

Mr. PAYNE. The idea of this amendment is to prohibit the clerks, agents, and employees of these brokers from making these oaths and declarations, as well as the custom-house brokers themselves.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the owner, consignee, or agent of any imported merchandise which has been actually purchased, may, at the time when he shall make and verify his written entry of such merchandise, but not afterwards, make such addition in the entry to the cost or value given in the invoice, or pro forma invoice, or statement in form of an invoice, which he shall produce with his entry, as in his opinion may raise the same to the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported; but no such addition shall be made upon entry to the invoice value of any imported merchandise obtained otherwise than by actual purchase; and the collector within whose district any merchandise may be imported or entered, whether the same has been actually purchased or procured otherwise than by purchase, shall cause the actual market value or wholesale price of such merchandise to be appraised; and if the appraised value of any article of imported merchandise subject to an ad valorem duty or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof shall exceed the value declared in the entry, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties imposed by law on such merchandise, an additional duty of 1 per cent of the total appraised value thereof for each 1 per cent that such appraised value exceeds the value declared in the entry, but the additional duties shall only apply to the particular article or articles in each invoice that are so undervalued, and shall be limited to 50 per cent of the appraised value of such article or articles. Such additional duties shall not be construed to be penal, and shall not be remitted nor payment thereof in any way avoided except in cases arising from a manifest clerical error, nor shall they be refunded in case of the exportation of the merchandise and shall not be subjected to the benefit of drawback: Provided, That, if such appraised value of any merchandise shall exceed the value declared in the entry by more than 50 per cent, except when arising from a manifest clerical error, such entry shall be held to be presumptively fraudulent, and the collector of customs shall seize such merchandise and proceed as in case of forfeiture for violations of the customs laws; and in any legal proceedings which may result from such seizure such undervaluation to be shown by the appraisement shall be presumptive evidence of fraud and the burden of proof shall be on the claimant to rebut the same, and forfeiture shall be adjudged unless he shall rebut such presumption of fraudulent intent by sufficient evidence: Provided further, That the forfeitures provided for in this section shall apply to the whole of the merchandise or the value thereof in the case or package containing the particular article or articles in each invoice which are undervalued: And provided further, That all additional duties, penalties, or forfeitures, applicable to merchandise entered by a duly certified invoice shall be alike applicable to goods entered by a pro forma invoice or statement in form of an invoice. The duty shall not, however, be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice or entered value.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "entry," in line 19, page 13, the words "six per centum."

Mr. WALSH. The effect of this amendment would be to change somewhat the reading of this clause and make it read as follows:

And if the appraised value of any article of imported merchandise, subject to an ad valorem duty, or to a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value thereof, shall exceed the value declared in the entry 6 per cent there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in addition to the duties imposed by law on such merchandise, etc.

The bill as it is reported from the committee inflicts a penalty where there is any undervaluation. As I said in my former remarks, it is almost impossible for any importer, or any appraiser, or any expert, to get at the exact value of any article, and the law under which we are living now allows 10 per cent leeway. My amendment reduces it to 6 per cent, or I would be willing to make the rate 5 per cent; but I say that it is a great hardship on the importer or the merchant to hold him down to the exact valuation of any article that he imports into this country. You penalize him by an additional 1 per cent duty; not 1 per cent on the undervaluation, but 1 per cent on the value of the whole importation. I claim that that is a great hardship and it will tend to make the merchant overvalue his goods to a slight extent and pay an increased duty on them, thus increasing the cost of such articles to the consumer.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply provides for 6 per cent of fraud. That is the whole proposition. The additional duty can not be incurred unless there is fraud in the valuation. If the appraisers add 6 per cent to the importer's valuation, then the line of additional duty commences there.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman has said that this is only a tax of 6 per cent on fraud. Does he not know that this imposition is to be placed on the goods, however honestly the mistake may have been made originally?

Mr. PAYNE. If I said a tax of 6 per cent on fraud, I did not mean it. I meant that this offered a premium of 6 per cent on fraud—that it gave a chance for the importer to advance his goods 6 per cent without incurring the risk of losing a dime.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the present law allow 10 per cent?

Mr. PAYNE. It does; and that is one of the worst features of the present law, if not its worst feature. It encourages more fraud, undervaluation, and crimes against the revenue than any other feature in the present administrative law; and it was because the committee wanted to reduce those offenses to a minimum that they made the increased duties commence at the point of the increased valuation, ascertained by an honest appraisement by the Board of Appraisers. If the appraisers increase the importers' valuation only 1 per cent, then there is an increase of only 1 per cent in the duty.

Mr. WALSH. An increase of 1 per cent not on the overvaluation, but on the whole importation.

Mr. PAYNE. An increase of 1 per cent on the valuation of the whole importation. Now, the provision of the bill is no hardship to the honest importer. He has a hearing before the appraiser; his witnesses are heard; he can prove the value of his goods, which he knows better than any other man. There is no hardship on him. This provision will operate only against those who may seek to evade the law, and we want to cut off the opportunity of evasion even by those who would evade the law by only 6 per cent of undervaluation. We want to reduce the evasion to a minimum. We want to provide, in effect, that if there should be only 1 per cent of undervaluation additional duty to the extent of 1 per cent shall be added upon the appraised value of the goods.

The committee considered this matter. We considered the advisability of fixing the line at 5 per cent or at 10 per cent. It was the judgment of the committee, following the judgment of the board that examined the question for months in the city of New York, the board of which ex-Secretary Fairchild was chairman—following the judgment of that board we have made the increased duty commence with the increased valuation of the Board of Appraisers. I hope that the amendment will be voted down and that the section will be allowed to stand as reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move pro forma to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, no hope that we shall be able to change the report of the committee impels me to consume the time in discussing the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which I rise to support. But it presents a very important question, and it is well enough that the facts should go along with the enactment of the provision embraced in this bill.

My friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] speaks very emphatically against this amendment and in favor of the bill. One would suppose from the burden of his remarks that this is a penalty placed upon "fraudulent" invoices. If it were so, there might be some plausibility in the pending provision of the bill. But, on the contrary, if A, for instance, buys a bill of goods and gets a bargain of 5 per cent in their value, which is not uncommon in commercial transactions, and then invoices the goods at exactly what he paid for them, this board, taking charge of him under the provision of this law, would tax him not the ordinary tax on the goods, but would first impose the statutory rates on the valuation at which the goods were invoiced, and then would tax him 100 per cent on every cent he had gained in his original trade.

On account of the importance of this question I may be pardoned for reiterating what I said in the opening discussion—that the experts who came before the Ways and Means Committee were unanimous in one thing at least—that there is no man living who in a very large class of goods could come within 5 per cent of uniformity in undertaking to fix their value. Therefore in this bill the committee put a penalty upon any bargain that a man who purchases goods may make. They put a penalty upon any trade he may have made in which he took advantage of the reduced prices at the mill from which he bought. They put a penalty upon his buying in very large quantities in case the invoices follow the actual cost of the goods and happen to be a little below valuations, which the experts themselves say can not be accurate in uniformity. That is what is proposed by this measure.

The proposition embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] deserves enactment, whether it be enacted or not. Of course you have the majority and have the power to enact these provisions into law; but the question is, What is just and right in dealing with the American people? If our tariff laws are not on the right basis we ought to put them on the right basis. If the duties are too high we ought to lower them; if they are too low we ought to raise them. We should collect a regular statutory rate from everybody. This, I think, is the correct principle. I sympathize with what has been said in regard to the strict enforcement of the tariff laws. I am in favor of the strict enforcement of all laws. If they are good laws that is the way to get benefit from them; if they are vicious it is the way to get them repealed. But when all the experts concur in affirming that there can not be an accurate standard fixed for appraisement, I say that within the limit where they say the discretion even of wise people may vary it is not well to fix penalties which are based upon the idea that great fraud has been committed and that a great reform is to be wrought by statutory penalties. Do justice by the American people—by importer and consumer alike.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment. In reply to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], I desire to say that it is the judgment both of the Treasury Department and of the board of which ex-Secretary Fairchild was chairman that the point of additional duty should commence at the point of undervaluation. Allow me to read what ex-Secretary Fairchild says in his report on this point:

This penalty or additional duty is required not only to punish and prevent willful undervaluations, but also to operate as a constant inducement to the importer to state with the greatest possible accuracy the true market value—

And I may say the importer knows the exact market value of the goods which he imports; in many cases he is the only man who does know accurately their exact market value—and thus to aid the Government appraising officers in the performance of their duties. Under the present system the importer has a margin of 10 per cent within which he may incorrectly state the market value, subject to no greater risk, should his entry be advanced, than the payment of the regular duty upon the amount added by the appraising officer to make market value.

And as a rule he states the market value where there is a difference, or if there is a difference in valuation, substantially 10 per cent below the market value, because he has 10 per cent lee way.

If, however, no margin is allowed for difference of opinion between the appraising officer and the merchant, there is always an inducement to the importer to state the market value as accurately as he can, irrespective of the price he may himself have paid.

And for this reason that board presided over by Secretary Fairchild, as well as the Treasury Department, unanimously agree that the assessment of additional duty should begin at the point of undervaluation.

For that reason I think the amendment should not prevail.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. WALSH, it was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman in charge of the bill at this point. I suggest the following amendment: In lines 21 and 22, on page 14 of the bill, strike out the words "case or package" and insert the word "invoice"; so that section would read, or that portion of the section:

Provided further, That the forfeitures provided for in this section shall apply to the whole of the merchandise or the value thereof in the invoice containing the particular article or articles in each invoice which are undervalued.

The reason, Mr. Chairman, is this: That often a large number of packages may be opened at the same time, and the difficulty arises as to which particular package a particular article which is in question as to its valuation was in; and if you attempt a forfeiture of the article in a given package it would become a matter of great difficulty often to establish the fact, as the Government would have to establish it, that the articles objected to, or a number of articles to which objection is made, were in a particular package or case.

I think the amendment would greatly improve the bill and simplify very much the procedure under it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the additional duties provided for in section 7 relate only to the value of the merchandise in the case or package concerning the particular article or articles in question. It relates to the particular articles in value which are contained in the package or case.

It seems to me that it would add very greatly to the penalties imposed by the bill if you forfeit the goods contained in the whole invoice because of the fact that objection is made to the appraisement, or valuation rather, of an article in a particular package. It would be an unusual and unnecessary hardship.

The difficulty is this: These cases of forfeiture must be tried before a jury in the courts, and the penalty would be made so severe by the adoption of the amendment that immediately the importer gets the sympathy of the jury, and it becomes impossible, except in the plainest cases, to establish the guilt of the party and secure the forfeiture of the goods. I do not think the amendment would be in the line of a better collection of the customs duties, and I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The forfeiture referred to would be only possible in a flagrant case, where the undervaluation was very great indeed, and where the increase of value fixed upon the goods by the customs officers is at least 50 per cent. Now, in a case of that kind, where there is such a flagrant attempt at fraud, it seems to me we ought not to deal very gently with the fraudulent importer, but, on the contrary, that he ought to be made an example of, and that at least, in endeavoring to do so, the Government should protect itself as far as possible in all matters of proof.

Suppose we bring an action of forfeiture for gross undervaluation of an importation of merchandise, and we have in our possession certain articles. The burden will be on the Government to show that all of these articles were taken from a case or package, and the one particular case or package with reference to which the fraud was charged.

I think it would be much better to relieve the Government from the necessity of making such proof, and to remove the contention altogether, because the burden is on the Government, and in making it you only make loopholes for the escape of the defendant, whereas the adoption of the amendment would simplify the matter to such an extent that collateral questions of this character could not be raised at all.

However, if the gentleman in charge of the bill thinks it is not desirable, I will not insist, but will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 12. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, nine general appraisers of merchandise, each of whom shall receive a salary of $7,000 a year. Not more than five of such general appraisers shall be appointed from the same political party. They shall not be engaged in any other business, avocation, or employment, and may be removed from office at any time by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. They shall be employed at such ports and within such territorial limits as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe, and are hereby authorized to exercise the powers and duties devolved upon them by this act, and to exercise, under the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, such other supervision over appraisements and classifications for duty of imported merchandise as may be needful to secure lawful and uniform appraisements and classifications at the several ports. Three of the general appraisers shall constitute a board, and at least one board shall be on duty as a board of general appraisers daily (except Sunday and legal holidays) at the port of New York during the business hours prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at which port a place for samples shall be provided, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe, which shall include rules as to the classes of articles to be deposited, the time of their retention, and as to their disposition, which place of samples shall be under the immediate control and direction of the Board of General Appraisers on duty at said port.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to what might be a possible construction of section 12, which had not occurred to me before. Section 12 provides—

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, etc.

Would that have the effect to supersede the present Board of Appraisers and require new appointments, or has the attention of my friend been called to that?

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the bill provides an amendment to section 12 of the act of June 10, 1890, and that the only difference between this and the original section is, that in line 18, on page 19, we have interpolated the words—

Shall constitute a board, and at least one board.

That is the only change we have made in the original section. I do not see how this could possibly provide for the appointment of a new board or a change from the present one.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. But this is a new statute, when you have enacted this.

Mr. DALZELL. It is only an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. It is amended so as to read as follows——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. If the gentleman is content with it, I have no further suggestions.

Mr. DINGLEY. And the amendment consists in interpolating the words—

Shall constitute a board, and at least one board.

That is all that is done to the section. I will say that this bill as drafted has been submitted to the Board of Appraisers themselves, and also to the Treasury Department.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Perhaps I ought to state to the gentleman that I had some connection with an amendment to this law some time ago, and I know that on that occasion we followed this form, and that the Board of Appraisers were very much afraid that if enacted in that shape it would supersede them, and we had to change it to meet their whim. I simply call the attention of the gentlemen to it in order that they may not overlook it.

Mr. PAYNE. If there is any possible reason for the gentleman's criticism, that would be very easily obviated by adding the words at the end of section 3—

But not in any way to interfere with the terms of the present Board of Appraisers—or something of that kind.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suppose there would have been no question about it if the first paragraph had read:

That section 12 is hereby amended by inserting, after the word "appraisers," the words "shall constitute a board, and at least one board"; so that said section shall read as follows.

If it had been put in in that form, there could have been no question at all about it. I can hardly see how the fact that the mere amendment itself is not recited in the first clause can change the effect of the law.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the first section. It goes on to state that this is to amend an act approved June 10, 1890. The language is:

That chapter 407 of the Statutes at Large of the United States of America, volume 26, entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, amended in the several sections herein named so as as to read as follows.

Now, the only change in section 12 is found in line 18, in the words:

Shall constitute a board, and at least one board.

The purpose of this being to leave the law, so far as the appraisers are concerned, precisely as they are now, it seems to me.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I am quite content myself. I may, perhaps, be overcritical, but that was the view taken two years ago, I remember.

Mr. EVANS. They did not take that view this year.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman can see that it is possibly liable to that construction.

Mr. DINGLEY. Did not the act to which the gentleman refers enact the section as original, instead of amending it so that said section should "read as follows"?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My friend may remember that the administrative portions of the last tariff law were embodied in the act revising the rates, and where there was no change the same language was employed as was employed in the act of 1890, so that it comes back to the same question precisely.

Mr. DINGLEY. My impression is that the act of 1894 reembodied the act of 1890 as new legislation, and did not propose to amend it. Therefore, there was the difference which I have suggested. It repealed all acts to the contrary.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. That is true; but I submit whether it is possible this could be held to be a new statute.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me suggest to the gentleman that under the language of section 1 of the bill section 12 would not be in the bill at all except to show the members of the House what words are to be interpolated in the bill, and that this will remain as it is now on the statute book, with the addition of the words which have been stated.

Mr. DINGLEY. Eight sections of the act of 1890 are not touched by this bill.

Mr. STEELE. And remain on the statute book.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. I send up an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 4, after the word "of," strike out the word "seven" and insert in the place thereof the word "five."

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of antagonizing this bill. It seems to me, from my small experience in such matters, to be a good bill, but it does seem to me that it is about time we were economizing in salaries of officers. Now, I do not doubt but what these are very important positions, but I find to-day that in every business department of this country, except with the official classes, every day it becomes harder and harder for any class of men to make a salary of $5,000, and it does seem to me that $5,000 is ample compensation for these general appraisers. It is not true, as usually supposed, that the men who occupy and perform this kind of work can make as much as $5,000 in private vocations. It is not true that this kind of work is done by high-priced men. As a matter of fact, you may take every Department of this Government, and I may say the most important class of the departmental work is not done by the chief, or the man who gets the higher salary, and it seems to me that $5,000 ought to be ample remuneration for these general appraisers.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman understand the nature and character of the work performed by these gentlemen?

Mr. BELL of Colorado. No, sir; I do not claim to understand in detail what they are to do; but I do claim to know that this detail work and this class of work is done all through every department of life by men that only receive $2,000 to $2,500 per annum for their services.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to state to the gentleman that before our committee the effort was made to increase rather than to decrease the salaries, because it requires so much skill and so much ability that it was difficult to secure the right kind of men—that private individuals and corporations were paying all the way from $12,000 to $20,000—for specialists of the character that the Government required to perform this kind of work.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Yes, sir; I understand that that claim is always made, and the whole tendency of every department of the Government is to raise the salaries. We learned that very distinctly the other day, when we had up the marshal bill and the bill for the district attorneys, and we will find it in every department of the Government; but I venture the assertion that if you pay $4,000 or $5,000 you will get just as good ability as you will if you put it at $7,000. There will be plenty of men to take it, and the real ability that performs this kind of work never gets the high pay. It is the man who directs the real ability that obtains the pay. The man who manages is really a figurehead, and he obtains the high pay and the expert does the technical work.

Mr. HOPKINS. Right there let me suggest that this work can not be done by clerks or persons other than those designated in the bill. It is because of their special intelligence on the special lines of their work that they are employed by the Government; and they save millions of dollars for the few thousands that are paid for their salaries.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. That may all be; but if you can obtain sufficient ability for $5,000 it is not necessary to pay more. I have no doubt any number of men will take the offices if this salary is put in front of them. I know there is a tendency to increase every salary of this Government, and the only good business to-day in the United States is official business. The man who does not hold office finds it harder every day to obtain a dollar, but he who holds an official position, with the increasing value of the dollar has his salary constantly going up without increasing the number of dollars. I am opposed to making low salaries. I think they ought to be reasonable, and I think that $5,000 is ample compensation, and is enough. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of duties chargeable upon imported merchandise, including all dutiable costs and charges, and as to all fees and exactions of whatever character (except duties on tonnage), shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of such merchandise, or the person paying such fees, charges, and exactions other than duties, shall, within ten days after but not before such ascertainment and liquidation of duties, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, or within ten days after the payment of such fees, charges, and exactions, if dissatisfied with such decision, give notice in writing to the collector, setting forth therein distinctly and specifically, and in respect to each entry or payment the reasons for his objections thereto, with a sample of the articles or merchandise, where the same are of a kind that a sample can be conveniently attached to and accompany said notice, and where the character or quality of the articles or merchandise is in question, attached to or accompanying said notice, certified or authenticated by the appraiser or appraising officer as being a part of the particular importation as to which the protest is made; and if the merchandise is entered for consumption shall pay the full amount of the duties and charges ascertained to be due thereon, together with the sum of $2 with each notice, to be known as a protest fee, which fee shall be refunded by the collector to said owner, importer, consignee, or agent, only in case a refund of the duties or other exactions as claimed by him shall be made in pursuance of law. Upon such notice and payment the collector shall transmit the invoice and all the papers, samples of the merchandise, and exhibits connected therewith, to the board of three general appraisers, which shall be on duty at the port of New York, or to a board of three general appraisers who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for such duty at that port or at any other port, which board shall examine and decide the case thus submitted, and their decision, or that of a majority of them, shall be final and conclusive upon all persons interested therein, and the record shall be transmitted to the proper collector or person acting as such, who shall liquidate the entry accordingly, except in cases where an application shall be filed in the circuit court of appeals for a review of the decision of the board upon any questions of law within the time and in the manner provided for in section 15 of this act. Notice of at least twenty days of the time set for hearings held under the provisions of this section shall be given by mail in writing, directed to the importer, his authorized agent, or attorney, at his place of business or residence: Provided, That at any time within thirty days after any decision is made by a board, such decision may be vacated and set aside by the board making it, on application in writing accompanied by satisfactory showing by the party interested that such notice was never given or received.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the clause beginning in line 23, page 22, which reads as follows:

And, if the merchandise is entered for consumption, shall pay the full amount of the duties and charges ascertained to be due thereon, together with the sum of $2 with each notice, to be known as a protest fee, etc.

I suppose that is intended to be the fee in each protest; but would it not be better to make the fee a less sum, say $1, and fix that as the fee for each assignment in the protest, so that absolute particularity, the very thing that the protest rests upon, should be stated? Would not that be better than the present method, where perhaps one hundred causes of protest will be assigned in one printed blank; for it is the custom of the brokers to group together every possible objection that occurs to them in the protest, so that there is no directing of the attention to the special thing that is relied upon. Under the present system, the broker gathers together in his protest all these grounds, hoping that, through some future decision, he may gain an advantage. It is, of course, entirely proper that he should have the right to protest; but it is also proper to require him to specify the very ground of his protest. In the matter of a demurrer to a pleading the court requires particularity; requires the very difficulty that is complained of to be pointed out; but that is not required in these protests, and often they are filed when there is no purpose at all of proceeding at present in the case, the intent simply being to await the chance of obtaining some advantage. I think that if the gentleman in charge of the bill would modify this provision so as to fix some small fee, and to impose that fee upon every assignment in the protest, the effect would be that nothing would be put in the protest but that upon which the man relied.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the difficulty with my friend's suggestion would be that thereafter the notice of protest would contain but one assignment, and all the reasons alleged for the reversal of the decision of the appraisers would be stated in that one assignment, so that the result would be the payment of a fee of but $1 instead of $2. It would be very easy to make one assignment setting forth all the reasons.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think not. It seems to me that it could be so arranged that for each particular objection there should be a fee, and that the effect would be to bring these protests down to the very matter that was relied upon, instead of permitting the filing of protests covering—as they sometimes do now, I think I am safe in saying—one or two hundred alleged causes.

Mr. DALZELL. Would not the proper remedy for the difficulty which the gentleman points out be a provision of law as to the form of protest, making it incumbent on the protestant to put in his protest simply those things on which he relied?

Mr. HEPBURN. You do that now. That is the old law, and yet under that law this abuse has grown up, and I am sure it has cost the Government a great many hundred thousand dollars. Take, for instance, the steel-broom cases, or the coverings case, the one costing $10,000,000 and the other more than $3,000,000. Take the hat-trimmings case, which will cost probably $34,000,000 or more. If there had been a particular protest required by law, containing nothing more than what was relied upon in that particular case, those protests would not have been filed, and there would have been no standing for those cases in court. But under the present system men just lay these protests up, so to speak, for future use.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the opinion of the Board of Appraisers was that the fee of $2 provided in the bill would sufficiently discourage the practice of piling up these notices, and the Department confirmed that opinion. This fee was also suggested by the Fairchild commission; they thought this fee would be ample to guard against the abuse of the piling up of these protests.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, right on that point I may say that the committee thought at first that they would make the protest fee larger, but in view of the objections that were raised to any protest fee it was thought that the end could be accomplished by making the fee a small one, only $2, and even against that more protests came up from importers than against any other feature of this bill. I think 100 importers in one city have protested against even this two-dollar fee, and if the fee should be made $1 for each assignment, which would probably make the protest fees in some cases as high as $50, I am sure that we should have the country in an uproar. I believe that the practical end in view can be attained by the small fee proposed; at least that is the judgment of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who has charge of customs matters, and it is also the judgment of the Board of Appraisers.

Their idea is that this is the mean amount which may be fixed to secure the results which they hope from any fee. As the gentleman from Iowa says, it is true that there are piled up at the custom-house and in the Treasury Department thousands of protests made upon mere speculation, in the hope that somebody will raise a case at some time, that that particular duty will be declared illegal, and that then they will come in and demand a refund from the Treasury. That is true, and it is because of that fact that the committee have reported any protest fee, and yet there is great objection among the importers to even the fee fixed in this bill; more objection, as I have already said, than there is to any other feature of the bill. The committee thought, therefore, that it might be wiser to go no further at this time than they do go in the bill. Perhaps by and by it may be desirable to go further, even to the extent proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, but I think that on the whole, in view of the facts that the Board of Appraisers and the Treasury Department concur in recommending a two-dollar fee for a simple protest, it is best for the present to leave this matter where the bill as reported by the committee leaves it.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That if the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of any imported merchandise, or the collector, or the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the Board of General Appraisers as hereinbefore provided, as to the construction of the law respecting the classification of such merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classification, they, or either of them, may, within thirty days next after such decision, and not afterwards, apply to the circuit court of appeals of the United States within the district in which the matter arises for a review of the questions of law only involved in such decision. Such application shall be made by filing in the office of the clerk of said circuit court of appeals a concise statement of the errors of law complained of, and a copy of such statement shall be served on the collector, or on the importer, owner, consignee, or agent, as the case may be. Thereupon said circuit court of appeals, or any judge thereof, shall order the Board of General Appraisers to return to said circuit court of appeals the record, which shall consist of the invoice and the papers and exhibits connected therewith, originally transmitted by the collector to the said Board, together with their findings of facts in the case and with their decision thereon. The Board of General Appraisers shall not return to said circuit court of appeals any of the evidence taken by or before them in the case. The findings of fact returned as aforesaid shall be conclusive as to all questions of fact arising in the case upon all parties and upon said circuit court of appeals; but said circuit court of appeals, if it deems the findings of facts returned by the Board of General Appraisers insufficient to enable the said court to determine the correctness of the decision of the said Board of General Appraisers upon the questions of law involved in respect to classification and rate of duty, may submit such question or questions as it deems advisable to said Board of General Appraisers and require a further finding or findings of fact thereon; and the said Board of General Appraisers shall forthwith, on receiving an order from the said court for further findings of fact on questions submitted to them by the said court, as hereinbefore provided, proceed to determine such questions and return their findings of fact thereon to the said circuit court of appeals. The aforesaid returns shall constitute the record and case upon which said circuit court of appeals shall give priority to and proceed to hear and determine the questions of law only involved in such decision of the said Board of General Appraisers respecting the classification of such merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classification. The decision of said court shall be final, and the proper collector or person acting as such shall liquidate the entry accordingly: Provided, however, That in such cases the said circuit courts of appeals shall have the same power to certify questions of law to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the said Supreme Court of the United States shall have the same powers to take control of such cases by certiorari or otherwise, after they have been brought into the said circuit courts of appeals, that are now conferred by law upon said courts, or any of them, in respect to subjects within the appellate jurisdiction of said circuit courts of appeals. All final judgments, when in favor of the importer, shall be satisfied and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury from the permanent indefinite appropriation provided for in section 24 of this act. For the purposes of this act the circuit courts of appeals of the United States shall have jurisdiction and authority to order and adjudicate in the cases so presented, and shall be deemed always open, and said courts, respectively, may establish and from time to time alter rules and regulations, not inconsistent herewith, for the procedure in such cases as they shall deem proper.

Mr. PAYNE. There are one or two verbal amendments which I desire to submit for the purpose of correcting the text of the bill. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22, page 24, strike out "facts" and insert "fact"; strike out also the word "with" where it occurs the second time in the same line; so that the clause will read:

"Together with their findings of fact in the case and their decision thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. I move further to amend by striking out, in line 4, page 25, the word "facts" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fact."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, there are three amendments I desire to submit; but as they all relate to a single matter, I propose to offer them together that they may be voted upon as one proposition, thereby presenting the question intelligibly, and saving time and trouble. One amendment is to insert after the word "law," in line 5 of this section, the words "and facts"; so as to read, "the construction of the law and facts." I desire further to amend by striking out the word "only," in line 11, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and facts."

Mr. WALSH. I have prepared an amendment covering exactly the same ground as the amendment which the gentleman from Tennessee suggests.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has the gentleman a substitute for this portion of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. I withdraw my amendment and yield to my friend, as his amendment brings up, I understand, the same question which I desired to submit.

Mr. WALSH. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 11, section 15, the words "only involved in such decision" and insert "and fact; but on such review no evidence can be considered which was not before the board or appraiser appealed from; and all evidence taken before said board or appraiser whose decision is appealed from shall be considered by the circuit court of appeals."

Strike out "not," in line 23; so as to make the clause read: "The board of appraisers shall return to said circuit court of appeals any of the evidence taken by or before them in the case."

Strike out all after the word "case," in line 25, page 24, down to and including the word "appeals," in line 3, page 25, the words struck out being as follows: "The findings of fact returned as aforesaid shall be conclusive as to all questions of fact arising in the case upon all parties and upon said circuit court of appeals."

Mr. WALSH. My amendment would make the portion of the section to which it applies read as follows:

May within thirty days next after such decision, and not afterwards, apply to the circuit court of appeals of the United States, within the district in which the matter arises, for a review of the questions of law and fact; but on such review no evidence can be considered which was not before the board or appraiser appealed from and all evidence taken before said board or appraiser whose decision is appealed from shall be considered by the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment will obviate one of the objections made by my colleague from New York that the circuit court of appeals could not obtain the same evidence which the appraisers could obtain. This substitute legalizes all evidence taken before the Board of Appraisers and gives the court acting on the appeal the power to consider any such evidence.

Mr. HOPKINS. Why would the gentleman carry these matters into the circuit court of appeals?

Mr. WALSH. I understand that is the language of the statute.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman does not aim simply to give the parties additional time?

Mr. WALSH. I have no disposition to change the place now provided by law for the hearing of appeals.

Mr. HOPKINS. But your amendment contemplates that after the decision of the appraisers the parties may go into court and hold up these matters for five or ten years.

Mr. WALSH. No, sir. These questions are not held up now for five or ten years. Yet there is an appeal to-day to the Board of General Appraisers and an appeal from that Board to the courts.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is one of the very things we are trying to remedy.

Mr. DINGLEY. There are cases of this kind that have been pending in court now for more than ten years.

Mr. WALSH. Well, they must either be very important cases or else there is nobody to look after them.

Mr. HOPKINS. Among the evils which we desire to cure are the delays which have resulted in the past from allowing parties to carry these appeals into the courts.

Mr. WALSH. Allow me to say that when an appraisement is made, the most important question in connection with that appraisement is whether as a matter of fact it is right or wrong. The question is entirely one of valuation, and that may be, of course, the most material thing upon which an appeal is desired.

Mr. HOPKINS. But your amendment allows an appeal not only on the law, but the facts.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. And the amendment would allow these cases to be taken before a judge and jury who know nothing about such questions, but who would undertake to revise the judgment of these experts on questions of fact. In one sense it is an absurdity, as you will readily see, for you take it into a forum where they are entirely unacquainted with the facts and the expert knowledge on which the decision was rendered.

Mr. WALSH. Now, let us see just how absurd it is. What is the course in our State courts? In all of our courts at common law you try questions of the sanity or insanity of people, for instance, before a jury; and what is the procedure in this and kindred cases?

Mr. DALZELL. But, if the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, we do not try questions of the assessment of property, where taxation is to be imposed, before a jury.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not.

Mr. DALZELL. And does not the gentleman recognize also that the determination of the appraisers on questions of fact is frequently based on testimony which would not be competent in any court of justice at all? Does not the gentleman recognize further the fact that some of the testimony on which the decision of the appraisers is rendered is incapable of being introduced in any court of justice, because it is testimony that results from personal knowledge, personal experience and observation and expert information of the person or persons who make the deposition?

I wish to say to the gentleman, if he will permit me, that this is a matter, of course, about which there is no partisanship whatever. It is merely a question of the most perfect administration of our customs law. It is a matter about which those persons—able men who have been engaged in the administration of the law for years—all agree. In this case Secretary Fairchild, who was at the head of the Department for four years; the present Secretary, who has been three years at its head, and an old collector of the port, of long experience, all of them on the Fairchild board, agree in this recommendation. There is not a single dissentient voice. The appraisers all agree to this proposition, and, so far as I know of matters before the committee, as to this proposition no protest has been made from any quarter whatever. If there has been any such I have neither seen nor heard of it. I submit, then, that the judgment of this board and of men of this class is worth very much more in matters of this kind than any theories we can advance in the House.

Mr. WALSH. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that the judgment of experts is valuable in all cases in which their testimony is taken as experts. I am also willing to admit that the gentlemen appointed in the Departments here, who have been engaged in this business for many years, are experts in their line of duty and that their opinion is valuable on a question of this character.

But at the same time I submit that overvaluation is sometimes made by the appraisers themselves at ports in the United States as well as elsewhere; and experience has demonstrated that their overvaluations, in this country at least, have been reversed by the highest tribunal in the land. But an importer who has been unjustly treated by the appraisers heretofore has had a chance to have their judgment reviewed by competent tribunals on his own presentation of his case. That is denied under the pending bill, and that is the objection I make to it. He can not go to this Board and under the forms of law secure from them a subpœna for the witnesses he may require in order to prove his side of the case. The appraisers have a right to shut out all of the testimony that may be produced in his behalf under the law, and the only tribunal before which he can have a review of his case, if injustice has been done to him, is the appellate court. There he can get his subpœna, present his witnesses, and submit the evidence in his case.

To obviate the objection of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that you can not use the evidence taken before the appraisers in a court, the amendment that I have offered, if adopted, expressly legalizes any evidence the appraisers may use in this connection. If, for instance, it be a letter from a foreign consul, the amendment legalizes it, and makes it available for use under the circumstances mentioned, and it can be used in the court of appeals just as if it was the evidence of a sworn witness before the court.

Mr. DALZELL. How would you get the expert knowledge of the parties before the court on that sort of a record?

Mr. WALSH. Can you not take the findings of their testimony as used before the appraisers? Such depositions are used in many other cases, as I started to say a few moments ago, in the State courts at common law.

Mr. DALZELL. But it would be useless to have that testimony over again before the court unless you were able to present the expert knowledge of the witness, which would not be available for examination and cross-examination before the court.

Mr. HOPKINS. The courts would be helpless under the operation of such an amendment as this if it should be adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Let us see how helpless they would be——

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, he will see the absurdity it would involve, for this reason: If you take their findings, the findings of the Board of Appraisers, as a matter of fact, how are you to determine what weight the court would give to such testimony, or how would you compare it with other evidence offered? How would you compare it with the evidence of some other party? The trouble is that the adoption of such amendment would involve you in a maze of difficulties.

Mr. WALSH. But we get rid of a maze of other things, and I think we do substantial justice.

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all. The importers get their goods; they get them under such conditions, of course, as the United States sees proper under its revenue laws to impose. Now, we say, on the question of valuation, that they shall be concluded by the findings of the appraisers upon any question of law raised.

Mr. WALSH. What question of law can arise, except a question of classification?

Mr. DINGLEY. The construction of conflicting provisions of statutes.

Mr. WALSH. That is not a matter for the appraisers.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is a question of law which goes to the court.

Mr. WALSH. I know, but the appraisers rarely have anything to do with that.

Mr. DINGLEY. They decide it in the first instance, and on appeal it goes to the court.

Mr. HOPKINS. And appeals on the facts should not go to the courts.

Mr. WALSH. I can not imagine any other case where a question of law would arise. Every appeal is on a question of fact and every reversal is on a question of fact. It seems to me that appeals should be allowed on questions of fact.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is because of those things that the Secretary has recommended that appeals on the facts be done away with.

The amendment of Mr. WALSH was rejected.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. That said chapter 407 of the Statutes at Large is further amended by adding the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to expend, from the appropriation for collecting the revenue from customs, a sufficient sum, not to exceed $45,000, to provide for the purchase of the necessary land, and for the construction and equipment of sampling works thereon, or for the leasing of suitable buildings and equipment for the sampling and assaying of imported silver ores and other ores containg lead at the ports of Elpaso, Tex., Northport, Wash., and Bonners Ferry, Idaho, and at such other ports as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the interests of the revenue demand; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in case of importation of said ores at ports at which no facilities as above are provided, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to send a portion thereof to any port having said facilities, at which port said portion may be sampled and assayed. The collector at the port of importation shall thereupon liquidate the entry upon said assay."

Mr. PAYNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of section 2, line 12, page 28, the following words:

"In no instance, however, shall a less portion than one-fifth of any importation of ores be sampled and assayed."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this amendment is that in order to prevent fraud it seems to be necessary that at least one-fifth of such ores should be sampled and assayed. The duty depending upon the metal of chief value in the ore, unless at least one-fifth is assayed it opens the door for fraud or for mistake against the Treasury of the United States. This amendment is recommended by the Treasury Department and by the customs officers.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask that the amendment offered by my colleague on the committee be reported again. I was unable to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk, without objection, will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. PAYNE. If I may be permitted, I should like to withdraw the amendment which I have just submitted, and to substitute another which is in a little better form and accomplishes just the same result.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws the amendment and offers the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 8 of page 28, the words "under such regulations as he may prescribe" and add, after the word "assay," in line 12, on page 28, the following:

"In no instance, however, shall a less portion than one-fifth of any importation of ores be sampled and assayed."

Mr. McMILLIN. Has the gentleman any information as to what portion is now assayed?

Mr. PAYNE. I understand it is the usual practice now to assay one-fifth. This amendment is recommended by the Treasury Department, and also by the customs officials who are accustomed to assay and sample these ores.

The original bill, from which this amendment is taken, provided that one-fifth should be sampled and assayed; and the Committee on Ways and Means, acting on a suggestion from a gentleman who wrote to the committee, which suggestion seemed to be reasonable, struck out the words which I offer to substitute now. Afterwards they found on examination they had made a mistake and that it would be unsafe to provide that there should be less than one-fifth sampled and assayed. We supposed when we had put in the language "under regulations prescribed by the Treasury Department" that we had guarded against any chance for fraud; but the Treasury Department did not want that language left in the law. They wanted an absolute requirement that should be binding upon all collectors and all officials to sample at least one-fifth.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suppose it is a matter that is now controlled by regulation and direction of the Department, is it not?

Mr. PAYNE. It would be under the bill as printed without this amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is done in that way now, as a matter of fact, is it not?

Mr. PAYNE. I am inclined to think that it is now under the direction of the Department.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no particular anxiety about the matter, but it struck me——

Mr. PAYNE. The act of 1894 provides "in such quantities as are in accordance with commercial usage," or something to that effect, and I understand commercial usage is that at least one-fifth shall be sampled and assayed. This simply makes it absolute, and is in accordance with the suggestion of the Treasury Department.

Mr. McMILLIN. I shall offer no amendment and shall accept the gentleman's judgment in the matter, but it struck me it was one of those things that we could very properly leave to the wise discretion of the administrative department of the Government, and that we would accomplish all that is necessary by doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, we passed over section 4, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will return to the consideration of section 4.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 4 by inserting, after the word "duty," in line 6 in the bill that I have, the words:

Provided, That the penalties named in said bond shall be held as prima facie evidence of the amount of damages in case of suit being brought on such bonds for failure to produce such duly certified invoice.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I was unable to catch the amendment or the page.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 10, after the word "duty," insert:
Provided, That the penalties named in said bond shall be held as prima facie evidence of the amount of damages in case of suit being brought on such bonds for failure to produce such duly certified invoice.

Mr. McMILLIN. I see that I have the wrong copy of the bill; and I will make the point of order on that until I can see the purport of the amendment.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa that which I will read.

Strike out after the word "duty," in the same line 10, and insert the following:

Which sums shall, where there is a breach of the bond, be respectively treated as liquidated damages in favor of the Government, which damages may be reduced by proof introduced by the party whose duty it is to produce such certified invoice.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "duty," in line 10, on page 6, insert the following:
"Which sums shall, where there is a breach of the bond, be respectively treated as liquidated damages in favor of the Government, which damages may be reduced by proof introduced by the party whose duty it is to produce such certified invoice."

Mr. NORTHWAY. The effect of this——

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point of order that this section has been passed.

Mr. NORTHWAY. It was reserved.

Mr. McMILLIN. Oh; it was reserved at the time? I did not know that.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I do not know but that each amendment would reach the same result. The effect of the amendment I have offered would be, if there was a breach of the bond and suit was brought upon it, all they would have to do would be to aver the breach of the bond, the amount of the damages, which would be stated as liquidated, and that would allow the defendant to introduce his proof; and if he were able to produce the certified invoice and show it that would reduce the damages, otherwise the Government would recover the amount of liquidated damages. I do not know but what the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa would be the same.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not like the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio. It seems to me contradictory in terms. Liquidated damages can not be reduced by proof. To say that they are liquidated and then in the same breath provide that they could be reduced by proof is a contradiction in terms, it seems to me. The result desired is better obtained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman forgets that the liquidated damages may be provided for in the contract.

Mr. PAYNE. You limit the amount of damages, and under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa the penalties in the bond are held as prima facie evidence of the amount.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Under my amendment the amount is fixed as liquidated damages, and that is the damage for the breach of the bond.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, in the same breath the gentleman says they are liquidated damages and that they shall be reduced by proof. I think it is a great deal better to say that the amount of the penalty shall be prima facie evidence of the damages.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is now five minutes after 5 o'clock, and a right interesting discussion has just been broached between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from New York that he make a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that this is the last amendment to this bill, and I think we are just about to dispose of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is by no means certain of that.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I may have six amendments to offer.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, we have simply recurred to this place for the purpose of this amendment. The section was passed over for this purpose, and I do not think you will have an opportunity to offer six amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa; and, without objection, the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio will be again reported.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to substitute for the amendment offered a while ago the one I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Iowa to substitute for the original amendment one which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 10, page 6, by inserting after the word "duty," the following:
"Provided, That the amount of the penalty in such bond shall be prima facia evidence of the amount of damages to be assessed thereunder in any judgment to be rendered thereon in favor of the United States in any suit brought on such bond."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this amendment will be considered as substituted for the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I withdraw my amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is on the amendment just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to. The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 7250) to amend "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, and had instructed him to report the same with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] desires to have the report withdrawn which was filed by mistake with bill No. 506 and to have a proper report substituted for it.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PEFFER. I present the petition of Rev. B. F. Foard and 153 other citizens of Kingman, Kans., praying for the adoption of what is commonly known as the Christian amendment to the preamble of the Constitution of the United States. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER. I have here a petition to which I again wish to call the attention of the Committee on Finance through its chairman, the venerable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. The petition contains something over 10,000 names of citizens of the State of Kansas scattered over different portions of the State. Much the larger proportion of the signers are qualified voters of the State. Their petition is in this form:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, residents of the State of Kansas, do most earnestly petition your honorable body to so amend the internal-revenue laws of the United States as to prohibit the issuance of permits to sell intoxicants in the State of Kansas except to those who hold a permit issued by virtue of the laws of the State of Kansas. And your petitioners will ever pray.

These people understand very well what they are petitioning for, yet the wording of their petition is more or less unfortunate. What they really want to do, Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will the venerable Senator from Kansas state the purport of the petition?

Mr. PEFFER. In just a moment I am going to do so.

Mr. PLATT. How about the "venerable"?

Mr. PEFFER. I am the most venerable of the Kansas Senators. I have been tarrying some time at Jericho.

The bill is now before the Committee on Finance. It is entitled "A bill to prohibit the collection of special liquor taxes from persons other than those who are duly authorized by State laws to traffic in intoxicating liquors." There is a bill of similar character pending in the House of Representatives. It is for the enactment of some such legislation as is proposed in the bill that the people of our State are petitioning.

I might as well say in this connection I have discovered that a number of people in different portions of the country misunderstand or misapprehend the scope of this proposed legislation. It is not to be confined to States where prohibitory liquor laws are in force, but to be extended to all States where there are any laws restricting the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The object of the legislation is simply to restrain it to the persons who are authorized by the laws of the several States to engage in that kind of traffic; in other words, to limit it to the State laws.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Goldendale, Wash., praying that an appropriation be made to provide for the opening of the locks of the Columbia River to navigation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

road bridge across the Detroit River at Detroit, Mich.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2482) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to loan two condemned cannon to the Confederate Home of Missouri, located at Higginsville, Lafayette County, Mo., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 250) for the relief of W. H. L. Pepperell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1168) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin and the United States Regulation Firearms Company, respectively, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

FAST-MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report back to the Senate an amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, intended to be proposed as an amendment to the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department. The provisions of the amendment offered are that there shall be appropriated for necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., $81,700. The committee report back the amendment without recommendation, with the request that they be discharged from its further consideration, and the suggestion that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

In this connection, the committee found itself very much embarrassed. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas is apparently and undoubtedly a very wise amendment and should be incorporated into the provisions of our statutes. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, however, have no jurisdiction in this matter, nor have they any information or sources of information which would lead them to report intelligently upon an amendment of so important a character and concerning which the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads ought naturally to be informed. As a matter of fact, however, the amendment should go to the Committee on Appropriations, in which alone is deposited the information as to the different post routes. Before we could report intelligently upon the question it would be important for us to know what postal facilities exist in that section of the West, what special trains are being run to carry the mail out of Chicago, what subsidies are being granted to other lines, and how prompt, efficient, and frequent the service is. The Senate might be of the impression that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have this information. We have it not. While this is an important matter looking to the transportation of the mails, and while it is apparently entirely competent and proper for the Senator from Kansas to refer it to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, it is necessary for us to report it back and ask its reference to the Committee on Appropriations, because we have not the facilities to report intelligently upon such a measure.

It has grown to be the practice in the Senate that whoever wants an amendment placed upon an appropriation bill shall refer it to some committee, and upon a favorable report from that committee the amendment is not subject to a point of order. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads would, with the superficial information it has been able to acquire, be very glad to see this amendment passed, but we can not report amendments of this kind so long as the general information as to the carriage and transportation of the mails, the general questions as to what service should be facilitated, as to what communities should be favored, as to how mail should be hastened, is not intrusted to the committee. Until that information is at hand it is utterly impossible for us to report on these amendments other than as we are compelled to report to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. LODGE. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration. I will state that I am directed so to do by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. I submit the resolution in the absence of the chairman, not as a report, but I offer it as a resolution for present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and is hereby, empowered to fully investigate and report upon the administration of the civil-service law in the Government Printing Office as affecting the separation from service of the 35 ex-employees referred to in the printed correspondence furnished the Senate under Senate resolution of January 29, 1896.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HILL. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the resolution will go over under the rule.

PUNISHMENT OF INDIANS FOR RAPE.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to consider whether the penalty prescribed for Indians who commit the offense named in section 5345 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and the act of March 3, 1885, section 9, ought to be made less severe, and report by bill or otherwise.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MEIKLEJOHN, and Mr. LITTLE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 79) directing the Secretary of War to furnish an estimate for deepening the channel from Hampton Roads to the navy-yard at Norfolk, Va., and also for improving the Western Branch of the Elizabeth River.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7250) to amend "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues," approved June 10, 1890; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], coming over from a previous day, proposing to direct the Committee on the District of Columbia to obtain from the Washington Gas Light Company a statement of its affairs.

Mr. CALL. Let the resolution go over without losing its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over.

The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], coming over from a previous day, proposing to instruct the Committee on Foreign Relations to submit to the Senate a report relative to the war in Cuba.

Mr. ELKINS. As the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] desires to speak this morning, I ask that the resolution may go over for to-day without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to call up from the table the joint resolution that went over yesterday for one day relating to the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, and to ask unanimous consent that it be considered at this time. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that if there shall be debate on the measure I shall not press it unduly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to open for public entry, under all the land laws of the United States, all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, excepting from this order, however, any agricultural lands heretofore allotted or selected for allotment to said Uncompahgre Indians.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GORDON. I do not wish to interrupt the orderly proceeding, but may I ask the Senator from Utah exactly what the proposition is?

Mr. CANNON. It is a joint resolution which aims to compel the Secretary of the Interior, if law can compel him to do so, to comply with the provisions of the statutes of the United States which require that upon the allotment or selection of lands by the Indians in the Uncompahgre Reservation all the remainder of that vast domain of more than 2,000,000 acres shall be thrown open to public entry. A statute of the United States already on the books provides the process by which this shall be done. It has not been done, and the joint resolution is intended as a mandate to the Secretary of the Interior to execute the law.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I am not prepared to discuss that proposition this morning. However, I think I ought to say to the Senate, for certainly some one ought to say it, that the Secretary of the Interior, through the agencies furnished him by the Government, has ascertained that there is vast mineral wealth of a particular character in that Territory; that there is in it asphalt to a very large amount. The Secretary has called the attention of Congress to that fact and requested that Congress shall take action upon it. The whole purpose of the Secretary of the Interior is to protect the Government against the rapacious efforts of people who want to control this entire deposit, and it must commend itself to all. His effort is to get the Congress to consider thoroughly, before we take action upon the opening of that territory, the fact that there are vast deposits of asphalt there. I have conferred with him freely on the subject. His idea is that the Government of the United States ought to receive some benefit from it either through royalty or sale, or that the people ought to get the benefit of a reduced price of this material, which is used in nearly all the cities of the Union, by having some sort of competition in its production instead of having it go into the hands of one great corporation. I simply make this suggestion to the Senate. It is a matter of moment, and I think it ought to be looked into.

As to the assault made upon the Secretary of the Interior for withholding his action upon this matter until Congress could be informed of the new developments that have been made, we certainly have precedents in the past.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly,

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator whether he or any other Senator has introduced a bill to repeal the existing law, or whether any bill has been introduced for that purpose in the other House? I understand the Senator to admit that the present law for opening the reservation to settlement is peremptory. The Secretary of the Interior disobeys that law. He speaks of it to Congress in his report. Is that sufficient, I ask the Senator? Should not the Secretary go on and obey the law and open the reservation, or should not the Senator, or some Senator who justifies the Secretary of the Interior, introduce a bill to repeal the provision requiring the reservation to be opened to public settlement?

Mr. GORDON. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Georgia allow the joint resolution to be read once more before he proceeds?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. GORDON. I understand the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] wishes to go on with his speech. I suggest, therefore, that this matter, which is one of great importance, shall go over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the joint resolution will go over.

Mr. BROWN. Let it go over without prejudice, so that it can be taken up to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. VEST. Is the joint resolution to go over until to-morrow?

Mr. CANNON. That is, to come up as the unfinished business to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it will require a motion to bring it before the Senate again.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may come up as a special order to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. I must object to anything being interposed to take the place of the Cuban resolutions now pending before the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the Senator from Ohio not to object to my request. If anything of more importance is brought before the Senate we will yield, but this is a question of paramount interest and it will not take long to dispose of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We will wait and see to-morrow. I think the Cuban resolutions which are pending ought to be disposed of, and I feel compelled to object.

Mr. CANNON. I will state to the Senator that I will yield in case any matter of more importance is presented.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I interrupt the Senator from Utah for a moment? We have before us the Du Pont election case and the Cuban resolutions. They are both of them matters which come regularly and daily before the Senate, and which seem, both of them, in a fair way to settle themselves. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that it is not yet 2 o'clock. All other business ought not to give way because those two matters are before the Senate. I know nothing as to this measure except that I know something of the oppression that the Western States and Territories suffer because of the maladministration of Indian affairs. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that he can move to take the joint resolution up, and that it is very possible, although perhaps not probable, that the Senate may conclude that this matter is entitled to a few minutes at least during the interim of the Cuban resolutions and the seating of Mr. Du Pont, and agree to the motion to take up a measure that affects 2,000,000 acres of land in that promising State. I suggest to the Senator from Utah to move to take it up. At least we can have a vote upon the question.

Mr. BERRY. When was the joint resolution introduced?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was introduced yesterday.

Mr. GORDON. As I understand the rules, the joint resolution can not come up if there be objection to it; and I object to its consideration this morning.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Why not, if I may ask?

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Utah can move to take it up, notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks a motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution will be in order.

Mr. WOLCOTT (to Mr. CANNON). Make the motion.

Mr. PLATT. Does one objection carry over a resolution which was introduced yesterday and has come up in the regular order of business this morning?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is a joint resolution. The Chair thinks that an objection would prevent its consideration and require a motion. The Senator from Utah asked unanimous consent for its present consideration. Objection being interposed, the Chair will entertain a motion to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. The objection, then, is to its third reading. It will come up to-morrow for its third reading.

Mr. PASCO. The joint resolution has been read only once, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been read twice.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the joint resolution be taken up for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I do not desire to so far intrude upon the courtesy of the Senator from Nebraska as to make this a protracted discussion, and therefore I will state very briefly the points of fact which lie behind and support the joint resolution.

By the appropriation act of 1894, there was granted a fund of $16,000 for the purpose of paying the expense of a commission to treat with the Uncompahgre Utes for the relinquishment of all their land not selected for agricultural purposes and for treatment with the Uintah Utes on the adjoining reservation for the purpose of obtaining some concessions from them in the same direction.

Mr. President, at that time, and for years previously, it had been as well known to the people of the United States that a vast deposit of asphaltum existed there as it is now suddenly known to the Secretary of the Interior. Had he been anywhere nearly so well informed concerning a question of importance within the domain and jurisdiction of the Department over which he presides as every man, woman, and child who can read who lives west of the Mississippi was informed, it would not have been necessary for him to suspend the operation of the law while he should send some special agents there to make investigations. Year after year these asphaltum beds have been worked, and the products have been carried with great toil and labor to the railroad, a distance of 70 miles, and have been shipped from Utah to St. Louis and other points where they are consumed.

The commission went there, as I said the other day, at the beginning of winter to make its examinations. It has labored until within a few days past, under written, and I fear under special oral instructions from the Secretary of the Interior. It is now on furlough. Practically all that the commission can do concerning the Uncompahgre Reservation has been done. The gentlemen constituting that body have no doubt discharged their duty as they were instructed to discharge it, but it has seemed from the beginning that the Secretary of the Interior never intended that the Uncompahgre Reservation should be thrown open under the law. If there had been a deep purpose to put into the possession of some monopoly in the United States these vast deposits of mineral wealth, the Secretary could not have proceeded in a more logical and determined manner to secure that result than he has proceeded.

Mr. President, I say if there had been selected by the Department of the Interior at the time of the passage of this act three men who were informed with regard to the situation there, and who were under instructions to execute the law, not two months and not $2,000 would have been required for all the work prescribed by the law. Nearly the entire sum of $16,000 has been practically expended, and we are not, so far as the Interior Department is concerned, one step nearer to the consummation of the purpose prescribed by law; and the Secretary is before the Committee on Appropriations by communication asking for some allowances for the further prosecution of this and similar purposes.

Everything which Congress needs to know is now before this body in official communications from the Indian Office and the Secretary of the Interior. The lands to be allotted to the Indians are indicated; every portion of that great reservation which is susceptible of agricultural cultivation is designated in the official report. It is therefore merely to avoid the thrashing over perpetually of old chaff by Congress that I have taken this method of bringing the matter to the attention of this body in the hope that the joint resolution may pass and preserve us from longer and costlier delay. The method of the Interior Department on this question is not how to do it, but how not to do it. That seems to have been the purpose continuously with regard to Western questions.

I say, in conclusion, Mr. President, that the official communications furnish all the evidence which is necessary to support this resolution; every question which can properly arise under it has been answered in the past. I think that Congress can not do more fairly by the public time, which is valuable, and by the public Treasury, which should be protected, than to pass this joint resolution now, without going further back in order to make greater delay and greater expense.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the effect of this joint resolution is merely to require the Secretary of the Interior to carry out existing law, and that the effect will be not to give away these lands, which may have minerals upon them, but to give them where they belong, to the public, and when they become public lands there is thrown around them the safeguards of the law. We are supposed to have sufficient and adequate laws applicable to the public domain. We provide as to coal lands that if they are so near a railroad so much shall be paid for them; if they are more remote from a railroad so much less shall be paid. As to mineral lands, we provide the form of entry, the form of preemption; we provide the work that must be annually done; we provide as to how these different deposits shall be stated and placed on the maps; we provide how much shall be paid for them, and we grant patents for them only after the expenditure of $500 of work upon a claim. The effect of the opening of these claims is to bring all this vast wealth, if it exists, to the public. Nobody is benefited by it but the public and the prospectors whom the law encourages to go upon the public domain.

I apprehend, Mr. President, that there would be no objection to this resolution if it were fully understood that what is being done in the Department of the Interior is not for the purpose of conserving the public interest and holding these deposits, be they valuable or worthless, from the public or from public entry, but it is that a law providing for the allotment of lands to the Indians shall not be so complied with as to prevent the Secretary of the Interior from continuing those lands in Utah which ought to be public lands from being opened to public entry and public occupation.

It is not, Mr. President, as if there were a scheme to give somebody something out of the public domain. It is to open the land to the public, where the prospectors, whom the law encourages to go upon the public domain, may give to the public and to the citizens of our country the fruits of their intelligence, so that this land may become valuable and help to contribute to the revenues of our country.

Mr. HOAR. I wanted to ask the Senator from Colorado a question before he sat down. He said that this joint resolution was simply an order to the Secretary of the Interior to obey the law. How does the resolution, then, change the law, if it merely orders the Secretary to do what the law has already ordered him to do?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I can say to the Senator from Massachusetts that as to this matter, for intimate knowledge of which I rely largely upon the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON], the effect of the joint resolution is to request the Secretary of the Interior to carry out existing law. It is true, as the question of the Senator from Massachusetts would suggest, that it would seem folly to call upon an official of the Government to do his duty; but it so happens, Mr. President, that again and again at each session of Congress it is necessary to introduce resolutions to compel the performance of his public functions by some officer of the Government. For instance, wisely or unwisely, in the matter of patents to lands to the Pacific railway companies the Secretary of the Interior has deemed it to be wise, in what he considers the public interest, to withhold the granting of patents; and resolutions are now pending before the Senate calling upon the Secretary of the Interior to perform his duty, to issue patents for those lands, and to carry out the provisions of the law with which he is intrusted.

It is for these reasons, Mr. President, and to bring to the Secretary the moral pressure of a resolution of Congress, that this resolution has been introduced, in the hope that when it is passed the Secretary of the Interior will not conceive himself to be superior to the law.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, there was a time in the history of this country when a Cabinet officer who deliberately violated a statute or an instruction given him by Congress would have been brought to the bar of this Senate because he had trampled upon the legislative department of the Government and violated his oath of office.

Mr. President, I happen to know all the facts in regard to this matter. I will state very frankly why I happen to know them. Some years ago a company was organized in the city of St. Louis for the purpose of opening up certain gilsonite or asphalt deposits near what is called now the Uncompaghre Reservation, which is in the State of Utah. A large amount of money was invested by these constituents of mine, and they have brought out, at considerable expense, large quantities of this asphaltum or gilsonite, which is used in roofing and for the purpose of paving streets. It is a large industry, and phenomenal prices have been paid for asphaltum, conspicuously in this city. Asphalt has been heretofore brought from an island in the West Indies, and the streets of Washington are to-day paved with this West India asphalt. The prices of this asphalt, as I say, have been phenomenal and almost fabulous. Recently discoveries have been made in the Indian Territory of asphaltum, but the largest deposit known in the world has been found in the Uncompahgre Reservation, in what is now the State of Utah.

The company to which I refer in the city of St. Louis did not go into the reservation, but they bought lands outside of the reservation and wagoned their products down to the Union Pacific Railway, and brought it then to the different cities in the United States, where it has been sold. They have been enabled to sell it at much reduced prices, and they have broken to a large extent the monopoly which has heretofore existed in favor of the West India asphalt. They propose now to build a railroad, at an expense of over $2,000,000, and have the capital to build it, provided this reservation shall be opened. They do not want the asphalt lands, because the asphalt exists in such enormous quantities, as shown by the report of the Geological Bureau, that there can be no monopoly in regard to it. There are six veins, ranging in width from 4 to 12 feet, extending for miles, to a depth of from 1,000 to 5,000 feet. That is the report of the experts. There is asphaltum enough there to supply this country for centuries to come, besides exporting largely to foreign countries. It needs no words from me to show to the Senate the advantage to the general public in opening up such a deposit as this and having railroad transportation to bring it to the cities of the United States for municipal and private purposes.

Mr. President, this is no new question, although it seems novel to the Secretary of the Interior. This subject has been before Congress for several years. We passed an act in 1890, Senate bill 1762, introduced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. It was debated in the Senate, all the facts were known, and the statement was made again and again as to these enormous deposits of asphalt on this reservation. That bill provided that, after allotting the agricultural lands in the reservation of the Uncomphagre Ute Indians, these mineral or asphalt lands should be sold at $20 an acre to the men who had gone in and discovered them, for a number of miners in Colorado, not knowing where the lines lay between Colorado and the Territory of Utah, had gone upon the Uncomphagre Reservation and staked out, as they call it, claims covering these asphalt lands. That bill was passed by Congress and went to the President of the United States——

Mr. HILL. In what year was that?

Mr. VEST. In March, 1890. The bill went to President Harrison and was vetoed by him upon the ground that it gave undue advantages to the men who had gone across the line unlawfully into an Indian reservation. It was sent with his veto to Congress, and nothing more was done with the matter until 1892, when the Senator from Colorado introduced Senate bill No. 574, which obviated, as he supposed, the objections President Harrison had made to the former bill, and this bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Indian Affairs to the Senate, but the session expired without action. Again, in 1894, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] introduced Senate bill 1887, which was favorably reported to the Senate, but no action was taken upon it.

In the meantime, in August, 1894, this question was brought before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and a provision was agreed upon by all parties in interest, which is found in the Indian appropriation act of August 18, 1894, the twenty-first section of which I will ask the Secretary to read, as it fully explains the position of this matter at present. The preceding section, let me observe——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask that the Senator from Missouri permit also to be read the last ten lines of section 20 in that connection, which show the duty of the Secretary of the Interior in the matter.

Mr. VEST. I am obliged to the Senator. I was about to state myself the contents of the last portion of the preceding section, but the Secretary can read it, and it will speak for itself.

Mr. GORDON. Before the Senator has that read, I wish to ask him a question, with his permission.

Mr. VEST. With great pleasure.

Mr. GORDON. Is it made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior or of the President of the United States to issue the proclamation opening this reservation?

Mr. VEST. The President, of course. The President issues all proclamations. This Uncompahgre Reservation was set aside by Executive order, and these Indians were put upon it with the understanding that the agricultural lands should be allotted to them in severalty. Of course the President of the United States issues the proclamation. In his reply to the resolution of the Senator from Utah, the Secretary of the Interior says he is not able to say when the President will issue his proclamation; but after the Secretary has read what I have sent to the desk I will make a statement, which I think will make it very clear that this whole thing comes from the Secretary of the Interior, and the President of the United States, in my opinion—I am authorized from what I know of the facts to make the statement—knows nothing about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

All necessary surveys, if any, to enable said commission to complete the allotments shall be made under the direction of the General Land Office. Said commissioners shall, as soon as practicable after their appointment, report to the Secretary of the Interior what portions of said reservation are unsuited or will not be required for allotments, and thereupon such portions so reported shall, by proclamation, be restored to the public domain and made subject to entry, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 21. That the remainder of the lands on said reservation shall, upon the approval of the allotments by the Secretary of the Interior, be immediately open to entry under the homestead and mineral laws of the United States: Provided, That no person shall be entitled to locate more than two claims, neither to exceed 10 acres, on any lands containing asphaltum, gilsonite, or like substances: Provided, That after three years' actual and continuous residence upon agricultural lands from date of settlement the settler may, upon full payment of $1.50 per acre, receive patent for the tract entered. If not commuted at the end of three years the settler shall pay at the time of making final proof the sum of $1.50 per acre.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, every Senator will notice that this is a mandatory statute and specifically required the Secretary of the Interior, after he had made these allotments in severalty, to proceed as indicated by that statute in opening up the reservation, and then that these mineral claims, asphalt or otherwise, should be sold at $1.50 an acre. Instead of carrying out this provision of the law, which was considered by all as an adjustment and settlement of the whole matter, the Secretary of the Interior in his report, which is the answer he gives to the resolution of the Senator from Utah, says that since the passage of the act of August, 1894, which has been read by the Secretary, more full information has come to Congress in regard to the enormous deposits of asphaltum upon these lands, and he makes that an excuse for evading the duties which Congress had placed upon him, and recommends that these lands be now put up to the highest bidder.

If, as the Senator from Georgia intimates, this is a plan for wealthy corporations to get possession of these lands, the scheme of the Secretary of the Interior would bring about that identical result. If these lands were put up to the highest bidder, as a matter of course the poor men would be excluded, and it would be impossible for any miner who had made discoveries there to get one inch of these asphaltum lands. There would be no bidding except by wealthy men; there would be no contest except between the St. Louis corporation and a corporation of the city of New York, which last summer appeared upon the scene and became also a bidder for these lands, or proposed to get some interest in them and to make some adjustment with the St. Louis company by which a profit would accrue to their stockholders.

Mr. President, the point of this whole matter is, Did Congress know what it was doing? Was it known to the Congress of the United States that these asphaltum deposits were upon that reservation? Every Senator who has ever had any knowledge of this matter knows that there was full information upon that subject. I know personally that the Secretary of the Interior was told in regard to the extent of these deposits. I went with the president of the St. Louis company to the office of the Secretary of the Interior with specimens of this asphaltum, and I heard the statement of the president of the company to the Secretary in regard to these six veins, accompanied with the information that the deposit was so enormous that it would supply the world for the next three hundred years to come.

The Secretary of the Interior in 1893, immediately after he went into office, knew all about these deposits. The extent of them was stated in debate upon this floor over and over again. The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and myself debated it. We both recognized and stated the enormous extent of these asphaltum deposits in the Uncompahgre Reservation, and now the Secretary of the Interior discovers all at once that Congress did not know the extent of these deposits, and therefore this legislation must be changed. We discussed this identical proposition as to the putting up of these lands to the highest bidder. I stated then, as I state now, that my constituents wanted nothing better, that they were a wealthy corporation, and expected to make their money principally from the transportation of asphaltum by the railroad that they proposed to build, and that if they wanted any of these lands besides what they now own outside of the reservation they could buy them to any extent from the men who were permitted to enter them, or if they were put up at public auction they could outbid any other competitor. After deliberation in the conference committee the provisions just read were adopted. The Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON], then a member of the House of Representatives, was one of the conferees, if I am not mistaken—that is so, is it not?

Mr. WILSON. In response to the Senator from Missouri, I will state that I was one of the conferees on that measure.

Mr. VEST. That is my recollection. I remember to have talked with the Senator in regard to it. In the conference committee all parties in interest agreed. With the understanding that this law should be carried out, the provision was placed in the appropriation act—which has been read by the Secretary—to enable these poor men who went in and found these claims in good faith, believing they were still upon the soil of Colorado, to obtain the lands by paying $1.50 an acre for them. Now, I ask the Senator from Georgia by what sort of right did the Secretary of the Interior nullify this act of Congress? Under what sort of claim of law has he the right to assume that Congress does not know what it is doing?

Mr. President, this practice of Cabinet officers disregarding law has grown up until it demands the reprehension of Congress. We had a provision of law for the distribution of seeds which was nullified practically by the Secretary of Agriculture. He appointed a commission of his own creatures, who made a report to him. He then obtained an opinion from the Attorney-General and stopped the distribution. Congress passed a resolution compelling him to make the distribution for this year, and I undertake to state now, at the risk of being called a prophet of evil, that the seeds will not be distributed, that there is no intention to distribute them. The interviews with the Secretary of Agriculture show that he proposes to put the onus upon Congress of having thrown away the $129,000 appropriated for seeds, when the ends of the law as we intended will never be subserved. Now comes the Secretary of the Interior, who says that he assumes that Congress did not know anything about these enormous deposits of asphalt, that the discoveries have been made since the act of 1894 was passed, and he therefore takes the responsibility of saying to the President of the United States that the proclamation should not be issued.

I went to the Secretary of the Interior early last summer and called his attention to the fact that my constituents were ready to build this railroad. I stated to him that it was not often, even in our wealthy and enterprising country, that private citizens could be found who would go into the Rocky Mountains and build a railroad of more than 45 miles at their own expense in order to develop a great industry like this. I called upon him repeatedly and was always met with the assurance that as soon as the commission which we had established by law reported—a portion of which law was read here—that he would be prepared to act upon it and the proclamation would be issued.

The commission finally reported, declaring that certain townships were absolutely worthless for agricultural purposes and contained only asphaltum. Then the Secretary told me that the proclamation, after it had gone through the Land Department and the subsidiary Indian Office in the Interior Department, away from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, was ready, and he had sent it to Buzzard's Bay to the President. I called again and again, and no proclamation could be found. Finally, after my return from Europe, I found telegrams from my constituents urging me to see why this matter had not been concluded. I went to the Secretary and was then informed for the first time that he and the President—who, of course, acted upon his suggestion—had come to the conclusion that Congress did not know what was best for the public interest and they proposed to put up these lands to the highest bidder. I told him then such an act could not be passed; that it would be called a rich man's act and would shut out men who had discovered these deposits, and I said, "When you make that recommendation who will introduce that legislation? It will not be introduced by any Western Senator or Representative. You will find a combined and solid opposition to any such law." Then he said he would get some friend from Georgia to bring it into the other House and have it acted upon.

I did not bring this matter into the Senate. When Utah came in as a State I assumed that the Senators and Representatives from that Commonwealth would take charge of it, as it immediately concerns their people, but I can not do less than state the facts as I know them.

Here is a positive statute nullified by the head of a Department, with no excuse except the paltry one that he assumed that Congress did not have the information, which we have had for seven years, and with which we are all thoroughly acquainted.

Mr. President, I am sorry to say it, but there seems to be a disposition on the part of the present Administration to treat the Western people as if they were in a condition of pupilage, as if they did not know their own rights and their own interests, and they must be informed ex cathedra from the East in regard to what is best for them and what should be done for them. Even the President of the United States lately on a missionary occasion [laughter] spoke of the West as a land of immorality and crime. He stood with the ghastly light of the hell holes of the rum cellars of New York blazing upon him and cantingly said, "Home missions must be used to civilize and Christianize the men who have left their homes in the civilized East and gone out among the mountains and valleys of that wild and woolly West." [Laughter.] Our President stood with Dr. Talmage on one side and the Rev. Sheldon Jackson on the other, and gave us a new version of that blessed old missionary hymn which we have heard so often in our childhood:

From Montana's sinful mountains,
From Utah's wicked plains,
They call us to deliver
Their land from Error's chains.

[Laughter.]

We are told by high ecclesiastical authority that his excellency has lately laid down his honors at the feet of Jesus. I am glad to know it. It has been the general impression of the Democratic party that the mugwumps and incense burners have got all those honors and intended to keep them. I have great respect for the Christian religion and missions at home and abroad; but, Mr. President, the President's intimation is a slander upon the men who, with rifle in one hand and ax in the other, have gone out and blazed the pathway of civilization in those Western wilds.

I am a Western man, and went to Missouri when it was the frontier, in sight of the Indian and buffalo. I have lived with those people nearly fifty years, and I say to our President now that if he will pretermit hunting ducks in North Carolina and silver Democrats in Kentucky long enough to come West we will show him a God-fearing, self-respecting, law-abiding people; we will show him churches in which there is real and unaffected piety; we will show him happy and Christian homes where "the saint, the husband, and the father prays." Our spires may not go so near heaven as do those of Eastern cities; we may not have organs that roll delicious tones along fretted aisles; but we have a people who fear God and observe all the Commandments as they are given unto them. And in comparison with this humble but real worship I am tempted to quote those beautiful lines of the Scotch poet:

Compar'd with this, how poor Religion's pride,
In all the pomp of method, and of art,
When men display to congregations wide
Devotions ev'ry grace, except the heart.

This, Mr. President, is what we have come to at last, that the President of the United States in his official capacity says to the people of the whole world that in one portion of this country their surroundings are such that missions—home missions—are necessary in order to bring the people to a proper knowledge of what is orderly and right.

But I did not rise for the purpose of again criticising this Administration. I rose to say most emphatically that the habit of Secretaries or members of the Cabinet deliberately trampling upon the laws of Congress and refusing to carry them out has gone to an extent that demands immediate notice at the hands of the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. VILAS. I desire to submit an amendment to the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That any lands containing asphaltum or gilsonite or like substances shall be reserved for further disposition by Congress.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention for a moment to one or two points in connection with this matter. In the Fifty-second Congress, when I was serving on the Committee on Indian Affairs, a bill to accomplish the purpose of transferring these valuable asphaltum lands to the hands of a corporation that was seeking to obtain them was introduced afresh in Congress. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has spoken of that bill and said that it was favorably reported. In the previous Congress, the Fifty-first, a bill had been passed which would practically have accomplished the end, but the President, General Harrison, vetoed the bill and Congress refused to pass it over his veto. Then the bill I hold in my hand was introduced in the Fifty-second Congress, being Senate bill 574, which provided, as it was introduced, that—

So much of the Uncompahgre Ute Indian Reservation in the Territory of Utah as is contained within the following description—

Naming two ranges of townships and two towns which comprised the gilsonite land—is hereby declared to be public lands of the United States and restored to the public domain.

Then it proceeded to provide that after the passage of the act any of the lands that might be more valuable for mineral purposes than for agriculture should be open for exploration, etc.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What year was that?

Mr. VILAS. That was in the year 1892. The bill was introduced on the 10th of December, 1891, in the first session of the Fifty-second Congress.

That bill, being referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, was reported back by the committee favorably in a technical sense, as the Senator from Missouri stated, but perhaps not favorably when you consider the nature of the report. The report proposed a substitute for the bill, and that substitute provided—

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause to be surveyed, in accordance with the laws of the United States, but subject to his special direction in order to the proper division into lots of land having mineral thereon, so much of the land or country lying within the Uncompahgre Ute Indian Reservation as is contained within—

Naming the designations mentioned in the other bill. It was then provided that after the completed survey and platting of the land the Secretary of the Interior should dispose of the same at public auction, after due notice, etc. I will not stop to read the bill in detail.

The report of the committee which accompanied the bill as it was returned to the Senate I will ask the Secretary to read, because it states the facts substantially and the reasons that governed the committee on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read Senate Report No. 240, Fifty-second Congress, first session, submitted by Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, February 16, 1892, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 574) to change the boundaries of the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, have examined the same and report a substitute therefor, with a recommendation that it pass.

Since the land mentioned in this bill was included within the Uncompahgre Ute Reservation it has been discovered to contain large and valuable veins of gilsonite or asphaltum. The discovery does not appear to have been made by any particular person or under any such circumstances as gives any particular person the least equitable claim beyond the general public; neither could any private parties have acquired by any attempted location or settlement or other form of claim the slightest right to any special preference or recognition on the part of the Government. In opening these lands to the public, therefore, two principles ought to receive acknowledgment; the one that the value of these mineral veins belongs to the general public and ought to be enjoyed by receiving to the credit of the general public account their money worth and not be allowed to pass under some pretext of disposition to the enrichment of private parties through any favoritism of legislation or administration, and the other that an equal opportunity ought to be afforded to all citizens to obtain upon equal terms these valuable mineral lands.

There seems no other practicable way to accomplish these objects but to dispose of the lands to the highest bidder at auction. All other modes of disposition of public lands now provided by law are merely farcical when applied to such a case as this. The mineral laws are not adapted in nature to lands of this kind, because the gilsonite or asphalt is easily discoverable and requires no such protracted and costly exploration as must be given, or as usually is given, by those who seek for gold or silver or other mineral.

The consent of the Indians is not required to this disposition, nor is provision due that the proceeds of the sales shall be set apart to the use of the Indians, for the following reasons:

The Uncompahgre Utes, in the first place, have no right in this reservation except the right to an allotment of agricultural land, for which the United States must be paid, out of the tribal funds derived from the proceeds of the lands ceded by the Utes in Colorado, the sum of $1.25 per acre; and, secondly, because the Utes are already provided with sufficient tribal funds for their needs. That they have no claim to these lands will appear from an examination of the agreement made with them for the cession of their lands in Colorado and their removal to Utah, and the acts of Congress on the subject. It was simply agreed that the Uncompahgre Utes should remove to and settle upon agricultural lands on Grand River, near the mouth of the Gunnison River, in Colorado, if a sufficient quantity of agricultural land should be found there, and if not, then upon such other unoccupied agricultural lands as may be found in that vicinity and in the Territory of Utah, and that allotment of agricultural and grazing land should be made to the different members of the tribe in specific quantities, respectively; but it was provided that the United States should be reimbursed at the rate of $1.25 per acre for all such lands so allotted to these Indians out of the proceeds of the lands which the Utes ceded to the United States in Colorado. Thus it becomes apparent that not only did the Uncompahgre Utes take by their agreement no right to any lands in Utah, except the right to have allotments made to them, but that even for the allotments the United States were to be reimbursed because of the fact that the Indians have the proceeds realized from the sale of their lands in Colorado. Nor did the agreement or the statute make any provision for this reservation or for any rights in other land than such as should be allotted. (21 Stat. L., page 199.)

The commission appointed for the purpose of executing the agreement was abolished by Congress (22 Stat. L., 449) before having completed all the work of allotment agreed upon, and perhaps these Indians were not then ready to enter upon the advanced condition which individual allotment implies and requires. An Executive order was therefore made on the 5th of January, 1882, directing that a certain tract of country, which embraced the lands mentioned in this bill, should be "withheld from sale and set apart for a reservation for the Uncompahgre Utes." This gave no title, but was a provision to answer the execution, at a suitable future time, of the agreement with them. The lands embraced within this reservation amount to 1,933,440 acres (Report Indian Commissioner of 1890, page 443), while the entire number of the Uncompahgre Utes is but 988 persons, according to the enumeration reported in 1890 (same volume, page 419). Two hundred thousand acres will be sufficient to make all the allotments required by law. Besides, the lands proposed to be disposed of under this bill are not of a nature suitable for allotment, being generally rough and mountainous.

Nor does there appear to be any necessity, or any just obligation so arising, on the part of the Government to apply the proceeds of these lands to the creation of another fund for these Indians. The 5 per cent fund of the Utes is now $500,000, and the 4 per cent fund $1,250,000, the two yielding $75,000 a year annual interest (same report, page 426). In these funds the Uncompahgre Utes share with the Uintahs, the Southerns, and the White River Utes. They are also within the provision which authorizes the President to distribute $4,000 a year to those manifesting special excellence. They will share, besides, in all the residuary proceeds resulting from the sale of the Ute lands ceded in Colorado, after the United States shall have been reimbursed.

There appears, therefore, no reason for requiring the assent of the Indians to this disposition of mineral lands, which will not affect in any way their rights in the reservation, nor for putting the proceeds to their use. These justly belong to the general Treasury.

There remains for consideration only the questions whether the time has arrived for the United States to dispose of these mineral beds, and if so, in what manner the disposition should be made, upon which the views of the committee have already been submitted.

The method of disposition now recommended is in accordance with that adopted by the Senate in the second session of the Fifty-first Congress for the disposition of the mineral lands now proposed to be sold in the bill (S. 4242, Fifty-first Congress, second session) which passed the Senate after the President returned with his objections the bill passed during the first session (S. 1762), but which, the House of Representatives having amended, failed to pass both branches of Congress.

Mr. VILAS. After the report was made and the bill placed on the Calendar, I received a good many solicitations and held some interviews with representatives of the company of which the distinguished Senator from Missouri has made mention, and a great effort was made to cause a change in the disposition of the Indian Committee, which insisted that those valuable asphaltum lands should be sold for the benefit of the United States.

Let me remark that this particular body of asphaltum or gilsonite lands lies directly on the western border of the Uncompahgre Reservation, to which the Uncompahgre Utes were sent a good many years ago. They are not lands which belong to that tribe of Indians. They belong to the United States, and in the treaty by which the Uncompahgre Utes were sent to those lands no rights were given them to the lands in fee or to any of the minerals in them. The only use to which the Ute Indians could claim the lands should be put for their benefit was an allotment to them of the agricultural lands.

Let me remark another thing: Gilsonite was not discovered, according to the evidence that was presented at the time to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as the result of laborious prospecting, expensive and self-denying labors on the part of explorers such as in the case of gold and silver have often to be submitted to, but it was known for a long time before to many persons. It lay open to view, as it was stated at the time, upon the surface of the ground. It was in large patches, and while it is true that valuable veins may also exist, the Committee on Indian Affairs at that time had information——

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask the Senator at what date this public exposure was made of the existence of gilsonite in such large quantities?

Mr. VILAS. Until this morning my attention had not been particularly called to this subject for now a number of years, and I am unable to be specific as to dates, though at the time when the report was made which I was required by the committee to write and present I did have information in respect to the details.

Mr. CANNON. Was it not previous to 1892?

Mr. VILAS. Oh, yes. There is no doubt about the fact, as was stated by the Senator from Missouri—I agree with him—that knowledge of the existence of this gilsonite was not the product of anybody's prospecting exploration or sudden discovery. It was a thing known to those who, though perhaps rarely, traversed the wilds of that western region, rough, inhospitable, and uninhabitable almost as it is.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator permit me again?

Mr. VILAS. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Then, the statement in the answer or purported answer of the Secretary of the Interior based on the report of 1895 that the existence of those deposits and their extent was not fully known is a misconception?

Mr. VILAS. I do not know at all, and I doubt if the Senator from Utah knows, the fullness of the information which the Secretary of the Interior possessed on this subject at any time. I should dislike to say that the information which the Committee on Indian Affairs had at that time was full, but it was certainly sufficient to show that valuable deposits of gilsonite and asphaltum were there and were well known and had long been well known to be there.

Mr. CANNON. It is not the fullness of the information possessed by the Secretary of the Interior of which we complain. It is his paucity of information with which we are finding fault.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to call his attention to what was referred to very pertinently by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me, I was just about to read it. I hold it in my hand, I suppose, and I was about to call attention to the difference between the statement of the Secretary of the Interior on the subject and that which I have made, or the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] or the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] has made.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not think the Senator yet comprehends. If he does, I hope he will dwell in his reading upon this point. The Secretary in his report states that the information which he conveyed in his two prior annual reports had not been as fully brought to the attention of Congress at the date of the passage of the act as now, and that therefore he is holding on to them, apparently. I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that the information conveyed to Congress by the reports of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs is very much more full and complete and authentic than any information which at any time has been conveyed to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, and that this information was known to Congress long before the present incumbent became Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. VILAS. I think it was, but perhaps the present incumbent of the Secretaryship of the Department of the Interior did not happen to know that fact.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, Mr. President, I think there is no fact which the present incumbent of that office does not consider that he knows.

Mr. VILAS. Let us do justice to the Secretary of the Interior. I do not know but that I might even appeal to my distinguished, eloquent, and always delightful friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to do justice to the President, notwithstanding his views of the usefulness of religion for the West, and I agree that it is no better for the West than for the East and that there is no more necessity for the inculcation of the principles of piety there than here. I am not quite sure but that the country would send the first home missionary very near to the place where we are now sitting.

Mr. President, the discussion of views of that kind, innuendoes against the Secretary or the President upon other subjects, can not be received by the Senate to affect the question of the soundness of their judgment or the honesty of their purposes in regard to these valuable lands lying in the Uncompahgre Ute Indian Reservation. I was told in the session of 1892 by a very intelligent, highly educated, scientific gentleman in the employment of the same company of which the Senator from Missouri has spoken that the asphalt or gilsonite there to be found is a richer body than is known anywhere else; that it is worth millions of dollars in all probability; that it is available not only for the making of streets, with which we ordinarily associate the term asphalt, but that it is of great value in the making of paints and varnishes; that its uses in the arts have only just become understood, and hardly yet understood; that undoubtedly it will be extended to a very great many different objects of utility to which it has not yet been applied.

Now, if the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior have to find these to be the facts, I submit that it is only just and fair that they should be laid before Congress. We are told here, as if they were rebelling against an act of Congress, as if this body had displayed its wisdom on the subject——

Mr. VEST. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if this very proposition now submitted in the report of the Secretary of the Interior was not incorporated in the report which the Senator has caused to be read here and not adopted by Congress?

Mr. VILAS. I will state exactly what the fact is about that matter, as I think. The statement made by the Senator from Missouri is true. There should be added to it the qualification that just as soon as the Committee on Indian Affairs made their report for that disposition of those lands by which the object so loudly proclaimed would have been accomplished and the public would have been sharers in this valuable mineral, the company which was interested in the bill as it was originally introduced ceased its efforts for its passage, and the bill was never called up.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, I beg to state to him that within my personal knowledge he is misinformed. The bill which passed and went to the President never originated with that company. It was drawn by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and he alone was responsible for it. It was passed through Congress by the efforts of the Senators from Colorado and the Delegate from Utah. It did not originate with the St. Louis company at all. I know, because I am familiar with every step of this whole proceeding, that when the Senator made the report I advocated it, and the St. Louis company were perfectly willing to accept the measure.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I at that time and for a long time was under the impression that the company were hostile to it, instead of the company having anything to do with it; that they had no more to do with it than the Vice-President had—not a particle.

Mr. VEST. None in the world; they had nothing to do with it. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin—and I know what I state to be absolutely true—that the only interest the St. Louis company have is to get this reservation opened, so as to make the asphalt a marketable product. They expect to make their money out of the railroad. They can get all the lands they want. They have now a large quantity of land outside of the reservation that they own in fee, and with their capital they can buy any quantity of it, because it is there in enormous quantities, as the Secretary says. What they want to do is to build a railroad, and they have had the money ready for two years to build the road, but by the delay of the Interior Department they have been unable to progress with the work. That is the fact.

Mr. VILAS. I did not intend the suggestion of any Senator being concerned in the matter.

Mr. VEST. Oh, I know that.

Mr. VILAS. It may be that the origin of the bill vetoed by President Harrison was different from what I supposed it to be, because I was not then here and I did not know how it originated. I observe also that the bill of which I have been speaking, which was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Fifty-second Congress, was introduced by the Senator from Colorado. What I happen to have known in relation to it is that the agent of this company (and I am acquainted with a very wealthy and distinguished gentleman who is one of the owners of the company) coming from him and bringing along his card or a letter, I have forgotten which, solicited the passage of some bill which should open that portion of the Uncompahgre Ute Reservation, so that it could be obtained.

Mr. VEST. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. VILAS. They sought it diligently, and they protested with me privately in argument against the report which the Committee on Indian Affairs through me had made, and sought to have it changed. We believed it was right. We watched that business here, not indulging in any suspicion by any means, but lest there should be some injury done to the public interests we watched the bill through that session of Congress, not caring about its passage, but only to see to it that if it were passed the proper provision should be contained in it, so that the value of these mineral lands should be received by the people of the United States and not go to some private concern without a fair compensation to the public for them.

Mr. VEST. If my friend will permit me, I promise not to interrupt him again.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Missouri can interrupt me at his pleasure.

Mr. VEST. The Senator is entirely right, I have no doubt, in the statement that the St. Louis company sent its agents to him and asked that the report of the committee should be changed; and I now remember the reasons. It comes back to me distinctly, and I myself conferred with the Senator in regard to it frequently. The St. Louis company wanted the report changed because they did not believe that bill could be passed on account of the opposition of the Senator from Colorado, who was opposed to putting up the lands to the highest bidder, on the ground that then his constituents in Colorado, who had gone in and made these claims, being poor men, miners, would be shut out, and that the rich corporation would have a monopoly of the bidding. That is all the opposition that was made. There has been but one object on the part of the St. Louis company, and that was to open the reservation on some terms, they did not care what, but to open it; and their only opposition to the bill in that form was because they did not believe it could be passed.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to say a word?

Mr. VILAS. With great pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. I do not intend to go into any discussion of this matter. I introduced the bill originally to open this land. I introduced it at the request of a large number of citizens of my State who had gone in there and made improvements on the land, supposing at the time that it was in the State of Colorado, and who afterwards learned that it was in the State of Utah. The line between Utah and Colorado in that section is not run, and it was impossible to know its location. The people who went in there supposed it was, as I said, in the State of Colorado and not on an Indian reservation or on any reservation. The bill passed and was vetoed. Then I introduced another bill.

I want to say that so far as the St. Louis company is concerned, when I introduced the first bill I had never heard of the St. Louis company; I did not know that there was such a company in existence. I was very much opposed to and asserted that I would oppose any proposition to sell the land. I knew if that was done it would pass into the hands of capitalists, to the exclusion of a lot of men who had made these discoveries, who had gone in there in good faith and worked on this property; and I believed it was a great deal better that that land, no matter how valuable it might turn out to be, should be distributed among the hardy Western people who had gone in there and discovered that there was something of value on the land than that it should go to some rich miners. I knew if it was put up for sale every one of them would lose all that he had invested. Therefore I was intending, when the bill came up, to oppose it very actively, and I think I so stated perhaps on the floor of the Senate. I know I made that statement to several Senators. I regarded it as a great outrage upon the people who had gone out there. I regarded the veto of the bill as a very great mistake, and I attributed the veto at that time to the influence of certain people who wanted the land put up for sale that they might buy it, to the exclusion of the hardy pioneers and miners.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado a question for information. I am not familiar with the facts in this case. Are the parties to whom the Senator from Colorado has alluded as being at one time bona fide occupants of this land still in possession of it, or what is the character of their present claim?

Mr. TELLER. I think those people have maintained—at least the last I knew of it they had attempted to maintain—some kind of a right to it, so that when it was opened up they could go on the land.

Mr. WHITE. My point was simply whether they were in a condition where, if the status of the matter was such as to permit the location, they would be able to exercise the equitable right to which the Senator from Colorado alludes.

Mr. TELLER. Some of those people told me during the last summer that they had maintained their possession by doing work on it every year, and while they knew they could not get it under the strict rules of law they believed when it should be opened that they would have the preference. I am satisfied that those miners will have the preference if there is no provision of law that cuts them out, because there is a feeling in a community like that to maintain the right of the original occupants, if possible. That is a sort of unwritten law in a mining country. If a man can show that he was the first discoverer, technicalities do not stand very much in the way of his maintaining that possession.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado, of course, states the facts, so far as he had connection with them, exactly as they were, but so far as he indicates the facts according to his information in regard to the possession of those lands, I am inclined to think, from my remembrance of the testimony and evidence that were submitted at the time, that he is quite in error. It is true, however, let me say to the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], that certain parties who have claimed to be discoverers of the asphalt drove some stakes, and by occasionally visiting the land, perhaps driving some other stakes or something of that sort, have striven to maintain a theory of claim upon it; but at the time when they asserted originally their claim of discovery the asphaltum was known to a great many people to exist.

Mr. BROWN. May I interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to make a short statement on this subject.

Mr. VILAS. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BROWN. The minerals were discovered in the usual way by prospectors, under the belief of the prospectors at the time that they were not on the Indian reservation. They believed, as the Senator from Colorado has said, that they were over the line in Colorado. They staked out their claims according to the law, and they have maintained them by doing estimate work ever since. As the Senator from Colorado has said, it may be a question of law as to whether they will have the right to maintain the claims. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that if they made the locations in good faith, believing they were off the reservation, they will have the right to go back and claim their original location; in other words, after we shall have opened this reservation it will date back to the original location, so that the original discoverers will get the benefit of their discovery.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Utah has stated correctly the exact theory by which the exploiters of this asphaltum seek to secure possession of it under the law which was passed as a part of the Indian appropriation act of 1894, and to which I shall call attention presently. But, while he seems to confess that the claim is wrong in law, he appears to think that it is right in fact, and he asserts, I suppose upon information, that those prospectors did discover the mineral. On the contrary, the Committee on Indian Affairs used the following expression in regard to that claim in 1892:

> The discovery does not appear to have been made by any particular person or under any such circumstance as gives any particular person the least equitable claim beyond the general public.

It was upon that basis, as I remember it, although I have not the message before me at this moment, that President Harrison vetoed the bill which had passed in the Fifty-first Congress. That bill, as it passed, was drawn obviously with the purpose of giving to the asserted prospectors an advantage in the effort to secure those lands when they should be opened. For that reason it was vetoed by the President.

Mr. TELLER. The bill provided for that, I think, in terms.

Mr. VILAS. It contained words that certainly would have been construed to that effect, and I think pretty nearly in terms.

Mr. TELLER. I intended that those prospectors should have that benefit. That was my idea when the bill was introduced.

Mr. VEST. That is what the bill provided.

Mr. VILAS. While the bill may be said to have practically provided for it, it is not explicit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business; which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution which is now before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope the Senator from Utah will not make that motion, but will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BROWN. Very well. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside without prejudice, that the joint resolution may be proceeded with.

Mr. BERRY. If I may be permitted to make a remark, I will state that if the joint resolution can be finished now by unanimous consent, laying aside temporarily the unfinished business without losing its place, and if it is the desire of the Senate to finish the joint resolution, I will make no objection, but I hope that no motion will be made which will displace the bill which is the unfinished business and which I have been so earnestly seeking to have considered. If the Senator from Utah desires to ask unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, I will make no objection, but if that is not agreed to I do hope the Senate will not, by taking up another measure, displace the bill which is now the unfinished business.

Mr. BROWN. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be proceeded with. It is nearly finished, and we would like to dispose of it now.

Mr. VILAS. I think we ought to devote a little more time to the joint resolution. It has been referred to no committee, I understand; it has just been introduced, and is sought to be passed in such a manner as that if it were passed it would imply a reflection upon the Secretary of the Interior, even upon the President, perhaps, and I think we ought to have a pretty fair and full consideration of it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the Senator must know, as the rest of us know, that if the joint resolution goes over without further action or a unanimous agreement or understanding in regard to its future consideration it lies buried with the probabilities one hundred to one that it can never again be successfully brought up. If we could have this afternoon upon it, or so much of the afternoon as is necessary, we could reach some final conclusion upon it; and I do trust the Senator from Wisconsin will not object that this measure, which has been, as the Senator from Missouri said, before Congress for seven years, and which simply presents to the Senate the question as to whether the Secretary of the Interior shall be reminded that it is his duty to carry out the provisions of existing law, may stand before the Senate until we reach some disposition of it.

The Senator in charge of the Du Pont case is willing, I understand, that we shall take the time. My impression is that the Cuban insurgents may also, perhaps, wait one more afternoon until we settle this question for Utah. It is a good deal more important to us, Mr. President, as a country, that we shall determine whether these 2,000,000 acres of land are to be opened or not, whether these deposits shall be made available for the public or not, than it is to spend our time upon these other academic discussions. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will consent, and if he does not consent I trust the Senator from Utah will move that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that the measure which the Senator from Arkansas has in charge is before the Senate by unanimous agreement. I do not apprehend that the motion of the Senator from Utah, if it shall be made, will necessarily displace the bill of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. It will. I will state to the Senator from Colorado that under the rule the Arkansas bill is the unfinished business, and taking up any other business, except by unanimous consent, and laying that bill aside temporarily, does displace it. It will be no longer the unfinished business if it is decided by a vote of the Senate to take up another measure.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Very well. Then I ask that we may have unanimous consent that the consideration of the pending joint resolution shall follow the measure which the Senator from Arkansas has in charge, if he is ready to proceed with that bill.

Mr. GORDON. As one Senator who is somewhat interested in this discussion, I am ready to consent to that arrangement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] has undoubtedly the right to the floor, and by the established courtesy he ought to be allowed to proceed and make his speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certainly; but it is the duty of the Chair to submit the request of the Senator from Colorado to the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. I understand the Senator from Utah to consent to the proposition made by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BROWN. I am willing to take the proposition made by the Senator from Arkansas and let the joint resolution follow, as unfinished business, the bill which he has in charge.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Arkansas state his request again?

Mr. BERRY. The request was made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], as I understood it, and it is that as soon as the Arkansas bill is disposed of, then the joint resolution which has been under consideration shall become the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. None except this, Mr. President, that the proposed arrangement shall not interfere with any privileged question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request with the modification suggested by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. VILAS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is the bill in reference to the settlement of the claims of the State of Arkansas with the Government now the unfinished business of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is now the unfinished business.

Mr. VILAS. And is that bill to be at once proceeded with?

Mr. BERRY. I sincerely hope so.

Mr. GORDON. In behalf of the Senator from Nebraska, I hope my friend from Arkansas will not press his bill to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. GORDON. I have no doubt unanimous consent will be given to the Senator from Nebraska to proceed without displacing the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will certainly recognize the Senator from Nebraska, in accordance with previous notice.

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the request of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ALLISON. Subject also to the consideration of appropriation bills when they are ready. Otherwise, I must object.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is always understood.

Mr. ALLISON. If that is understood, I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VILAS. That disposes of the joint resolution, then, for the present?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For the present.

Mr. BROWN. The order is that the joint resolution stands as the unfinished business after the bill of the Senator from Arkansas is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands, with the modifications as to the matter of privilege and appropriaton bills, as indicated by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 502, be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the Delaware case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BERRY. As I understand, that is for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Nebraska to make his speech.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is all.

Mr. BERRY. I express the hope that when the Senator from Nebraska has concluded we may take up Senate bill 502 and dispose of it without further delay. I therefore yield to the Senator from Nebraska for that purpose.

Mr. CALL. I merely wish to say that the other privileged question, the report of the committee of conference on the Cuban resolutions, will come up, I understand, immediately after the speech of the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none.

ARKANSAS AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. PLATT. There is lying upon the table of the Senate a request for a conference from the House of Representatives on a bill of that body which passed the Senate with amendments. I ask that it may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas and Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and accede to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PETTIGREW, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. ROACH were appointed.

NAVAL SOLICITOR AND JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL.

Mr. HALE. There is a bill from the House of Representatives, No. 3337, which came over last evening, and which I asked should remain upon the table, amending the act of June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to authorize the President to appoint an officer of the Navy or the Marine Corps to perform the duties of solicitor and judge-advocate-general, etc., and to fix the rank and pay of such officer," and for other purposes.

I should like to call up that bill now and have it acted upon, instead of the bill on the same subject which has been reported by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, which will save us going through the form of passing the Senate bill.

Mr. HILL. Certainly the Senator will not ask to have that done now?

Mr. HALE. I certainly shall not do so if any Senator objects.

Mr. HILL. I want to make some inquiries about the bill, and I should like it to lie over for the present.

Mr. HALE. Then I ask that the bill lie upon the table; and I will say to the Senator from New York that I shall not call it up without notifying him.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon from the Committee on Privileges and Elections February 18, 1896:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor to the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] I of course had no idea that it would lead to an extended debate, but I feel that I have been amply repaid for any delay in the matter. I have been strengthened and refreshed by the outburst of harmony and felicity that seems to perennially abide in the household of the opposition party, and I therefore feel that in proceeding to the discussion of this question we commence upon the assumption that there is the utmost harmony upon both sides of this Chamber, and that we are in the best possible temper to take up and pass upon a legal question without being in any manner embarrassed by political considerations.

Mr. President, I should not of my own motion have volunteered to make an argument in the case of Henry A. Du Pont, but I confess I have esteemed it not only a privilege but a pleasure as well to be invited to that task by the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have been for so many years of a busy life devoted to the examination and presentation of legal problems that I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak before the Senate of the United States upon a case which, it seems to me, rests wholly and alone upon the consideration and determination of questions of law.

It is somewhat remarkable, Mr. President, and yet not wholly so, that the press and the public in anticipating judgment in this case have divided the Senate on party lines, and have already declared that the vote, so far as Republicans and Democrats are concerned, is the same as cast. And yet, sir, we are sitting here in the court of the highest jurisdiction in this country to pass upon a question which can not seriously disturb the balance of power in the Senate, to pass upon a question which, no matter how grave and important its present disposition may be, is of far more importance in the establishment of a rule which shall prevail in the election of Senators in this country for all time to come. But it is not altogether strange that the public and the press of this country have divided the judges or the jurors here according to political lines, for as we look over the judicial history of this country as it has had to deal with and pass upon questions of a quasi political character we are startled to find how often judges have divided upon matters of the greatest importance in accordance with the political convictions of the individuals constituting the tribunal.

When we remember that the greatest special court ever called in this country, the Electoral Commission, divided on purely partisan and political lines, and that the casting vote was only looked upon anxiously because of a doubt as to the political antecedents of one member of that court, it is not strange that the people of this country have come to anticipate that every tribunal which takes up and deals with a case involving party considerations is to be warped and bent in either direction according to party bias. I do not, however, consider that it is particularly a matter of reflection even upon the distinguished membership of this great body that we are in a measure swayed and influenced by our political convictions and our political beliefs. We in this country, all over the land, are strong in our political convictions; we are strong in our fealty to party; we are strong in our desire for party success. That desire influences alike the judgment of all the people, in the lowest and in the highest ranks of life, and it is not strange that some of this human nature should inevitably come in and have its place and find its expression in the decision which is to be reached in this body. Yet, sir, so far as it may be possible, the case before the Senate is one which should be divorced from all questions of party; and in that spirit of presentation, from the legal and not the partisan standpoint, I shall endeavor to proceed.

I desire that any Senator upon this floor who has at any time a pertinent suggestion or inquiry may feel at perfect liberty to make it. It will not disconcert or discommode me in the least. My hope and my aim is to erect an argumentative structure which can not be overthrown, and I am perfectly willing to test its strength at any point. It is only the builder of a house of cards who fears attack as the work goes on.

Mr. President, it is fortunate for us all that in the present case there are certain great landmarks established by common consent, and with the statement of those great landmarks, to which in the discussion we should closely cling, and by which we should establish all our lines of survey, it seems to me that the whole case is presented to the Senate, and there remains nothing thereafter for us to do except to apply the constitutional question to those landmarks; and this application being made, the result will inevitably follow.

What are those landmarks? On the first Tuesday of January, 1895, there was a governor, a senate, and a house of representatives in the State of Delaware. The senate was composed of 9 members; the house of representatives of 21. Both bodies were full; there was no vacancy; the title of every senator and of every representative had been passed upon and conceded; and we concede it here. That state of things continued until, under the act of Congress, the legislature commenced to ballot for a United States Senator. Ballots were had day by day and no election resulted. On the 8th day of April following the commencement of the legislative session the governor of the State of Delaware departed this life. That fact was made known to the Delaware senate. It attested it by spreading upon the records a statement, accompanied by appropriate resolutions to the departed.

On the 9th day of April William T. Watson, the speaker of the senate of the State of Delaware, was in the presence of the senate, as attested by its records, called to the bar, and there was administered to him by direction of the senate the oath of office as governor of the State of Delaware. With respect to that I shall have something to say later. The record shows that the senate of Delaware not only inducted him into the office of governor, but that it ushered him out of the senate. Afterwards, on May 9, 1895, in the joint convention, Henry A. Du Pont received 15 votes as United States Senator.

Sir, those are the facts that are conceded; they are the landmarks of the case, and approach it as you may, reason in a circle as you may, the only question remaining is as to whether or not after Watson was inaugurated as governor there were 29 or 30 members of the legislature of Delaware entitled to sit in that legislature and to vote for United States Senator. That is the only question; there is no other.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator, as he invited questions, allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I ask if the Senator contends that the events which he relates vacated Mr. Watson's office of speaker of the State senate?

Mr. THURSTON. I am coming to that.

Mr. PALMER. Is not that the true point?

Mr. THURSTON. The question is, Did the law of the land and the constitution of Delaware as applied to the conceded facts create a permanent or a temporary vacation of the office of State senator or a suspension of its functions in the person of William T. Watson?

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator will pardon a still further interruption——

Mr. THURSTON. I am very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. PALMER. I understand the facts to be materially different. If it is true that he vacated the office of senator; if that is the fact, and Mr. Watson after that time ceased to be a senator, is not that the real and essential fact?

Mr. THURSTON. No; that is only one of two facts to be established from the law, because, if Mr. William T. Watson was not authorized under the constitution of his State to exercise the functions of senator on the 9th of May, 1895, then there were only 29 members of the joint assembly entitled to vote, or who can be said to have voted for a Senator of the United States. The Senator will admit, I presume, that a vote which a senator was not authorized to cast is no vote and has no place upon the record, and can not be counted.

Mr. PALMER. In my mind it is exceedingly important to determine whether the act which the Senator has described vacated the office of senator or merely suspended his functions. It is material, in my judgment, to decide that question. I should be glad to have the view of the Senator on that.

Mr. THURSTON. I shall address myself to a consideration of both those propositions later on, because it will be readily seen that they are questions upon which we may naturally differ.

As I said, with those facts conceded, all that the Senate of the United States or any other tribunal has to do in order to determine how many members could vote for Senator on the 9th day of May, 1895, is to apply the law of the land and the constitution of the State of Delaware. Therefore, the only question is upon the determination as to what the law of the land was and what the constitution of the State of Delaware was on the 9th day of May, 1895. Yes; I will put it within still narrower limits: The only question is to determine what the constitution of the State of Delaware was on that day. It is conceded that the common law of England, which was adopted by our colonies at a very early date, is the law of this land, except as it is changed by constitutional provision or statutory enactment. It is admitted, I say, that the common law is a part of our rule of action in this country as much as it was a part of the rule of action of the people of the mother country at the time we adopted it. It has been established by the unchallenged citation of authority on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that under the common law no man has a right to hold and occupy and exercise two incompatible public offices at the same time.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator now what incompatibility there would be on the part of Senator Watson, or Governor Watson, appearing in the joint session and voting as a member of the legislature with any duty that the constitution of Delaware imposed upon him?

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, the common law has never yet seen fit to go into the minute inquiry as to whether one particular function of one particular office was incompatible with the exercise of another function of another office; but the rule is that if the general duties and powers of one office are inconsistent with the general duties and powers of another, the incompatibility exists, and the officer holding one can not hold the other, not for any purpose or to any extent.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator will allow me, the functions of the governor of the State of Delaware are defined by the State constitution, and the functions of the speaker of the senate of that State are defined by the same constitution, but the functions imposed upon the legislature of the State are derived from the Federal Constitution. What incompatibility can there be between the performance of a duty as a member of the legislature imposed upon him by that Constitution and the duties of governor as depending upon the constitution of Delaware?

Mr. THURSTON. The laws of the United States permit the lawful legislature of each State to elect a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, and you do not escape the proposition that the offices of governor and senator are incompatible by attempting to point out that the performance of one particular legislative duty on the part of Mr. Watson was not inconsistent with the performance of all the duties and all the obligations of the office of governor. For, unless Mr. Watson was authorized under the constitution of Delaware to exercise the office of senator, to sit in the senate of the State of Delaware for all purposes and at all times, there is no law, there is no constitution, there is no practice, there is no precedent which would warrant that he should come into that senate for certain specified purposes, and at the same time remain ineligible for the performance of the other functions of that position.

Mr. ALLEN. As the Populists, in the light of what has been said, may be the turning point of the jury, the turning wheel——

Mr. CHANDLER. Why does the Senator not say the only impartial Senators? [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. CHANDLER. I knew the Senator was struggling with that idea, and I wanted to help him out. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. I call my colleague's attention to this fact: When the constitution of Delaware of 1776 was formulated and adopted Delaware was an independent State. Delaware owed no allegiance whatever to this country or to England except that precarious allegiance dependent on the success or failure of the Revolution. I want to ask my colleague whether Delaware as an independent sovereign at that time did not possess the power by constitutional enactment to declare that, notwithstanding there might be an incompatibility between the exercise of the duties of two offices, the same individual, in the event of death or in the event of some matter to be determined by the constitution, could discharge those duties?

Mr. THURSTON. Unquestionably.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the question here, and the only question, is whether Delaware by her constitution did so declare.

Mr. THURSTON. I shall reach that point a little later on. I intended to state when I brought the argument to that point that in my judgment that was the only question.

I was proceeding to suggest that the common law, unless changed by statute—and there is no pretense of a statute changing it in the State of Delaware in respect of the matter now before the Senate—the common law, unless changed by some specific provision of the constitution of the State of Delaware, prevented, in the State of Delaware, any one man from exercising in his own person the duties and functions and powers of two incompatible offices.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Nebraska makes in his mind any distinction between the words "exercise an office" and "hold an office"?

Mr. THURSTON. I do not. I shall argue that more fully later on. I have that point in mind.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether his attention has been called to a clause in the constitution of Delaware wherein certain offices are enumerated as offices no more than one of which shall be held at one time by any person in the State, thereby excluding all others?

Mr. THURSTON. Will the Senator cite me to the particular provision to which he refers?

Mr. PEFFER. With pleasure. I will hand it to the Senator presently.

Mr. THURSTON. A little later on I shall reach the question of the construction of the constitution of Delaware. I have not yet arrived at that point in my argument.

In order that I may proceed logically, I will restate that, unless modified by the constitution of Delaware, the common law of England was a part of the law of that State at the time of this election, and unless expressly permitted by the constitution of Delaware, no man in that State could have exercised in his own person the duties, powers, privileges, and rights of two offices incompatible in their functions.

Then I proceed to the proposition that, under the facts admitted, the question as to whether or not there is a constitutional modification of the common law in the constitution of Delaware is purely and simply a matter of constitutional construction, of the correct interpretation of the fundamental law of that Commonwealth.

I go a step further. It is insisted upon our part that there are certain sections of the constitution of Delaware, which, by express provision, prohibit and prevent any one person in the State of Delaware from exercising at the same time the functions of the office of governor and those of State senator; and again I say that the decision as to whether or not our contention in that respect is right rests solely and alone upon the correct interpretation and construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware.

It is insisted upon the other side that there is express authority given in the constitution of Delaware to the president of the senate of that State, under certain contingencies, such as are shown by the record, to exercise at one and the same time in his own proper person the duties, powers, and functions both of governor and of senator of the State of Delaware. Again I say that for the determination of that contention we turn, and we turn alone, to the proper interpretation and construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware.

So, Mr. President, reason this matter around the circle as you please, you come back to the ultimate proposition, the facts being conceded, that a conclusion must be reached, and can only be reached, by establishing a correct interpretation and construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware.

Having reached that point, I come for a moment to the consideration of the contention upon the other side that the whole matter here is res adjudicata, having been decided by the senate of the State of Delaware, a final tribunal for that purpose, and that the Senate of the United States is estopped by something that was done in Delaware from now passing upon and determining this question. If the whole case rests, as it does from any point you look at it, upon the establishment of a correct interpretation and construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware, I ask Senators upon the other side to show me by what warrant of law, in or out of the constitution of the State of Delaware, the senate of that State is authorized to place an abiding interpretation on the provisions of its own constitution, under which it was brought into existence, and under which it proceeds. Where is the section which authorizes in any case, or under any circumstances, the senate of the State of Delaware to place abiding construction, binding upon all men and upon all tribunals, State and national, upon the provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware?

Mr. President, the true construction of the constitution of the State of Delaware is a matter of consideration and adjudication by any tribunal wherever and whenever such construction may affect a case which properly comes before it. The legislature of the State of Delaware has the right, the undoubted right, to pass upon the election and qualification of its own members; it has a right also to determine and adjudicate upon any question of fact or any mixed question of fact and of law which enters into the necessary determination as to whether or not a man bringing credentials to its doors has a right to admission; whether he has been elected to fill an office that is vacant, whether he has been elected by the proper constituency, whether his certificate is right, or whether he has the qualifications such as the law and the constitution prescribe. All these, I admit, are within the jurisdiction of the senate of the State of Delaware, and whenever it fairly acts in pursuance of that power and renders judgment, even the Senate of the United States is estopped from turning back the pages and writing across them its disapproval.

Mr. President, I admit that the senate of the State of Delaware, at the time of its organization, did pass upon and establish the fact that nine members of that senate were duly elected and qualified. As the records show, it inducted them into office. What of it? Does the Senator pretend to tell me that if within ten days thereafter there had been spread upon the records of the senate of Delaware a resolution declaring that one member of that body had died, there would still remain for voting or for any other purposes nine members on a subsequent day? Does the Senator mean to tell me that, having spread upon the record its declaration that death had visited one of its members, it would still further be necessary for the senate to declare his seat vacant? Sir, a resolution declaring the death is a resolution in and of itself declaring a vacancy.

I come now to another question. Suppose that after that legislature had been assembled the question arose as to the constitutional qualification of one of its members, and the senate, having that under consideration, solemnly resolved and spread upon its record a finding that he was but 20 years of age, and had stopped there. The constitution of that State says that to be a senator one must be 27 years of age. I possibly go a little further than the chairman of the committee did the other day, but I insist on the application of the old rule of geometry, which is as true in law as in mathematics, that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other, and when the senate establishes and spreads upon its record a declaration that a member is only 20 years of age. and the constitution of his country says he must be 27, he eo instanti ceases to be a senator and can no longer sit and vote and exercise the functions of that office.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That was my precise contention. If it appears upon the record that a person was admitted, the record showing that he was not of the constitutional age, then he was no senator, and any votes he might give would not bind the United States Senate. I did concede, however, that if the senate of Delaware should admit a person to the senate, passing upon the question of fact as to his age, and nothing appeared on the record to show that he was not of constitutional age, in that case I thought the adjudication of the senate of Delaware would be binding upon the Senate of the United States.

Mr. THURSTON. In the absence of a record and the establishment of facts which create a constitutional inability to hold office, of course that is true; but it is to the contrary when the disqualifying facts are spread upon the record.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, the question which I wish now to ask will be directed largely to the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to ask if the verdict of a jury without the judgment of a court concludes any right? I understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that if the senate were to find the mere fact that the party was only 20 years of age that would be equivalent to a declaration, that it would be a judgment of ouster against him.

Mr. THURSTON. I say it would be.

Mr. PALMER. Then, does the Senator mean to say that a verdict of a jury, which may be reversed and set aside by the court, concludes any rights whatever?

Mr. THURSTON. No; and for this reason a jury is only one-half of the court, and the whole court, the jury and the judge, must act together before judgment can be pronounced; but there is no division of functions in the senate of a State. Those of the jury are those of the judge; when one acts the other acts, and you can not sever their acts into the acts of the jury as distinguished from the acts of the court.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator assumes that the senate of Delaware did or did not find some facts which impeached the seat of Mr. Watson, those facts are subject to reconsideration; but would that amount to an adjudication that he was not entitled to his seat?

Mr. THURSTON. Unquestionably they are subject to reconsideration, as a judgment is under a statute during the term, but until it is set aside by the action of the same power which establishes it it remains a judgment of the court.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator and I are both more familiar with court proceedings than with parliamentary proceedings, and I ask would a finding of that fact be a judgment of ouster against the senator?

Mr. THURSTON. I think it would unquestionably in a body of that character, where the functions of the jury and the court are all so commingled that they can not be separated; in other words, when that senate, sitting as a court, finds that a man is dead and declares that he is dead, it is not necessary to go further and declare the office vacant. If it is so in the case of death, it must be so in the case of any other declaration which, by the application of the constitution of the State to that declaration, establishes the inability on the part of the incumbent to further exercise the duties of his position.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I am seeking information which I very much need.

Mr. THURSTON. I am not prepared to admit that there is any information which my colleague needs.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand my colleague to take the position that the finding of the fact that a given senator is under age, 20 years of age, ipso facto creates a vacancy. Suppose, now, he is permitted to sit there as a senator de facto and to vote upon acts of the legislature. We will take a case where it requires a two-thirds vote to pass corporation acts in a State upon a yea-and-nay vote, and the passage of the bill turns upon his vote. Does my colleague, under those circumstances, claim that that act of the legislature would be void, no vacancy having been declared by the senate?

Mr. THURSTON. Unquestionably, if there appeared upon the record of the senate—I do not care in what language it is couched—a declaration that is inconsistent, by the mere application of the constitution, with the further exercise of the duties of that office.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me make a suggestion at this point, if my colleague will indulge me.

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose a case were brought before a jury, either civil or criminal, it would not matter which, and it was determined and ascertained by the court before the case was submitted to the jury that one of the 12 jurors is not a citizen of the United States or of the State, but notwithstanding that fact he was permitted to sit and act as a juror until the conclusion of the case; would that vitiate the verdict which might be rendered by the jury?

Mr. THURSTON. It would be ground for setting aside the verdict in any tribunal to which the judgment went.

Mr. ALLEN. I put in my question, if my colleague will recollect, the fact that his lack of citizenship was known to the parties and to counsel and to the court before the case was submitted to the jury and before it was tried. Now, if the case is tried with full knowledge upon the part of counsel and the parties to the case that this particular juror is not a citizen of the State or of the United States, I suggest to my colleague that they are estopped by their conduct and that the verdict is not vulnerable for that reason.

Mr. THURSTON. My colleague suggests a case which in my judgment is not in point, for the reason that in the case he states the judge of the court is the determining power, and the case he states predicates that the judge overrules the objection to the juror.

Mr. ALLEN. No; not at all.

Mr. THURSTON. The judge is the determining power.

Mr. ALLEN. Let us take this case. A and B are trying a case before a jury of 12 men in a court of record. It is known to counsel and to the parties at the time the jury is impaneled that one juror is not a citizen of the State or of the United States. That is capable of proof. The judge himself knows nothing about it. With that knowledge they try the case and a verdict is rendered. A motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial is made. It is made to appear upon the motion by competent evidence that the parties to the case and their counsel knew before the jury was finally impaneled and the case finally submitted that this man was not a citizen. I submit to my colleague that under those circumstances—while I am a juror in this case and express no opinion with reference to its merits—the rule is universal, without exception, that the parties are estopped by their previous knowledge.

Mr. FRYE. Is that true in a capital case?

Mr. ALLEN. In a great many States it is true in capital cases. But this is not a capital case, I infer. It is ordinary litigation legislation.

Mr. THURSTON. The cutting off of a political head can hardly be compared with cutting off the head of an individual.

But my colleague does not state a case in point, for, by his very statement, if the judge goes on with the jury as to the disqualifications of one member of which there is testimony, the judge thereby adjudicates upon that question of fact.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to my colleague at this point that whatever form the facts may assume, the senate of Delaware either by affirmative or negative action has adjudicated upon the question of the qualification of its membership.

Mr. THURSTON. I will come to that point shortly. I understand perfectly well that there is a question of disputed fact in this case, and I shall endeavor fairly to discuss and consider as to whether or not, after what I term an adjudication of a vacancy in that office, there was a reconsideration of that act. I shall discuss that question fairly at the proper time.

Mr. President, suppose the senate of the State of Delaware should declare by resolution that one member of that body was not qualified under the constitution. When it establishes the fact, the declaration amounts to a full, complete judgment of ouster.

Mr. ALLEN. Will my colleague permit me at this point?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose an individual is holding an office by virtue of an election or an apparent election. As a matter of fact he has not been elected, but that fact has not been adjudicated. Does he not hold his office until such time as some tribunal determines that he was not elected?

Mr. THURSTON. Unquestionably.

Mr. ALLEN. And ousts him in fact as distinguished——

Mr. THURSTON. All that has nothing to do with this proposition, because I concede that there must be a tribunal which pronounces judgment, or at least takes action, which is equivalent to pronouncing judgment, that the party is no longer entitled to hold or perform the duties of his office.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand my colleague to say that the discovery of the finding of the fact by some tribunal that the senator was only 20 years of age when he should be 27 ipso facto created a vacancy. Now, if that be true, would not the discovery of the fact that an individual who claimed to be elected by virtue of a popular vote had not been elected ipso facto create a vacancy there? In other words, he claims by color of law, by color of title, that he holds the office either de jure or de facto until such time as a competent tribunal declares an ouster in fact.

Mr. THURSTON. I go a little further than the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] the other day said he was willing to go. I admit that a party coming into office as senator in the senate of the State of Delaware and being admitted there will be presumed to have the necessary constitutional qualification until such time as there is established—established, I say, not by outside rumor, not by the town-crier, not by a justice of the peace, but established by that tribunal itself—those facts which constitute ineligibility to that office.

Mr. GRAY. That is, by the senate of Delaware.

Mr. THURSTON. By the senate of Delaware. So I say when they declare that a member of their body died yesterday and spread that on the record, it is a judgment of ouster or a judgment of vacancy. I would hardly call it a judgment of ouster, because I have no possible idea as to whether or not a deceased senator can come back and participate in the proceedings of the body that he has left. But it is a judgment of vacancy, and thereafter, in determining as to how many men can sit and vote in that body, reference must be had to that declaration and that adjudication that one man is dead; and the establishment of the death upon the record establishes the vacancy in and of itself.

So I say, in the case at bar, that if the constitution of the State be as I think it is, if it be true (and I am merely predicating this argument at present on the assumption which I make that it is true) that the constitution of the State of Delaware does not permit a man who is sworn in as governor of the State longer to sit and exercise the functions of State senator, then when the Senate establishes by its records that he has been sworn in as governor it is just like the establishment of the fact of his death.

Mr. ALLEN. Will my colleague permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to my colleague that the simile he makes, in which he says the ascertainment that the disqualified senator of Delaware was disqualified would be similar to a case of death, is, in my judgment, unsound in this respect. In the one case there is a man in esse, a being endowed with all the faculties of a man, exercising in fact and discharging the duties of the office of senator. In the other case there is an absolute vacancy by death; there is no body or anything else in existence. Therefore I call my colleague's attention to the fact that there is some difficulty with the simile.

Mr. THURSTON. If the officer officially dies it does not make any difference that the man walks and is still on earth. It is just the same in one case as in another.

Mr. ALLEN. If my colleague will permit me——

Mr. THURSTON. I wish to say that while I am willing to yield for suggestion or inquiry, as I stated, I do not care to yield for detailed argument.

Mr. ALLEN. I will not interrupt my colleague after this.

Mr. THURSTON. If the Senator from Nebraska wishes to ask me any question or to make any pertinent suggestion, he can do so. The Senator will have time for his argument. I do not care to yield to that in detail.

Mr. ALLEN. I am a juror and my colleague is the lawyer. I, as a juror seeking enlightenment, wish to put a question to the lawyer.

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly; I yield to any question.

Mr. ALLEN. The question is whether it would not require, in the case my colleague mentions, the order of the senate creating a vacancy in the case of the living individual occupying the office, as the hand of death created the vacancy in the other case. Would it not require some action on the part of the senate? I beg my colleague's pardon; I shall not interrupt him any more.

Mr. THURSTON. There must be, in my judgment, simply an establishment of the disqualifying fact by the body in which he sits as a member. When that body establishes and puts upon its record the disqualification itself, the results follow, the same as when a man is dead he does not come back. When they declare that he is no longer officially qualified to sit in the senate, he may be there in body, but he is not there as an officer. He may lift his voice, but it will not be in parliamentary debate. He may vote, but his vote is like the wind outside. It is not a part of the proceedings of the senate of the State of Delaware.

I insist that the senate of the State of Delaware not only established by affirmative action the disqualification of Mr. Watson further to sit as a member of that body, but that it did pronounce a judgment of ouster absolutely, or else you can not give to the plain and explicit language which was used by that legislative body any reasonable interpretation. I have understood that it is never presumed—and that is the established law of the land—that a legislative body uses a sentence or a word except for a purpose. Members of bodies may use superfluous words and for very little purpose, but when the body acts it is always held that every word employed has a purpose and a meaning, and they must be given their plain intent and meaning in their construction.

Now, on the 9th day of April, 1895, the senate resolved:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Delaware in general assembly met, That the members of the general assembly have heard with the deepest sorrow of the death of his excellency, Joshua H. Marvil, late governor of the State of Delaware;

There they declare a vacancy in the office of governor. Now, Senators will agree with me that no other or further judgment was necessary upon that point completely and thoroughly and irrevocably to establish the fact that there was a vacancy in the office of governor. They did not say so; they did not say, "There is a vacancy because the governor is dead." They said, "The governor is dead." The vacancy was there because he was dead.

Now, what else did they do?

Resolved, That the Hon. James L. Wolcott, chancellor, be, and he is hereby, invited to administer the appropriate oaths of office to William Tharp Watson, speaker of the senate, who, by reason of the death of the governor, the Hon. Joshua Hopkins Marvil, shall, under the constitution, exercise the office of governor until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

They established the death. They directed the oath of office as governor to be administered in the presence of the senate to that man whom the constitution had pointed out as the successor of the governor in the exercise of that office. What else? William T. Watson rose before the senate and, as appears by the record, solemnly swore, among other things:

That I will perform the duties of the office of governor of the State of Delaware with fidelity.

Now what else? The senate had established the death of the governor; it had sworn in one of its members as governor, and what else? The record further goes on:

Thereupon the speaker called Mr. Pyle to the chair, and retired from the senate chamber.

Mr. PALMER. May I be permitted to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question at this point?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Does the Senator believe that it was at all necessary to the accession by Mr. Watson to the exercise of the office of governor that he should have taken any oath whatever? In other words, does not the Senator believe that the constitution casts the exercise of the office of governor upon the speaker of the senate ex officio, and that the oath taken by him was entirely unnecessary?

Mr. THURSTON. I have not deemed it necessary to pursue that inquiry. I cited the administration of the oath simply for the purpose of showing what was done in the presence of the senate of Delaware, and the declaration thereby of the senate that Mr. Watson had succeeded to the duties of the office of governor.

Thereupon the speaker called Mr. Pyle to the chair and retired from the senate chamber.

Why spread that upon the record? Mr. Watson had been in the senate day after day, and I have no doubt he had retired from the senate a hundred times, and yet never was any official notice taken of it. He had gone out and had come in and yet it was never spread upon the records. What else? Here I come to what I consider to be most vital action on the part of that senate. Mr. Watson was governor; had taken the oath; had retired from the senate; was in possession of the governor's office. His associates spread upon the record the fact that they had ushered him out of the senate. What else?

Mr. Pierce offered a resolution, which, on his motion, was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the thanks of the senate are eminently due, and are hereby tendered, to Hon. William T. Watson, speaker of the senate, for the courtesy, intelligence, impartiality, and fidelity which have uniformly characterized the discharge of the delicate and responsible duties of said office."

Why pass that resolution if he still remained a member of that body and was entitled to sit with them for two years more? Mr. President, we build no monuments to the quick; we inscribe no epitaphs for the living, and neither do we place upon the records of official life our eulogiums to those who hold high position until the hour of the termination of their office has come. Not during but at the end of an official career do our associates testify to the fidelity of the performance of the functions of the position, and we are extremely fortunate if they do it then.

All this is material because it shows, in my judgment, what every citizen of the State of Delaware believed; it shows what the purpose of the senate was in taking this action; it shows what its idea was of the result of that action, for it shows that as senator of that body they had bid him good-bye and godspeed, had resolved to his virtues; and when he went out of that senate chamber it is useless to pretend that his associates ever expected to welcome him back there on any day or in any hour as a member of that senate, to sit with them and act with them and vote with them for any purpose or upon any measure.

The Senator from the State of Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] grew eloquent the other day in showing that four men retiring, as this man retired from the legislative halls to take the office of governor, had, after their functions as governor ceased, come back and resumed their seat and place again. And he says that it is a strong argument, and he waxed eloquent upon it, to show the interpretation, settled and fixed, that the people of the State of Delaware have placed upon their constitution. Yet, sir, how much stronger is it that his own associates in the senate bid him good-bye, put upon the record that he had left? They inducted him into one office and ushered him out of the other and said, "Good-bye; God bless you; you have been a good officer."

Mr. HOAR. "Don't you come back here again."

Mr. THURSTON. Yes; "Don't you come back here again." Not only that, but the further admission is upon the record that of the whole 10 men who had left the senate or the house and had been inducted into the office of governor during one hundred and two years of Delaware life never a one of them, while he exercised the office of governor, sat for one moment again in the seat that he vacated when he went into the office of governor, never voted upon a measure, never asked the right to act as senator, never after signing an executive commission on one side of the capitol slipped over into his seat in the senate and voted there. Not only that, but of the 10 men who were called from the legislative to the executive office not one of them, including William T. Watson, ever drew a cent of pay as senator of the State of Delaware for any of the hours he spent in the executive office.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. But did draw the governor's salary.

Mr. THURSTON. But did draw the salary as governor. Yet the Senator from Indiana appeals to our reason to show that a hundred years of Delaware interpretation is to be respected by the Senate of the United States. If that be so, then I appeal to the Senate of the United States to respect that same hundred years of interpretation which compelled every man who went from the legislative to the executive office to remain out of the senate of Delaware so long as he remained governor.

Why, sir, the people of the State of Delaware inherited from the mother land the good old principles of the common law that no man could hold two incompatible offices at the same time. And, notwithstanding the fact that the illiteracy of the East has been referred to on this floor to-day, I guarantee that there was not a man in the State of Delaware who did not in his simple mind, or his learned mind if you please, know and believe that no man in that State under the common law had any right to sit as governor one hour, as senator the next hour, and to alternate from one office to another as his will or his fancy might dictate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The governor himself in this case states that he did not believe he had any right.

Mr. THURSTON. Yes, and the governor himself, as the uncontradicted affidavits show in this case, did not himself believe when he went back and undertook to assume the duties of that office that he had any right there. Two of his associates swear that he told them so just before he attempted the rôle of the usurper. He told them so, and he does not contradict it.

It is a little out of place here, but the Senator from Indiana quibbles and cavils at the fact that vote after vote was taken that day in the joint assembly, as if a man who was elected on one vote is not certainly elected on twenty-eight. But he said that the second vote was taken because of the hope, and the third vote was taken because of the hope, and each succeeding vote was taken because of the hope—yes, each succeeding vote was taken because of the hope, fruitless in this case—that a Democratic governor of the State of Delaware would at some time in that proceeding see fit to cease the violation of the constitution of his State and obey the law. That was the hope that held them there voting for twenty-eight consecutive times, the hope that at some time in that proceeding he would remember the oath, sworn before Almighty God, to obey the constitution of the State of Delaware; the hope that at some hour in that joint convention William T. Watson would be guided by his own conscience, and not, as he says he was, by the direction of his party managers.

Mr. PALMER. Does the Senator think they were inspired by that hope during all that time?

Mr. THURSTON. Sir, the Republicans in Delaware, like the rest of the country, have long ago ceased to hope for any reform or goodness from the Democratic party.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, if he will allow me, in this connection.

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. So far as he is informed during all that long senatorial contest, which occupied months, and they came certainly on one day so near an election that Mr. Higgins would have been chosen if his men had all been there, did any newspaper of any part of the country anywhere count Governor Watson in estimating the probable votes as among the resources of the Democratic candidate? In the estimate of the probabilities of the numbers on one side or on the other up to that hour had they ever counted him?

Mr. GRAY. Allow me to say that, as a matter of fact, he was never counted out of the probabilities on any side by any class of newspapers or by any class of public men.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Nebraska will pardon me. I did not mean to interrupt his argument.

Mr. THURSTON. It may be that he was counted by those same party managers who finally induced him to come back.

Mr. GRAY. By the party managers of both parties he was counted in as a potential factor in that election.

Mr. HOAR. The point whether he was counted by the newspapers of the whole country——

Mr. GRAY. Oh, I know nothing about what was done in regard to that outside of Delaware.

Mr. HOAR. I think I know about it, out and in both.

Mr. GRAY. I know about it in the State. I do not speak about what was said outside.

Mr. HOAR. The newspapers of the whole country, including Delaware, had the reports of those votes from day to day, until the final vote was taken for Senator, and statements that the political complexion of those men might be bent, but so far as I have ever heard and so far as I believe in saying there will be so many Republicans and so many Addicks men and so many Democrats, nobody ever reckoned upon this governor's vote until he made that bargain with these four men that he would come in and vote if they would see that the result of the bargain was obtained.

Mr. GRAY. That is not true in Delaware. It may be true as to statements made outside, but it is not true in Delaware.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon for the interruption.

Mr. THURSTON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PALMER. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. Was there ever a time from the beginning of the balloting until the 9th of May when the vote of Senator Watson would have elected a Democrat?

Mr. HOAR. No; and there was not a time from the 9th of April to that day when he had any constitutional right to give it.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I have more confidence in the newspapers than I have in politicians, and should hate to believe that any reputable newspaper of the United States ever supposed for a single day during which that joint convention was held that the governor of the State of Delaware was a constitutional shuttlecock, to flit hither and thither between the governor's office and the senate.

It is said, however, and a very specious argument is built up therefrom, that William T. Watson did not become governor of the State of Delaware, and the whole pivotal point in the argument of the Senator from Indiana rests upon that assertion. He iterated and reiterated that he did not become the governor of the State of Delaware. Well, he took the oath as governor, the same oath that the man took whom he succeeded. He occupied the same office; he performed every act and every duty that the other man did or could perform. Not only that, but, as was suggested, he was called governor, not as I was once called judge, because my opponent was elected, but he was called governor because he was governor and in the office and exercising its powers; and not only that, but I venture to say, and I do not think anybody will deny it, that after he went into the governor's office he signed every commission, every message, every official document as governor.

Do Senators pretend to tell me he was simply speaker of the senate of the State of Delaware exercising the functions of governor? Did he ever sign a commission in that way, with that title? Never. It is claimed that he was holding simply as presiding officer of the senate, and yet, sir, under the constitution he may have been required to act as governor, under contingencies likely to arise, long after the expiration of the constitutional term as speaker of the senate. For it might well be that while he was still exercising the office no election of a governor at the next general election should be had, or that the man elected then might die before qualifying, or refuse to qualify. It is not necessary to show that this contingency did happen. It is only necessary to test the question by showing that it might have happened, and that Mr. Watson might, under the constitution, which directed him to exercise the office of governor until his successor was elected by the people and qualified, remain governor months, even years, after the expiration of his term as senator. Not only that, but suppose the governor elected by the people at the next general election failed to qualify, a new legislature would come in and they would elect a new president of the senate, and William T. Watson's term as senator would be over, yet he would still, under the direction of that constitution, perform the duties of the executive office until a governor elected by the people should qualify. Do gentlemen pretend to tell me that if that contingency should happen, and the new legislature, of which he was not a member, should come in and be organized and elect a president of the senate, the new president of the senate could go into the governor's office and turn William T. Watson out? No, sir. He is not directed to go in there as an officer; it is simply the specification of one particular individual, by office, upon whom the mantle of the executive shall fall in a certain emergency; that is all.

But the Senator from Indiana says that in all cases the governor elected by the people is called governor in the constitution, and the man who comes in to fill his unexpired term is not called governor in the constitution, but is referred to as the person exercising the duties of governor. Let us see. Section 5 of Article III of the constitution of Delaware provides that—

> No member of Congress nor person holding any office under the United States or this State—

What? Shall be governor? No—> shall exercise the office of governor.

The same language; and yet the Senator from Indiana says that the constitution does not refer to the speaker of the senate, after he comes into the office, as governor, because he is not governor. Well, sir, if the constitution of Delaware does not mean governor when it refers to the person exercising the duties of that office, then that provision of the constitution could not refer to the governor, but could refer only to William T. Watson, or to whoever came in in case of a vacancy to exercise the duties of the office; and therefore if the gentleman is right, if the constitution when it says "governor" refers to the governor by election, and when it says "person exercising the duties of the office" means simply the temporary man, this section 5 does not refer to the governor elected by the people, but it refers and can only refer and must refer to the man who comes in there to exercise that office in case of a vacancy; and then the constitution will read:

> No person holding any office under this State shall exercise the office of governor in case of a vacancy under the constitution.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I understand the Senator to assert that no senator can be governor. Is it not true that the constitution says that in certain cases a senator shall be governor?

Mr. THURSTON. I will admit that there is a provision of promotion, but that is all it is, in my judgment. It is not a warrant to exercise the two offices at the same time. But that does not get away from the proposition I addressed to the Senator from Indiana, who insisted that this constitution in some places said governor and in others referred to the exercise of the office of governor; and who said that when it said "governor" it always meant the governor elected by the people, and when it said "exercise the office of governor" it always meant the man who came in to fill a vacancy, and therefore this interpretation is true. The constitution expressly declares that no State officer, no man holding any office under the State, shall exercise the office of governor.

Mr. President, I do not insist upon the refined and subtle distinction as made by the Senator from Indiana. I prefer to be generous and not hold him to the application of his own doctrine. Without reviewing in detail all the places wherein these terms are used in the constitution, it is perfectly evident and apparent to any man who has had to do with the construction of laws and constitutions that the constitution uses the term "governor" and the words "exercise the office of governor" as interchangeable, meaning the same, applied to the same individual. The governor elected by the people is one of the men "exercising the office of governor" who shall hold no other State office; the man who comes in to fill a vacancy is also exercising the office of governor, and therefore, by express provision and specification, is also the man who shall hold no other State office. I insist that there is no clause in that constitution which authorizes a senator of that State, as senator or while senator, to hold or exercise the office of governor of that State.

Mr. PEFFER. Now, will the Senator at that point refer to the constitutional provision which I marked out for his attention some time ago? I think it comes in place right there.

Mr. THURSTON. I will do so: "That no person shall hold more than one of the following offices at the same time, to wit"——

Mr. PEFFER. That is it.

Mr. THURSTON. "Treasurer, attorney-general," etc., "register, or sheriff."

Mr. PEFFER. Does not that exclude all other offices?

Mr. THURSTON. Oh, not at all, Mr. President; that does not limit the common law in any respect. It will be seen by a careful analysis of the duties and responsibilities of the offices specified that they are all executive offices and might not be incompatible one with the other, or they might be.

Mr. PEFFER. But the word "executive" does not appear.

Mr. THURSTON. But the proposition still holds good that the common law is enforced in the State of Delaware unless it is modified or limited by constitutional provisions, and that is not a limitation of it. That does not declare that the legislative and executive offices are not incompatible one with the other. The whole theory of our Government is built upon the superstructure of the parceling out of the three great powers of government that reside, in the first instance, in the people. It has been from the very first the aim and the purpose of the fathers, and of all succeeding generations, to retain by constitutional provision a clear demarkation, well defined and insurmountable, between the exercise of the functions of one of these great branches of the Government and the other. For, Mr. President, under the government of despotism they were all vested in and exercised by one person. The one supreme head made the law; the one supreme head interpreted the law and pronounced judgment, and the same supreme head executed the judgment. That was despotism. Our fathers laid out a government of liberty, and they found that liberty could not be preserved to the people except by separating these three great powers of government and vesting them in different officials. Sir, when the time shall come that the people of this country are ready to strike down these great bulwarks of constitutional liberty and commence to permit the exercise of any two of its distinct powers and functions in the person of one man, that day the disintegration of popular constitutional government has begun. That day the era of despotism is already in sight. The bulwark of liberty is in the demarkation between these great powers of the Government—legislative, executive, and judicial—and I challenge these gentlemen to find me, except for mere temporary purposes, wherein any constitution in this country has permitted that the functions of these several branches of the Government, fundamental in their distinction one from the other, have been recommingled and brought together in the person of one man. It is fundamental in our theory of our Government; it needs no constitutional provision.

The people of this country know, thank God, that it is incompatible for one man to be the executive and the legislature, and if it is incompatible for one man to be the executive and the legislature so it is also pro tanto an impossibility for one man to be a part of the executive and a part of the legislative branches of the Government at the same time. We aim to prevent it. We have asserted that the limitation exists in all the States, from ocean to ocean, and stands as the law understood of all men.

I grant you, sir, that there are cases of mere temporary moment when it is permitted, from the very necessity of the case, that one man shall perform two distinct duties and hold two distinct offices, but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the constitution of the State of Delaware has not, in any place, provided for any of those mere temporary, passing, limited, fleeting emergencies. There is not a provision in the constitution of the State which provides for the exercise of the office of governor by any man when the governor is out of the State temporarily or is sick. There is no provision in your constitution, so far as I have discovered, which provides for any of those mere incidental and temporary vacancies. If there is it certainly is not the provision under consideration in this case.

Mr. PEFFER. Would not such a case be included under the word "inability"?

Mr. THURSTON. I shall come to that in a moment. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests that there is no provision for filling his office when he is duck hunting. [Laughter.] I ask the Senator from Delaware does he know of any provision of the constitution which provides for any mere temporary performance of the duties of the office of governor on account of an inability not producing a vacancy in the office?

Mr. GRAY. None at all. If the Senator will pardon me—for I do not wish to interrupt him in the course of his argument—I think there is not only no provision in the constitution providing for such a temporary exercise of the office not amounting to a vacancy, but that there is nothing in the constitution within its four corners that is even capable of having the inference drawn from it that there is anything provided for except a vacancy upon the emergency described in the constitution.

If the Senator will allow me, while I am on my feet I will say—I did not wish to interrupt him, but have been enjoying his argument by listening—he was speaking a moment ago of the universality (I am not using his exact language) of the American doctrine of incompatibility, and stated that there was nowhere between the oceans any instance of a governor exercising the legislative power, or a legislature usurping the executive power, or one person seeking to exercise a part of the one or the other, and the Senator dwelt very eloquently on that general fact——

Mr. THURSTON. I did not make it quite that broad; but I ask a citation of any such case.

Mr. GRAY. In Rhode Island, in 1842, a constitution for that State was adopted—how long it continued in force I am not able to tell the Senator or the Senate—but in it we find that so far from regarding the office of governor and member of the legislature or the exercise of the executive and legislative powers as incompatible, it expressly provides that—

The governor, and in his absence the lieutenant-governor, shall preside in the senate and in grand committee—

Whatever that may be—

The presiding officer of the senate and grand committee shall have a right to vote in case of equal division, but not otherwise.

That is, the governor shall have a right to vote in case of equal division.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me a moment—I did not like to interrupt the course of his argument wherein he so eloquently stated the American doctrine of incompatibility of offices connected with the different branches of the Government, but since the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, I ask to make this statement: The Senator from Nebraska said that it needed no constitutional affirmation to establish this division of the three branches of the Government. The Senator did not mean that there were no such constitutional affirmations, for, as I shall take occasion to show, feebly following in the footsteps of the Senator from Nebraska, there are express provisions to that effect in 39 of our 45 State constitutions, and in nearly every one of the 39 cases there is the express provision, not only for the division of powers, but that no person or collection of persons belonging to any one branch of the Government shall exercise any of the functions belonging to any other branch of the Government. To this there are six exceptions. Delaware is one of them; New York is one of them; Pennsylvania is one of them; but I submit to the Senator from Nebraska and to the Senator from Delaware that those exceptions were not because the principle was not the same in those States, but because it had become a universal, fundamental American principle. There is no such clause in the Constitution of the United States, for illustration, for the Constitution of the United States contains no bill of rights, no laying down in its original draft of fundamental principles, but here are these 39 cases out of 45, and the Senator from Delaware has discovered, with all his diligence in this direction, that out of the 45 States where this principle prevails, in Rhode Island, down as late as 1842, there was this commingling of offices in that one case, and in 1844, when they adopted the new constitution in Rhode Island, they inserted the same provision. Now, I ask the Senator from Delaware whether in all his researches he has found any other case where the governor of a State at the same time has ever acted as a member of the legislature?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, we are both presuming upon the extreme indulgence of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. THURSTON. Not at all.

Mr. GRAY. I merely rose for the purpose of calling the Senator's attention, if perchance he had forgotten it in the heat of his argument, to the fact that there should be no inherent incompatibility, in the American sense, between the exercise to a limited degree of legislative and executive functions by the same person, inasmuch as we had in an American State constitution, that we admitted to be consonant with the American spirit, this instance of the express devolution of both legislative and executive functions upon the same individual.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall have the pleasure, I hope, in my argument, to convince the Senator from Delaware that the Rhode Island case proves the rule, and, instead of breaking down this great principle of American constitutional law, which has been so magnificently vindicated by the Senator from Nebraska, this case in little Rhode Island proves the rule. Hence it was that I wanted to ask the Senator from Delaware right here and now whether he has found any other case?

Mr. GRAY. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. Has the Senator found any other case?

Mr. GRAY. I do not want to trespass further on the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator can answer that question, and then I shall sit down. Has the Senator found any other case?

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] has the floor.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has used such delightful adjectives in his reference to me that I am willing to give him all the time he desires.

I did not intend to have it understood, in presenting the general proposition of the division of powers under our form of Government, that there might not be isolated cases wherein the people of some State had thought it would be entirely safe to a limited extent, and guarded by constitutional provisions, to let one man occasionally exercise some of the functions of both kinds of office, and I imagine that in Rhode Island the people of that State live so neighborly and so close together that they had an idea that they could keep their eyes on all their officers at all times of the day.

Mr. GRAY. That was the way in Delaware.

Mr. THURSTON. And that was the way in Delaware. It seems, however, that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty" in Delaware.

Mr. President, I address myself to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], and I do it for the purpose of emphasizing the proposition that under the true construction of the constitution of Delaware it will not be found, and can not be found, that the people of that State ever intended that, after the transfer of the speaker of the senate to the executive office, he should still remain in the performance of his duties as senator. The constitution provides:

If upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor—

I am indebted to the Senator from Delaware for his very frank and explicit statement that he agrees with me in my understanding of the meaning of that provision. The constitution makers of Delaware did not provide, and did not intend to provide, in that instrument anywhere for the mere case of any temporary absence or inability of the governor to perform the duties of his office. They limited the induction of another man into that position expressly and solely to a case when a vacancy occurred. That vacancy can only be a vacancy of one of four kinds specified and limited in the constitution. It must be a vacancy caused by death, by resignation, by removal, or by the inability of the governor. I grant that the constitution of Delaware might have provided that during the inability of the governor So-and-So might perform the duties of the office—and that is substantially the provision we have in some of our Western States; I presume in Kansas, and I know in Nebraska—that a certain designated official shall temporarily perform the duties of or act as governor; but Delaware made no provision for that kind of a case. It only provided that where that inability resulted in a vacancy in the office it should be filled, and in the last clause of that provision of the constitution is the declaration that I consider very material:

The governor shall not be removed from his office for inability but with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

In my judgment—and in that I may possibly be wrong—a vacancy in the office of governor of Delaware by reason of inability can not be established in any other way than by the exercise of the power of the legislature set forth in that provision; in other words, a governor may lie at the point of death; he may be carried off by the public enemy; he may be paralyzed, speechless, powerless, and yet there is no vacancy in that office, and there can not be a vacancy in that office until the constitutional authority establishes it under that constitutional provision. That is the most natural thing in the world.

Who would be the man to say when inability had reached the point which would create a vacancy in that office? The doctor? By what authority? The speaker of the senate, seeking the office? How? He would be a mere usurper if he undertook to enter upon the performance of the duties of the office of governor unless and until there had been established in a constitutional way a vacancy in that office. The constitution provides that it shall be determined by two-thirds of the legislature, but nothing is filled until a vacancy happens. When a vacancy happens, we are all agreed that the former governor, whether he is dead or has resigned, or whether he has reached that point of inability which may create the vacancy, can never go back into that office unless he is reelected by the people. That is the constitution. Whenever that emergency happens the executive term is ended, done, complete; and from that hour, and until a new governor is elected by the people and duly qualified, there is one continuous vacancy in that office for the whole remainder of the term. It can not be shortened. The man whom the constitution puts in there to be governor when the vacancy happens remains there for the whole time, and he can not be dislodged by the return and the demand of the governor whose inability produced the vacancy. The old governor, who has been declared to be under inability sufficient to constitute a vacancy in office, never comes back and raps upon the door with power of official demand.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator whether he is making his argument based upon the peculiar provision of the constitution of Delaware, and assuming the case of which he speaks, that the disability or vacancy has been actually declared by the legislature?

Mr. THURSTON. Oh, no; I am not assuming that. I do not need to reach that point as to whether the vacancy has been declared in this case. They said he was dead, and therefore there was a vacancy.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not speaking about this case, but the general argument of the Senator. I agree with him if the legislature declares a vacancy and if the person designated by the constitution assumes the office of governor, that the governor who has been ousted, so to speak, by the declaration of the legislature, can not get back into office—certainly he can not get back without action on the part of the legislature restoring him; but I do not agree with the argument of the Senator from Nebraska that in no case, under no constitution, where a governor once ceases to act, although he is a living governor, he never can get back, and I take the case which was suggested to me by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, the same case to which the Senator from Nebraska has alluded, where there is a capture of the governor by the public enemy.

Mr. THURSTON. The Senator misunderstands me in my presentation. In the Delaware plan their governor may go over to New York and stay a week; he may be captured and carried off by the enemy. That does not necessarily, and of itself, create a vacancy in that office; and I insist that the vacancy can not be created except by a determination of the legislature that the inability has reached that point where it does exist.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call the Senator's attention to the inconvenience, so to speak, of that argument. Of course this is all a remote field of speculation; but if the governor is taken sick, he can not call the legislature to meet if it is not in session; if the governor is captured by the public enemy, he can not call the legislature together to declare the vacancy; and hence the Senator's argument would seem to leave Delaware without an executive in two cases, we will say of the insanity of the executive or the capture of the executive. That may possibly be so under the peculiar provisions of the Delaware constitution, or on account of omissions in the Delaware constitution; but I do not understand it to be a public law or public constitutional law of the various States of the Union.

Mr. THURSTON. Almost every State with whose constitution I am familiar has an express provision, which is entirely wanting in the Delaware constitution, for the mere temporary exercise of the duties of the office of governor in case the governor is out of the State or sick.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me a moment on that point, I will say that I think there can be no question at all that the express provisions of the constitution of Delaware settle this matter precisely as the Senator from Nebraska states it. In the first place, it declares in section 14 of Article III:

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability—

They are all there together—the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

While the last clause of the same section provides:

The governor shall not be removed from his office for inability but with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

So the inability must be declared by a two-thirds vote to make a permanent vacancy; but when that vacancy is created and the speaker of the senate succeeds to the exercise of the office of governor, he is there until his successor is elected by the people and qualifies.

Mr. THURSTON. Unquestionably that is the constitution of Delaware. However unfortunate it might be in an emergency, there is no constitutional provision for any mere temporary exercise of the office of governor of Delaware such as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] points out.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not now undertaking to controvert that proposition as to the Delaware constitution, but I do call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact, which I have verified by very careful examination, that nearly all the State constitutions, although they have many provisions generally the same, are diverse in their various methods of providing for establishing vacancies in the office of governor and of filling them.

Mr. THURSTON. In almost every other State of this Union, in fact in all, so far as I know or have had occasion to examine, the constitution does provide somebody to act, and tells how he shall act and when he shall act in every case of temporary absence or inability.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to add one other fact, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, to which I call the attention of our excellent friend from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], who is trying to keep his mind in a judicial frame in connection with this inquiry, and that is that the major part of the cases where there is this temporary provision are cases where a member of the executive department of the government, like the secretary of state, is empowered to exercise these powers temporarily, and not a case where an officer of the legislative branch of the government exercises them.

Mr. THURSTON. The usual provision is that some other executive officer shall perform the duties during the mere temporary absence or disqualification of the governor.

Mr. President, I have devoted myself, perhaps, more fully than necessary to establish the proposition that the constitution of Delaware only provided that the speaker of the senate should be inducted into the office of governor when a vacancy occurred, not a mere temporary vacancy, but a vacancy that extinguished the remainder of the term, but the point is especially important in view of the interpretation which is to be placed upon the provisions of the constitution of the State of Delaware with reference to the filling of that office by putting in the speaker of the senate. If it were a mere temporary vacancy of an hour or a day or a week or even a month, liable to be put an end to by the return of the original incumbent, it might well be that it would not be dangerous or improper to permit one man to exercise temporarily the duties of the two offices. But if there was a reason why the people of the State of Delaware saw fit or thought it necessary to prohibit by constitutional provision that one man should be the governor elected by the people and at the same time a senator in the legislature, the same reason exists with all its force as against the man who is called in to fill the whole remainder of the term. For it may be a year, two years, or, in a remote contingency, several years that he could stay in that office after being once sworn in. I say if the people of that State deemed it necessary to guard against the holding of the office of governor elected by the people and the office of senator elected by the people in the person of one man, it was equally important as a guard for their liberties that they should make the same provision apply to whatever man came into that office to hold it for that unexpired term. No Senator can point out to me any reason in the world why there was not and is not the same necessity of guarding against a combination of the exercise of those two offices in the person who fills out the balance of the term as there was to guard against it in the person of the man who was put in in the first instance.

Mr. PASCO. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. PASCO. I understand the Senator to claim that the speaker of the senate acts until the close of the term?

Mr. THURSTON. He acts until a governor elected by the people is qualified.

Mr. PASCO. And that may be before the close of the term?

Mr. THURSTON. It might or it might not.

Mr. PASCO. I understood the Senator to say——

Mr. THURSTON. As I argued earlier in my presentation, while in the ordinary course of affairs a general election would come on and the new governor would be elected and qualified before the term of the senator expired, yet under that further contingency provided for by the constitution the new governor might die before being qualified, or he might refuse to qualify, and therefore from year to year and for a half dozen years there might remain that one single vacancy, and the man in there would stay until a successor was elected by the people and duly qualified.

Mr. PASCO. It is to that point that I wish to direct the Senator's attention, because the language of the constitution is that he shall serve until there is an election of a governor by the people, and not until the close of the term. Delaware may have annual elections. It is evident from what I notice in the constitution that they have biennial elections. He might serve only a few months.

Mr. THURSTON. They do have general biennial elections, so that in the ordinary case I admit that the new governor would be elected within two years from the time of the vacancy. But in the contingency I state—and we must interpret the constitution in view of any contingency that may arise—he might have to remain in the office long beyond the period of his term as senator and for a longer time even than the original governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Nebraska will allow me. It is shown in this case that four out of the ten men who succeeded to the exercise of the office of governor did hold for a considerable length of time beyond the expiration of their terms as senators.

Mr. PASCO. The vacancy might occur in the middle of the second year. He would then only discharge the duties of the governor's office for a few months. As I understand it, the term of a senator is four years, so that for two years after, and until the end of the senatorial term, the senator might act as senator and speaker of the senate after the duly elected governor had entered upon his office.

Mr. THURSTON. In the actual case before the Senate Mr. Watson had less than two years to serve as senator at the time the vacancy happened, and he would have held the governor's office at least until the next annual election; I think until the next biennial election. But in any event it is true that under the constitution, in the happening of emergencies thereby provided for, the man may be put in that office to stay there beyond the expiration of his senatorial term.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me for a moment?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. In the case of Governor Watson it will be necessary for him in the ordinary course of procedure to remain governor some three months after his original senatorial term expires.

Mr. THURSTON. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. And again, for the benefit of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], I wish to state that in no case has a governor ever gone back to be speaker of the senate. Does the Senator from Nebraska understand me to be right in this respect, that in no case has the governor gone back to be speaker of the senate? The cases cited are those where the governor has gone back and again acted as senator.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. But not as speaker.

Mr. CHANDLER. But never as speaker; never as presiding officer of the senate. That office has gone forever when he takes the oath as governor.

Mr. PASCO. I was not calling attention to that fact, but to the requirement of the constitution that the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall have duly qualified, and he may be duly qualified in two months. There may then be an opportunity for the senator to go back to the speakership and his ordinary senatorial work, and he does not, as the Senator from Nebraska stated, necessarily serve in all cases until the end of his term. That is the point to which I wished to direct attention.

Mr. THURSTON. No; I said until the end of the governor's term.

Mr. PASCO. It is not until the end of the governor's term.

Mr. THURSTON. Not necessarily to the end of the original governor's term, but in the case before the Senate——

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly. The Senator from Kansas will permit me to make one statement first, however. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] refers to the fact that in this exact case Senator Watson's term as senator would expire under the constitution before the new governor would be elected and qualified. I hardly agree with the Senator as to the time, however. While Senator Watson was elected at the fall election of 1892, under the constitution he would not take his seat as senator until the first Tuesday of January following, and therefore I think that Senator Watson's actual term was from the first Tuesday of January, 1893, until the first Tuesday of January, 1897, while the governor elected at the same biennial election under the constitution is to qualify and be inducted into his office on the third Tuesday in January. Therefore in the case before the Senate there could be no election of a new governor until the fall election of 1896, this year, and he would go into office under the constitution on the third Tuesday of January following. And in the precise case before the Senate the term of the senator necessarily would expire before the governor would come in.

Mr. PASCO. It would seem to me that the governor elected to fill a vacancy might come into office directly after the election is held, and in that case he would not necessarily be obliged to wait until the January following before qualifying. It would be an election to fill a vacancy.

Mr. THURSTON. I am aware that that contention might prevail. I do not wish to say that it could not, although it would appear that as the constitution provides that the election shall take place at the regular annual election, the other provisions of the constitution with respect to the inauguration of a governor would also apply.

Mr. PEFFER. Will the Senator from Nebraska now permit me?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator from Nebraska is discussing the pivotal point in this whole question, if I understand it, and it is very important that we understand one another concerning the meaning of the word "vacancy," and also of the word "inability," and of the other words that are used in connection with the word "vacancy." I understand the Senator from Nebraska to mean that no vacancy, as the word is used in the constitution of Delaware, happened except such a one as extends from the time of the happening until the end of the term.

Mr. THURSTON. No; as extends from the time of the happening until an election and qualification of a new governor.

Mr. PEFFER. That would be the end of the term of the officer?

Mr. THURSTON. It would be, in this case.

Mr. PEFFER. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. But it might not be, because if a governor were elected, his term is four years. A month after his election he dies. The vacancy would necessarily extend until his successor was elected at the next general election; and that is in two years, and not at the end of four years.

Mr. PEFFER. So I understand.

Now, the word "inability" is used in connection with the word "vacancy," and what I wish to get at just now is whether the Senator wishes to be understood as saying that the word "inability" can not, under a proper construction of the Delaware constitution, be anything else than such a continued disability as will reach to the end of the term of the particular office in question.

Mr. THURSTON. It can not be any other than such an inability as results in vacating the office. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] agrees with me that the constitution so provides; that it does not provide for any mere temporary filling of the office until that governor comes back. When the vacancy happens that governor is out.

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator will pardon me if I appear to be persistent, because I am exceedingly anxious to understand this subject.

Mr. THURSTON. I appreciate that.

Mr. PEFFER. How would the Senator dispose of a case of this kind: Suppose there were a temporary paralysis of the governor or a temporary aberration of mind, or something of that sort, which physicians would probably not regard as fatal or as continuing more than a month or two months or three months—would that be an inability according to the Senator's understanding of the word as used in this connection?

Mr. THURSTON. Unfortunately, and I think by common consent, it is agreed that there is no provision in the constitution of Delaware which provides for anybody to exercise the office of governor other than the governor elected by the people until the office is vacated, and the inability which would justify the induction of the speaker of the senate into the office of governor for the balance of the term must have reached that point where it creates and produces a vacancy in the office, and a vacancy once occurring it can only be filled in the constitutional way.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to an act of Congress passed on the 19th day of January, 1886, providing for successions to the exercise of the office of President in certain cases. It reads as follows:

That in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability—

The Senator will observe that the word "vacancy" does not occur.

Mr. THURSTON. I understand.

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator will see in a moment what I am driving at.

That in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President of the United States, the Secretary of State, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of the Treasury, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of War, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Attorney-General, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Postmaster-General, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of the Navy, or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of the Interior shall act as President until the disability of the President or Vice-President is removed or a President shall be elected.

Now, in that case, suppose that the President and Vice-President are both dead, or suppose, what would be a plainer case perhaps, that both of them are unable physically from one cause or another—suppose they are imprisoned, imprisoned by an enemy, or any other cause—to discharge the duties of the office, and the Secretary of State is placed in charge of the office. Does that fact vacate the office of Secretary of State?

Mr. THURSTON. In my judgment not. The Constitution of the United States is essentially and radically different, and provides for another class of cases for which the constitution of Delaware does not provide. The Constitution of the United States provides somebody to exercise the office in case of disability, and to exercise it until, and only until, the disability is removed, while the constitution of Delaware, using language that was unnecessary to have been used if it was simply intended to provide for that case, says that in case of vacancy on account of death, etc., or inability, the office shall be filled, not until the disability is removed, but until a governor elected by the people is qualified.

Mr. PEFFER. There is just one more question. Does the inability to which the Senator refers occur before a judgment by the legislature, of whom two-thirds are required to declare it?

Mr. THURSTON. I have an idea that if the inability were actual and the president of the senate saw fit to act on his own judgment and should enter into and assume the duties of that office, it would be held that his acts were valid. But the constitution provides no tribunal which shall determine when that vacancy or inability exists, except the legislature, and it is perfectly apparent that the constitution of Delaware has not taken into account any mere temporary incidental inability of the governor to perform the office.

Now, Mr. President, in view of the proposition that the new man coming into that office is necessarily to remain there as his predecessor would have remained, or at least for what may be a long term, covering more than one session of the legislature possibly, as I have said, if the people were justified in saying that it was dangerous, and so dangerous that it must be provided against, that one man in his own person at the same time should exercise the office of governor elected by the people and member of the legislature, it was also just as dangerous and just as much a case to be provided against that the same thing should not be done by the man whom the people have not elected to fill that office, for it may well be that they could more safely trust the man elected by the people than they could the man upon whom the duties of the office devolved.

But it was suggested the other day that Watson went into that office not as governor but as speaker of the senate. Who would have been impeached had he committed a high crime in the exercise of the office of governor? Would you have impeached the governor or the president of the senate? If impeachment lies against the president of the senate it can only lie against him for malfeasance in the office of speaker of the senate. It is probably true that impeachment does not lie against a senator as such. It seems to me that the mere statement of the proposition is conclusive that if William T. Watson had committed a high crime in the exercise of the office of governor it would have been the governor and the governor's office that would have been liable to impeachment, and not the senator and the senator's office. Unless this is so the person exercising the office of governor can not be impeached, no matter what high crimes he may commit.

I will somewhat abridge the latter part of my argument, owing to the fact that I have taken up more time than I had intended. I hasten on without pausing to more thoroughly discuss those provisions of the constitution which it seems to me specifically declare that these two duties, these two functions, these two offices, shall not be exercised simultaneously and at the same time by any one man.

Passing over those points, which have been so thoroughly discussed and so thoroughly presented before, I come to the contention of the other side, that by the senate of Delaware or by the joint convention after he became governor, William T. Watson was adjudicated back into the senate. That is the proposition. They insist that something took place in the senate or the joint convention of Delaware which, by a tribunal having exclusive jurisdiction, reestablished the right of William T. Watson to sit and vote as a senator.

In the early part of my argument the gentlemen upon the other side insisted that even the solemn spreading upon the records of the senate of established facts which in and of themselves constituted an inability to hold the office was not a judgment of ouster, and yet they turn now on this proposition and insist that a blank sheet, the absence of any record of the senate of Delaware in the nature of an adjudication of any kind, is a judgment that William T. Watson was voted back into the senate, and his right there passed upon by the senate of Delaware or the joint convention. William T. Watson was sworn in as governor on the 9th day of April, 1895, in the presence of the senate, his oath was spread upon the record, they bade him good-bye, and they put that also upon the record. They inducted him into the office of governor and they ushered him out of the office of senator and spread that upon the record.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. They passed a resolution thanking him.

Mr. THURSTON. They passed a resolution tendering him thanks. I do not know that the Senator from Oregon was in when I referred to that this morning.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. No; I was not in.

Mr. THURSTON. I said at that time, if I remember the language, that we do not build monuments to the quick nor inscribe epitaphs to the living. It is at the end of an official term, it always is, that we spread upon the records of official bodies the eulogium to the officer who has filled the place. They sent him out. They say he came back and his seat there was readjudicated. By what action? I turn to the pages of the journal of the senate of the State of Delaware and they are not written upon in that respect. They have not spoken. The gentlemen upon the other side who insist upon the finality of a judgment which does not appear on the record at all insist upon establishing that judgment by affidavit.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. THURSTON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I observe that after he had taken this oath to which the Senator has referred and became governor a resolution was offered, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the senate are eminently due, and are hereby tendered, to Hon. William T. Watson, speaker of the senate, for the courtesy, intelligence, impartiality, and fidelity which have uniformly characterized the discharge of the delicate and responsible duties of said office.

It was "William T. Watson, speaker of the senate," to whom they referred.

Mr. THURSTON. The gentleman is merely quibbling. That is a mere quibble. That resolution in all human probability was drawn and in the hands of the man who presented it before the oath of office as governor was administered to Mr. Watson.

Mr. HILL. I supposed the Senator was claiming that this resolution of thanks was entitled to some weight; that it had some significance. Therefore I called his attention to the fact that it is an admission that he was speaker of the senate then and there.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is an adjudication, he claims.

Mr. HILL. Call it anything you please. It did not refer to him as the late senator at all. The Senator from Nebraska brought it in as entitled to some weight on this judicial question; that is all.

Mr. PASCO. It was after he was sworn in as governor.

Mr. HILL. The resolution was adopted after he was sworn in as governor, as the Senator from Florida suggests.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, it seems to me that it has just as much weight as the fact that Watson took the chair and crowded out Mr. Records and assumed to act as speaker of the senate about five minutes before they went into joint assembly.

Mr. THURSTON. As I suggested, that is the mere refinement of a quibble. There is no doubt that that resolution was drawn—probably it had been written on a typewriter—that morning before the commencement of the session and was in the hands of the man who presented it. The mere grammatical construction of it has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. HILL. The Senator does not answer my question.

Mr. THURSTON. That it was deemed the proper occasion for the passage of such a resolution was like holding funeral services and delivering an oration over the dead.

Mr. HILL. That may be, but I supposed the resolution referred to some live person, namely, the speaker of the senate. That is what I supposed it referred to. It does not even refer to him as the late speaker. There may be some evidence here that the Senator seems to know about and that nobody else knows about to the effect that there was a typewritten copy made in the morning; but something that I do not find existing here. If the resolution is entitled to any weight at all it is the fact that the resolution speaks of him as the speaker of the senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question.

Mr. HILL. As the Senator from Delaware suggests to me, it speaks of him as quick, not as dead.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the Senator from New York if he ever heard of a case where a legislative body stopped in the middle of a person's term to thank him for his conduct as presiding officer?

Mr. HILL. There is nothing in law to prevent its being done, and it seems from the terms of this resolution that it was done, and done while he was speaker, and so it speaks of him as speaker, not the late speaker, not a dead speaker, but a live speaker. That is the point. I would not have noticed it except that the Senator from Nebraska spoke of the fact that this vote of thanks was a very significant point on this question, whereas I claim that it argues right to the contrary.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I once knew an indictment to be quashed because a boy who forged an order did not understand the use of grammar, and wrote it, "This boy had my authority to get them harness." The court held that that was a mere recital of a past event. But I do not think the fact that the man who drafted that resolution did not understand grammar, although he may have lived in Delaware, is a fact from which the Senate of the United States is to adjudge and determine that the speaker was still there as speaker. It is the mere inadvertence in the use of a grammatical term; it is a mere accident.

Mr. HILL. I am sorry to hear this reflection upon Senator Pierce—a Republican, and supposed to be well educated, and from Delaware—who offered the resolution. I think he knew what he was about.

Mr. THURSTON. The Republican party does not rely upon the grammatical knowledge and the higher education of its membership. We are not educated in all the refinements of the schools, like so many of our Democratic brethren. What we rely upon is the good common sense and everyday patriotism of the members of the Republican party in the United States. However, Mr. President, I find myself most agreeably diverted, but still diverted from the course of my argument.

Mr. HILL. I will not use the old saying as to what is the last refuge of certain gentlemen; that it is an appeal to patriotism. I will not quote that.

Mr. THURSTON. I am delighted to be interrupted by the Senator from New York. In fact I had no idea that I was doing anything which entitled me to expect his return to the Senate for the purpose of taking a hand in this discussion. But, Mr. President, William T. Watson went into the governor's office and stayed there for just a month. The records of the State senate do not show that he ever came back into that body and exercised any of the duties of that office.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The journal shows he did not.

Mr. THURSTON. It shows that he did not. It is only by the consideration of ex parte affidavits on the floor of the American Senate and by the highest tribunal of adjudication, that it can be claimed for one single moment that William T. Watson ever came back into the Delaware senate and did anything in the nature of exercising the duties of that office.

I will not stop to repeat the able, extended, and conclusive argument of the Senator from the State of Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] made the other day upon the proposition that the proceedings of the legislative body must be tested by what they have spread upon the record. He did no act which compelled the senate of that State to pass upon that question before they went into joint convention. He did no act which required the senate to pass upon the question of his right to sit there and act there and vote there as a senator. There is not an act, not a line on the record to show it, but there is an express negative of it. The affidavits filed in the case wherein they pretend to say that he voted on a certain corporation bill are negatived by the record, which shows that no corporation bill was before the senate on that morning. Not only that, sir, but every vote taken in the senate during that whole morning is spread on the record by the yeas and nays, and there were never more than 8, and there were 8 votes cast on every one of those measures. Watson did not vote. The other 8 all voted time and time again. Watson never voted; the record does not show that he voted; the record denies it. He came in there simply by the courteous permission of the senate and nothing else; there is no pretense of an adjudication, there was nothing to act upon.

But it is said that he seized the gavel of authority and headed the procession to the joint assembly. Many a man has marched at the head of the procession before now without its being held that he was thereby commissioned as brigadier-general and entitled to the rank from that time on. The fact that he marched at the head of that procession does not entitle him to say that he was adjudicated as still in the office of senator. But they went into the joint convention, and he did preside, and senators, awed by the fact that the governor of the State was there pretending to act as senator, kept silent. It is said that silence gives consent, but, sir, did that joint assembly have the least tittle of authority to pass upon the question of Mr. Watson's power to still act or vote as senator? Not the slightest. The moment you assert that proposition you are met with the fact that if any action on the part of that joint assembly can be held as an adjudication of the right of a senator to act and to sit as a senator, then it must be because there is jurisdiction in that joint convention to pass upon the title. If there is authority in that joint convention to pass upon the title of senator then he can by that joint convention be voted out of office by the members of the house alone against the negative vote of the whole senate, because the house outnumbers the senate. The mere statement of that proposition is sufficient to show that whatever was done in that joint assembly there was no authority and no pretense of authority that it could bind the Senate of the United States or anybody else upon the question of William T. Watson's right to exercise the office of senator.

I have not altogether completed the argument that I set before me, but I hasten to a close. The facts in this case are established on record, are admitted by the parties, and all that remains in order to pronounce the correct judgment is to interpret the constitution of the State of Delaware as it applies to those facts. Sir, that interpretation of the constitution of the State of Delaware is not within the power of the senate of Delaware to make. It has not that right. It is not a court for that purpose. If it pretends to act, its construction of the constitution of Delaware is not binding upon any other tribunal before which or in which that question may come for decision.

Sir, we are to establish a permanent rule that is to govern the future election of Senators of the United States. It is a question rising high above party considerations. It is a question purely of a patriotic and a legal character. I hope, sir, that in the determination of this question the Senate will rise to the dignity and importance of the power vested in it under the Constitution of the United States to pass for itself upon the election and qualifications of each of its own members.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to speak upon the pending resolution. I do not desire to proceed to-night. The Chair will inform me what agreement was made about the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Chair understands that the unfinished business is now properly before the Senate. The Secretary will announce the bill by title which is the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 503) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. NELSON. I hope the Senator from Oregon will withdraw the motion.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 2221. It relates to a few settlers in my part of the country.

Mr. BERRY. Let it be taken up without displacing the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks that, temporarily displacing the unfinished business, the Senate shall proceed to consider a bill which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2221) for the relief of settlers on the Northern Pacific Railroad indemnity lands.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out section 1, in the following words:

That those persons, their heirs, or legal representatives, who, between the 15th day of August, A. D. 1887, and the 1st day of January, A. D. 1889, settled upon and made final proof and final entry, under the homestead or preemption laws, of lands within the so-called second indemnity belt of the Northern Pacific Railway Company's grant in the State of Minnesota, which entries were afterwards canceled, or who, for a period of six months, settled upon, improved, and cultivated such lands with a view of entering the same under the homestead or preemption laws, being competent to make such entries, and who were not permitted to make such entries, upon establishing these facts before the register and receiver of the local land office, in such mode and under such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be allowed to make final homestead entry and receive a patent therefor of a quantity of land, of any of the unappropriated public lands of the United States equal in acreage to the land so entered or settled upon and improved in the said second indemnity belt as aforesaid, without being required to make any settlement or improvement upon or cultivation of such land so entered prior to such entry.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That those persons, their heirs or legal representatives, who, between the 15th day of August, A. D. 1887, and the 1st day of January, A. D. 1889, settled upon and made final proof and entry, under the homestead or preemption laws, of lands within the so-called second indemnity belt of the Northern Pacific Railway Company's grant in the State of Minnesota, which entries were afterwards, without their fault, canceled, upon establishing these facts before the register and receiver of the local land office, in such mode and under such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be allowed to make final homestead entry, and receive a patent therefor, of a quantity of land of any of the unappropriated public lands of the United States within the State of Minnesota, equal in acreage to the land proved up and entered in the said second indemnity belt, as aforesaid, without being required to make any settlement or improvement upon or cultivation of such land so entered prior to such entry; and those persons, their heirs or legal representatives, who, within the period aforesaid, for the space of six months settled upon, improved, and cultivated any of said indemnity lands with a view of entering the same under the homestead or preemption laws, being competent to make such entries, and who were not permitted to make such entries, upon establishing these facts before the register and receiver of the local land office, in such mode and under such rules as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, shall be allowed to enter under the homestead laws of the United States a quantity of land of the unappropriated public lands of the United States, in the State of Minnesota, equal in amount to the land settled upon, improved, and cultivated, as aforesaid, and under the homestead entry so made shall, when making proof and final entry, receive credit for the settlement, improvement, and cultivation made upon the said indemnity land as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COSTS AND FEES IN CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1862) to amend the act creating the circuit courts of appeals in regard to fees and costs, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that, without displacing the unfinished business, the Senate shall consider the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second section of an act to establish circuit courts of appeals, passed March 3, 1891, be amended so that the clause therein which now reads, "The costs and fees in the Supreme Court now provided for by law shall be costs and fees in the circuit courts of appeals," shall read, "The costs and fees in each circuit court of appeals shall be fixed and established by said court in a table of fees, to be adopted within three months after the passage of this act: Provided, That the costs and fees so fixed by any court of appeals shall not, with respect to any item, exceed the costs and fees now charged in the Supreme Court." The senior justice each circuit court of appeals shall, within three months after the fixing and establishing of costs and fees as aforesaid, transmit the same to the Chief Justice of the United States, and within one year thereof the Supreme Court of the United States shall revise said table, making the same, so far as may seem just and reasonable, uniform throughout the United States. The table of fees, when so revised, shall thereupon be in force for each circuit.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I desired to ask unanimous consent to call up another bill, which will take but a moment, but I will yield to the Senator from Indiana, as I have had my turn once, if the Chair will recognize me afterwards for that purpose.

W. W. ROCKHILL.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the Senate to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3886) to reimburse W. W. Rockhill for moneys erroneously paid United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill, temporarily displacing the unfinished business?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to repay W. W. Rockhill, postmaster at Fort Wayne, Ind., $117.50, to reimburse him for moneys erroneously reported and paid as "key deposit forfeiture fund," when the same should have been reported "key deposit redemption fund."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN J. SHIPMAN.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration the bill (S. 1835) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the claim of John J. Shipman against the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to John J. Shipman $17,811.96, with interest as provided by law, the same being the amount found by the Court of Claims to be due to the said John J. Shipman from the United States for stone furnished and delivered by Shipman to the United States and used by it in the construction of a lock on the Big Sandy River, near Louisa, Ky.

Mr. PLATT. What is the Calendar number of the bill?

Mr. ALLEN. No. 403. This bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on Claims, and a similar bill has, I think, been reported and passed by this Chamber before. The present Presiding Officer [Mr. FAULKNER in the chair] is the author of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to make a single inquiry about it, and that is, whether the judgment of the Court of Claims was for interest?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; I think not. My recollection is that the amount recited in the bill is the principal alone.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that that clause of the bill be again read.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not the author of the bill; the present occupant of the chair is the author of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The sum of $17,811.96, with interest as provided by law.

Mr. ALLEN. The amount named in the bill is for the principal alone; not for the interest.

Mr. PLATT. The bill reads for so much money "with interest as provided by law." The law does not provide any interest against the United States, as I understand it. The bill certainly gives no idea as to how much will be carried as interest. I think the bill, if it is to carry interest, ought to specify it, so that we would know exactly how much interest is to be paid.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, I reported the bill some time ago, but my recollection is that the report provided simply for the payment of the principal. However that may be, to save all question, let the words "with interest as provided by law" go out of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. That will be satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, after the word "cents," it is proposed to strike out the words "with interest as provided by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the bill be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read as amended.

The Secretary read the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HABEAS CORPUS CASES.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 1864) to amend the act creating the circuit courts of appeals in regard to cases arising under the revenue laws, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 766 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 766. The appellate court, or any judge or justice thereof, may, at his discretion, order any or all proceedings against the person so imprisoned or confined or restrained of his liberty to be stayed: Provided, That no such appeal shall be had or allowed after six months from the date of the judgment or order complained of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 766, chapter 9, of the Revised Statutes, in regard to habeas corpus."

LAURA C. DODGE.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2347) for the relief of Laura C. Dodge.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "twenty to," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, to increase the pension of Laura C. Dodge, dependent widow of the late Capt. Frederick Laighton Dodge, United States Army, from $20 to $40 per month, said increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN CAMDEN, N. J.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1256) to increase the limit of cost for the erection of a public building in Camden, N. J.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to increase the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of a public building in Camden, N. J., $125,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6936) for the reconstruction of the Rock Island Bridge.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIFLES FOR NATIONAL GUARD.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1169.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1169) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue Springfield rifles to each State and Territory for the National Guard thereof in exchange for other rifles now held.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. That any State or Territory may, in addition to the stores and supplies issued under the provisions of this act and the act of February, 1887, purchase for the use of its National Guard or reserve militia, at regulation prices for cash at place of sale, such stores and supplies from any department of the Army as, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, can be spared.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the chairman of the Military Committee why would not an equal number of arms be taken in exchange?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think that was reconsidered because in some cases there would not be an equal number. There would be some of the National Guard who would not perhaps have any arms to exchange. I understand the Ordnance Department thought it better not to have that provision in.

Mr. SEWELL. I will only speak of the State of New Jersey. We have in our State, purchased during the war to a great extent, thirty or forty thousand stands of arms which we wish to retain. We will only draw under this act about 4,000 stands of arms. We do not want to be deprived of the supply of these arms, guns, batteries, and everything else which the State has supplied and which we keep on hand.

I move to amend in the first section of the bill, where it speaks of turning into the Ordnance Department "all the arms," by inserting "an equal amount of arms."

Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. PLATT. "An equal number of arms."

Mr. SEWELL. Very well; "an equal number of arms." What applies to New Jersey will apply to pretty much all the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 12, after the word "therefor," it is proposed to strike out "all the" and insert "an equal number of"; so as to read:

That each State or Territory be required on receipt of the new arms to turn into the Ordnance Department, United States Army (without receiving any money credit therefor), an equal number of arms, etc.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is nothing whatever compulsory about this exchange.

Mr. BATE. I understand this to be optional with the States. This is to enable them to make the exchange if they desire. It is not compulsory.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is entirely optional.

Mr. BATE. Certainly. There is no constraint about it. Whether it is much or little, the States can exchange a few or many arms, as they desire, as I understand the bill and as it was understood by the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. So I understand it.

Mr. SEWELL. Not under the bill as it has been read. It requires that all the arms of a State shall be turned in, no matter how many new arms may be required.

Mr. BATE. I do not understand it in that way, but they will get their proportion and retain such as they choose.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that the amendment I have offered, that it shall be an equal number, is but fair.

Mr. BATE. The intention of the committee was as I have stated.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator means on page 2, line 12 of section 1, to strike out the words "all the" and insert "an equal number of."

Mr. SEWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall want to move technically a reconsideration, in order that I may consult with the Ordnance Department as to whether this will be satisfactory to them. The bill was practically drawn by that Department after long and careful consideration. I will let the bill lie over until to-morrow, when it can be looked into.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that we ought to be governed by our own judgment of the proper action to be taken, and not by the Ordnance Department. If the State of New Jersey, or any other State, wishes to take advantage of drawing, say—in the case of my State—4,500 stands of arms in exchange for a similar amount of arms, we ought to have that privilege. If we have been provident enough by expenditures which commenced before the civil war, and which enabled us at that time to put in the field the first organized brigade in the Army and to equip them with arms and ammunition, baggage wagons, and steamers to carry them to their destination, we ought not to have a penalty inflicted upon us, in order to obtain these 4,000 stands of arms for the equipment of our present quota of militia, to turn in 40,000 stands of arms, with several batteries of artillery, as this bill would oblige us to do.

Mr. HAWLEY. Nothing at all is said in the bill about artillery.

Mr. SEWELL. The bill says "arms."

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SEWELL. Which amounts to the same thing.

Mr. HAWLEY. No; it says "Springfield rifles." I will, however, assent to the amendment, though I do not think the State of New Jersey would be required to send in those arms under this proposed law; but I ask the Senator what they are?

Mr. SEWELL. I can not state now.

Mr. HAWLEY. The desire of the Government is that the National Guard, or the organized militia, shall all have the same arms. Everybody who has had any experience knows how inconvenient it is to have different calibers and different arms. In the State of New York they have a caliber of .50. That is an awkward caliber and frequently causes great inconveniences in warfare. But I will assent to the change proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. There are several thousand stands of arms in the Springfield Arsenal of this caliber, with which it is very desirable that the National Guard should be equipped. They should all have arms of the same caliber, so as to draw the same ammunition.

The militia of the State of New Jersey, as are the militia of all other States similarly situated, are very desirous to have this bill passed; but I do not think it is just the proper thing that the United States should take all our arms in order to enable us to get the 4,000 provided for by the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ILLINOIS AND MISSISSIPPI CANAL BRIDGE.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5979) for the right of the Rock Island, Muscatine and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Illinois and Mississippi Canal.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEASING OF LANDS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2419) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to lease the lands reserved for university purposes, and all of the school land in the Territory of Arizona reserved by law for school purposes, under such laws and regulations as may be hereafter prescribed by the legislature of said Territory, but until such legislative action the governor, secretary of the Territory, and superintendent of public instruction shall constitute a board for the leasing of said lands under the rules and regulations heretofore prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for the respective purposes for which the reservations were made, except that it shall not be necessary to submit the leases to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval; and all necessary expenses and costs incurred in the leasing, management, and protection of the lands and leases may be paid out of the proceeds derived from such leases; it shall be unlawful to cut, remove, or appropriate in any way any timber growing upon the lands leased under the provisions of this act, and not more than one section of land shall be leased to any one person, corporation, or association of persons, and no lease shall be made for a longer period than five years, and all leases shall terminate on the admission of said Territory as a State, and all money received on account of such leases in excess of actual expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the execution thereof shall be placed to the credit of the public school fund of the Territory, and shall not be used for any other than public school purposes.

Mr. BERRY. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill the proviso which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That the proceeds of leases of university and normal school lands shall be placed to the credit of their separate funds for the use of said institutions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WET DOCK OPPOSITE GOSPORT NAVY-YARD.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 1211) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to contract for the purchase of a lot of land opposite to the Gosport Navy-Yard.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARIES OF JUDGES OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2272) to fix the salaries of the chief justice and judges of the Court of Claims.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that hereafter the annual salary of the chief justice of the Court of Claims shall be $6,500 and of the judges thereof each $6,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to have a brief statement printed in the RECORD to go with the bill which has just been passed, which is a report from the committee,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the statement submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2272) to fix the salaries of the chief justice and judges of the Court of Claims, respectfully report:

By some legislative inadvertence the compensation of the judges of the Court of Claims has been overlooked for a period of twenty-four years, while the salaries of almost all other officers of the Government—legislative, executive, and judicial—have been adjusted to meet the increased expenses of modern life, as will appear in the following tables:

In February, 1855—
The salary of the judges of the Court of Claims was	$4,000
The pay of Senators and Representatives ($8 a day) was, say	1,500
The salary of the judges of the Supreme Court	4,500
The salary of the judges of the District of Columbia	2,300
The salary of the President	25,000
At the present time—
The salary of the judges of the Court of Claims is	4,500
The salary of Senators and Representatives	5,000
The salary of the judges of the Supreme Court	10,000
The salary of the judges of the District of Columbia	5,000
The salary of the judges of the district court of appeals	6,000
The salary of the President	50,000
If the salary of the judges of the Court of Claims had been increased—
In the ratio of the President's, it would now be	8,000
In the ratio of Senators and Representatives	13,333
In the ratio of the judges of the Supreme Court	8,884
In the ratio of the District of Columbia judges	8,000
And if the salary recently attached to the District court of appeals be taken as a criterion, it would be for the judges	6,000
And for the chief justice	6,500

It is now forty-one years since the Thirty-third Congress established the Court of Claims and fixed the salary of the judges at $4,000. The pay of the members of that Congress ($8 a day) could not have exceeded $1,500 a year as their average annual compensation, yet they did not hesitate to attach to this court a salary which was nearly three times their own, and but $500 less than that of the Supreme Court, and which was then sufficient to command the experience, integrity, and ability peculiarly needed in the judges of such a court.

It is twenty-four years since any attempt was made to increase the salary, and then by some mischance, which can not now be explained, a conference committee having charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill placed the increase at $500 when each of the Houses had separately voted to make it $1,000.

While there has been on the one hand this remarkable legislative inadvertence as regards the compensation of the judges, there has been on the other an even more extraordinary increase of their labors and responsibilities. To the general jurisdiction of the court Congress has, from time to time, added a great number of subjects of special jurisdiction which, in the magnitude of the amounts involved and the novel and varied character of the cases tried, probably exceeds that of any other court of original jurisdiction in the world.

The captured-property cases related to a fund in the Treasury of $31,722,466.20, and presented questions of law then absolutely novel and of the gravest character. The amounts claimed reached the enormous aggregate of $77,785,962.10, and the recoveries against the fund $9,833,423.16. (See 18 C. Cls. R., 700.)

The Hot Springs (of Arkansas) cases brought six different titles to the property before the court, prosecuted by six adverse parties, one of whom was the United States. Three of the contending claimants had been in possession of that valuable property for fifty years, and their litigation between themselves had gone on for thirty years, their suits more than once coming up to the Supreme Court, but always without a final result.

The Court of Claims, when this subject of litigation was added to its jurisdiction, assumed the functions of a court of equity, brought the conflicting titles to an issue in one suit, adjudged the Government to be the owner of the town of Hot Springs as well as of the springs themselves, ousted the intruders, and put a receiver in possession of the property. Its action was affirmed by the Supreme Court, and the United States then and thereby acquired possession of their own lands of which they had been dispossessed for half a century. (10 C. Cls. R., 289.) The improvement which has taken place in the moral and sanitary condition of that great natural sanitarium since the judgment of the Court of Claims was rendered is one which benefits thousands of the people of this country; and it is safe to say that that property—the town and the springs—at the present time exceeds in value to-day all the judgments that have been recovered against the Government in this court.

Congress have also invoked the assistance of the Court of Claims in cases which were not based on claims against the United States.

The first of these were the claims of contractors against the District of Columbia, growing out of the city improvements made or instituted by the territorial or Shepherd government. These have all been tried and disposed of, and are at an end.

Congress have also authorized the court to hear some very remarkable cases, being those of the Delawares, Shawnees, and freedmen of the Cherokees, not against the United States, but against the Cherokee Nation. These cases presented the novel spectacle of Indian tribes voluntarily seeking a judicial forum of the United States to settle their own financial difficulties.

The cases involved more than a million dollars, and were determined by the constitution and laws of the Cherokee Nation. They also involved difficult and novel questions of communal ownership, and represented more than 4,800 communal owners, each of whom claimed a several and personal interest in the subject of litigation—the proceeds of their lands. These cases have been affirmed by the Supreme Court, and these intestine difficulties of the Cherokee Nation happily brought to an end by the interposition of this court of the United States.

In the Mexican award cases—cases growing out of awards against Mexico under the treaty of 1868—the Government instead of appearing in its usual character of defendant has gone into the Court of Claims, under a special act of Congress, as complainant and filed a bill in equity to vacate and set aside awards against Mexico, on the ground that they were procured by fraud. The cases involve more than $500,000, and some most important principles of international and municipal law in which the honor of the United States is likewise involved.

It is also to be remembered that most valuable service has been rendered by this court in exposing and preventing frauds against the United States, and that immense amounts have been saved to the Government by judicial investigation. In the case of De Groot (5 Wall. R., 419), an Executive Department had awarded the claimant $119,234; in the case of Gordon (7 id., 188), $66,519; in the case of Chorpenning (94 U. S. R., 397), $443,010. In all of these cases judgment was against the claimant, yet the record in Gordon's Case discloses these extraordinary facts:

There had been allowed and paid to the claimant for property destroyed by United States troops $8,873; then $100 for an error of calculation in the first "award"; then $8,997.94 for interest; then $10,004.89 for more interest; then $39,217.50 for property previously found not to have been destroyed by United States troops; and finally, $66,519.85 on a "revision" of the previous awards. This last allowance had not been paid to the claimant, and his suit to recover it brought the matter into the Court of Claims and made public the payments which had been made.

In the Chorpenning case the claimant had previously brought the same claim before the court by a suit, in which he demanded only $176,576. (3 C. Cls. R., 140.) Judgment went against him, and he then went to Congress, and on the last night of the session obtained a reference of his claim to the Postmaster-General (16 Stat. L., page 673), by whom he was allowed, as above stated, $443,010. Before this was paid the matter attracted public attention. Payment was suspended and the claimant compelled to go into the Court of Claims, which again decided against him.

The danger of the legislative and executive branches of the Government investigating cases on the ex parte evidence of the claimants may be further illustrated. Since the expiration of the captured-property act, Congress has, by special acts, referred five cotton cases to the court, acting on the strongest ex parte evidence—the affidavits of apparently respectable witnesses. The aggregate of the amounts claimed was $1,169,192.57. In only two of them did the parties recover, and the aggregate of these two recoveries was only $146,523.41, leaving an unfounded balance of $1,022,669.16. In one of these cases the opening paragraph of the opinion thus describes it (25 C. Cls. R., 446):

"This is an extraordinary and important case. It is extraordinary on account of many matters appearing in its history and testimony; important because of the large amount of money in controversy and the questions of law involved in its decision. The attention of the court was occupied many days on the trial, and counsel have exhausted the resources of great professional ability in the presentation of the law and evidence. More than 2,000 printed pages of testimony have been discussed and considered in the determination of the questions of law and fact presented by this record. More than 150 witnesses have been examined, many of whom have been questioned to an extent most unusual in judicial investigation. Many of them have the highest intelligence, while others have the lowest order of mental capacity. Some are subject to the influence of a great interest in the result of the cause, while others are impressed by great prejudice against one side or the other."

The last annual report of the Attorney-General shows of claims adjusted during the preceding year that the aggregate of the amounts claimed was $3,971,302, but the aggregate of amounts allowed by the court $1,371,622.

So long as claimants can appear at the bar of Congress or before the Executive Departments and say that injustice has been done to them, so long a sense of right and natural sympathy will prompt relief; and experience shows that the more fictitious the claim, the more plausible it can be made to appear. Since such transactions as the above can be brought to light through judicial proceedings, they have wholly ceased. It must now be taken as a fixed fact that hereafter, as at present, demands against the Government must be investigated and, so far as possible, finally determined by a judicial tribunal.

Assuredly, then, it seems most unjustifiable to single out the judges on whose integrity and ability the Government depends for protection, and leave them the only judges whose remuneration receives no attention from Congress.

To the foregoing instances of special jurisdiction might be appended a long list of claims which have been referred to this court, some by public and some by private acts of Congress, such as the claims of Indian tribes against the United States (the Eastern Cherokees, the Western Cherokees, the Choctaw Nation, the Miamis, the Pottowatomies, the New York Indians); such as the Indian depredation claims, numbering more than 10,000, which had been many years in Congress awaiting legislative action; such as the French spoliation cases, cases of the last century, involving as intricate questions of international and mercantile law as ever perplexed a court; such as the Carondelet Commons Case, where the title to 6,050 acres of what is now a part of the city of St. Louis was in dispute, and $2,420,000 involved in the litigation.

In a single suit in the Court of Claims, one of the Pacific Railroad cases (20 C. Cls. R., 112)—

The Government recovered on its counterclaim	$4,487,807.39
And the claimant on its demand	2,910,124.18
And the Government had judgment for the balance	1,577,683.21

Thus the extraordinary fact appears that the largest amount recovered in the Court of Claims was recovered by the United States. If this recovery of $4,487,807.39, and the value of the town of Hot Springs, and a number of recoveries by the Government on other counterclaims were reckoned up, it is not improbable that the still more extraordinary fact would appear that the Government has recovered more in this court than has been recovered against it.

The aggregate of judgments against the United States rendered by the Court of Claims from 1867, when the annual reports of the clerk begin, to 1895, both inclusive, is $38,185,049.17. This does not include Congressional or French spoliation cases where the facts are reported for the consideration of Congress, but does include the decrees rendered against the captured property fund. Subtracting them, $9,833,423, will leave as the aggregate of judgments against the Government on its liabilities proper for the last twenty-nine years the sum of $28,351,626.17. The amount claimed in those suits was about $169,000,000.

It may therefore be reiterated that while the compensation of the judges of the Court of Claims has been singularly overlooked, no judges in the United States have been so weighted with personal responsibility, and no court has had such vast and varied and difficult subjects of jurisdiction committed to it, or has received more repeated manifestations of trust and confidence from the legislative power.

ANNIE E. NOLAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2129) granting an increase of pension to Annie E. Nolan.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Annie E. Nolan, widow of Nicholas Nolan, late major Third United States Cavalry, at $50 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHOCTAW COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2141) to amend an act approved August 24, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in that company."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MRS. JULIA JONES DUNCAN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1975) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Jones Duncan, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Samuel A. Duncan.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of Mrs. Julia Jones Duncan, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Samuel A. Duncan, at the rate of $50 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 75) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That all of the real estate now in the hands of the receiver of the late corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and all the rents, issues, and profits arising therefrom, which includes all the money held by him, be, and the same are hereby, granted and conveyed to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, the expenses of the receivership to be allowed by the supreme court of the State of Utah being first paid, and said receiver, after the payment of said expenses, is hereby required to deliver the said property and money to the person or persons constituting the first presidency of said Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, or to such person or persons as he or they may designate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment, to strike out the preamble; which was agreed to.

MICHAEL E. BRICKER.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1616) to pension Michael E. Bricker, of Edgerton, Ind.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll Michael E. Bricker, of Edgerton, Ind., late a private in Company D, Tenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROCEEDS OF SALES OF PUBLIC LAND IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 191) granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to grant to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of the public lands which have been heretofore made by the United States since the admission of that State, or may hereafter be made, to aid in the support of the public or common schools of said State. The sum of money necessary to pay the 5 per cent is appropriated.

Mr. PLATT. How much does the bill carry?

Mr. WHITE. I do not know the exact amount. A similar bill has passed the Senate twice without objection and has been reported favorably by the committee in the House of Representatives at this session, as it was at the last session. California is the only public-land State that has not got its money, although it has been due for many years. No committee that has ever investigated the subject has reported adversely to the bill. It proposes to grant to California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in that State. Every other public-land State, and there are 16, has had a similar act passed. As I stated, a similar bill passed the Senate at the last session without objection, and also the session before; it was favorably reported in the House last session, and there is a favorable report on the Calendar of the other House now.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent to call up the resolution relating to an investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, February 12, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed, as now constituted, either by full committee or such subcommittee or committees as may be appointed by the chairman thereof, with the full power of such committee to continue during the coming recess of Congress the investigations authorized by the resolutions of May 13, 1890, and February 27, 1891, with the authority, and in the manner, and to the extent provided in said resolutions, and, in the pursuance of such investigations, to visit the several Indian reservations, Indian schools supported in whole or in part by the Government, and the Five Nations in the Indian Territory, or any reservation where, in the opinion of said committee, it may be necessary to extend their investigations.

Second. That said committee or subcommittee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to examine witnesses under oath touching the matters which they are hereby empowered to investigate, and may hold their sessions during the recess of the Senate at such place or places as they may determine; and the necessary and proper expense incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. HILL. What committee has reported the resolution?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Committee on Indian Affairs reported it, as did also the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

I will say to the Senator from New York, also, that we have under consideration before the Committee on Indian Affairs the question of furnishing a government for the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, a very important matter, which will probably not be disposed of at this session of Congress. We are very liable to need to investigate the subject with great care.

Mr. HILL. When is it proposed to conduct the investigation?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The resolution gives the committee power to conduct the inquiry in the recess between now and next fall.

Mr. HILL. Why should that power be given now before it is absolutely determined that the investigation can not be made before the expiration of the session?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The resolution also gives the committee power before the close of the session to send for persons and papers and conduct an investigation here, if it thinks best.

This power has been given to the Committee on Indian Affairs every session but one since I have been a member of this body, and in no instance has the committee taken a trip to any agency. It is not now the intention of the committee to do so. For my part I have no time to make trips unless it is absolutely necessary. But it seemed to the committee necessary that we should have this power.

Mr. HILL. Why not strike out that provision, then? If we have passed several resolutions of this character and the committee never has conducted any such trip, why insist upon it now?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Because we think it is wise to have the power and the authority in case the necessity arises; and the necessity is more liable to arise now than heretofore, because the furnishing of a government to the Indian Territory is becoming more pressing every day and must be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HILL. The resolution has been reported from the Committee on Contingent Expenses?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution has been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs and also from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. It is true that this is in the main a resolution which has been passed every year, I think, for a number of years. It is also true that the Committee on Indian Affairs has not made trips away from the city of Washington to investigate questions arising in the administration of the Indian service. I am bound to say, however, that I think it has been a neglect upon the part of the committee to perform duties which it ought to have performed, and they have been neglected because it was impossible for members of the committee to go.

I am one who believes that a good deal of money would be saved to the Government if the committee had the power to visit Indian reservations and make examinations of matters which are going on in the administration of the service and if it would go and make those investigations as occasion arises. I think there is great need for investigation by the committee, but I fear the committee will never have the time or the opportunity to discharge what I think are its duties in this respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7250) to amend "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues," approved June 10, 1890, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Florida kindly withdraw his motion and substitute for it a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. CALL. Certainly. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 19, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

WEDNESDAY, March 18, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles, and the same were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 2571) to prevent the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one State or Territory into another State or Territory; and

A bill (S. 1675) to prevent the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one State or Territory into another State or Territory.

WIDOW OF THOMAS L. YOUNG.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk. If its consideration be agreed to, I propose to offer an amendment in the form of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1743) for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas L. Young.

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the widow, heirs, or legal representatives of the late Thomas L. Young, who served as captain of Benton Cadets, Missouri Volunteers, and as major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel of the One hundred and eighteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion, for a balance or balances of wages earned by him as said officer in the suppression of said rebellion and not yet paid to him or to his widow, heirs, or legal representatives, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for due investigation according to law, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to render a judgment for the amount, if any, found due from the United States upon the said claim.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask the Clerk to read the substitute which I propose to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following: "That the claim of the widow of the late Thomas L. Young, who served as an enlisted man and officer of the Regular Army of the United States and afterwards as captain of Benton Cadets, Missouri Volunteers, and as major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel of the One hundred and eighteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the war of the rebellion, for the sum not exceeding $478 as the balance or balances of wages earned by him as said officer in the suppression of said rebellion, but not heretofore paid to him or to his legal representatives, be, and the same is hereby, allowed; and a sufficient sum to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this bill proposes simply to give to the widow of General Young, lately a member of this House, $478.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is exactly what my amendment provides for.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The substitute proposed by Mr. BROMWELL was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask that the title of the bill be amended by striking out "legal representatives" and inserting "widow."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be so amended.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. BROMWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DEEPENING CHANNEL AT HAMPTON ROADS.

Mr. TYLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 79) directing the Secretary of War to furnish an estimate for deepening the channel from Hampton Roads to the navy-yard at Norfolk, Va., and also for improving the Western Branch of the Elizabeth River.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to furnish estimates as early as possible of the cost of broadening and deepening a channel to a width of 150 yards and to a depth of 28 feet from Hampton Roads to the United States navy-yard, Norfolk, Va., and also of improving the Western Branch of Elizabeth River and making the channel 200 feet wide and 20 feet deep for a distance of about 1 mile, as indicated by the report of Gen. Thomas L. Casey, Chief of Engineers, in Appendix J 15 of the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1895, pages 1300-1302.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand, this resolution simply proposes to ask for an estimate. From what committee does it come?

Mr. TYLER. From the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. CANNON. It has been reported by direction of that committee?

Mr. TYLER. Yes, sir.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TYLER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INTEROCEANIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5914) to amend an act to authorize the Interoceanic Railway Company to construct and operate railway, telegraph, and telephone lines through the Indian Territory.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 9 of the act entitled "An act to grant to the Interoceanic Railway Company a right of way through Indian Territory," approved March 3, 1893, be, and the same hereby are, extended for a further period of three years.

SEC. 2. That section 1 of said act be so amended as to make the city of Fort Smith the terminus of said road on the western border of the State of Arkansas.

SEC. 3. That section 2 of said act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That a right of way of 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory is hereby granted to the Interoceanic Railway Company, and a strip of land 100 feet in width, with a length of 2,000 feet, in addition to the right of way, is granted for such stations as may be established, but such grant shall be allowed but once for every 10 miles of the road, no portion of which shall be sold or leased by the company, with the right to use such additional grounds where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 50 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines, and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken."

SEC. 4. That section 6 of said act be amended by striking out all after the word "Provided" and inserting the following: "That a map of defined location, showing the entire route of said road through the Indian Territory, shall be filed and approved by the Secretary of the Interior before any part of the said road shall be constructed."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY TRAVEL.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers," etc., approved March 2, 1893, was read, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. What committee has reported the bill?

Mr. BENNETT. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It seems to me this is a bill which should have been considered by the Judiciary Committee. It provides for suits in the United States courts by the district attorney, upon information filed, and it contemplates the imposition of heavy penalties. I shall object.

CHANGE OF REFERERCE.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to ask that the bill (H. R. 268) concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, be referred to the Committee on Labor. It is the same bill that committee had charge of during the last Congress, and properly, I think, goes to the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HENRY H. BAILEY.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3582) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Henry H. Bailey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Henry H. Bailey, private of Company H, First Massachusetts Heavy Artillery, and record the fact that this soldier died on or about December 21, 1862, while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Before consent is given, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will make some explanation of this bill.

Mr. KNOX. This matter has been before the Committee on Military Affairs, and if the gentleman desires it, I will have the report, which is quite full, read.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like to have the report read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report (by Mr. BISHOP), as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3582) entitled "A bill to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Henry H. Bailey," beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment.

This soldier enlisted September 1, 1861, and served faithfully until December 21, 1862, when he is charged with desertion.

The proof submitted to your committee appears to conclusively show that at the date such soldier was marked as a deserter he was ill and apparently somewhat demented. While in such condition he wandered out from his tent in the night and has never been heard from since. His command was at the time located near Harpers Ferry, and so strong was the belief that in his demented condition he had fallen into the canal that his body was dragged for in the canal by his comrades the next day, but without success.

He left a young wife at home, and other friends, to whom he was warmly attached, and with whom he had until that time constantly corresponded, but none of them have had one word from the soldier to indicate that he was alive. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from such circumstances as are here shown is that the soldier either fell into the river or wandered away and died.

The absence of a soldier for thirty-three years under such circumstances should be the strongest presumption of death at time of disappearance.

The report of the War Department is hereto attached.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand for the further reading of the report.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KNOX, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GEORGE W. HARBAUGH.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 377) for the relief of George W. Harbaugh.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to remove from all the records in his Department the several charges of desertion appearing on the rolls and hospital record of George W. Harbaugh, as a late private in Company G of the Sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and as a late private in the Sixth Independent Battery, Ohio Light Artillery, and in Battery M, Fourth United States Artillery, and grant to said George W. Harbaugh an honorable discharge of date October 30, 1863, from Company G, Sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and also grant to said George W. Harbaugh an honorable discharge of date June 24, 1865, from the Sixth Independent Battery, Ohio Light Artillery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Let me ask if this has been considered by the committee at a Friday evening session?

Mr. JENKINS. It has been, and received a favorable report.

Mr. PICKLER. And was passed by the last House.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to-day filed the report of the committee on House bill No. 2673, for the abolition of compulsory pilotage. I ask leave that the minority may file their views in connection with the same bill and be given until Tuesday next for that purpose. This is agreeable to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no objection to that.

There being no objection, the views of the minority were authorized to be filed, when prepared, with the report of the committee.

CASSIE A. DAVIS.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5814) granting a pension to Cassie A. Davis, widow of James R. Davis and mother of Mary T. Davis, an invalid daughter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Cassie A. Davis, widow of James R. Davis, late Company E, Third Regiment of Vermont Volunteers, at the rate of $30 per month, in addition to the $12 which she is now receiving as a widow; said $30 per month to be in lieu of the $2 per month now paid on account of soldier's helpless daughter, Mary T. Davis, and to be paid so long as said Mary T. Davis remains helpless and is cared for by said Cassie A. Davis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will reserve the right of objection until I can hear an explanation or the report read.

Mr. POWERS. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5814) granting an increase of pension to Cassie A. Davis on account of Mary T. Davis, dependent daughter of James F. Davis, have carefully examined the evidence and report as follows:

The soldier died from causes arising in the service, and the widow is pensioned at $12 under the general law, and $2 additional on account of the daughter, Mary T. Davis.

The evidence shows that said daughter is as helpless as an infant, and much more troublesome. She can not speak, can not feed or dress herself, can not masticate her food, and can not make known her wants to anyone but her mother, who is required to be in constant attendance on her, and so is unable to do anything for her own support.

It is absolutely necessary that the pension be sufficient to provide for the needs of both, and your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief statement before the request for unanimous consent is submitted.

This, in my judgment, is the most deserving bill that has been presented for the consideration of the House respecting an increase of pension on the score of an invalid child. This case exists in my own town and I know personally all about the facts. They are stated correctly in the report of the committee, to the effect that this daughter is helpless and the mother is being paid a pension of $2 a month under the act of 1890 on account of the invalid daughter. She requires the constant attendance of her mother, thus depriving her mother of an opportunity to gain a livelihood in any other way. The child can not speak, or dress, or feed herself, and is absolutely and wholly dependent on the watchful care of her mother, who is obliged to attend upon her every moment in the twenty-four hours when the child is awake.

Under the law of 1890, as recently construed, the Department is paying the mother $2 a month on the score of a helpless daughter. The committee, as I understand, unanimously agree that it is a case deserving of special consideration, and I hope that every gentleman present will see the entire propriety of the increase asked.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman submit to an inquiry there?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that there are many hundreds, probably thousands, of exactly similar cases throughout the country?

Mr. POWERS. I suppose there are other cases, not so many as my friend states, but there may be an occasional case of this kind. It is entirely abnormal and out of the usual course of events, but here is the fact. It is certified to by physicians and by the neighbors, and I know about it personally.

Mr. LOUD. This is quite outside the law, and goes upon the theory that it is the duty of the Government to support those who are in need.

Mr. POWERS. Every special pension bill that we pass goes outside of the law.

Mr. LOUD. Some have more merits than others.

Mr. POWERS. This has more merits than any you ever heard of.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to ask why this bill should be taken out of the regular course of procedure, and why it should not be considered on Friday night, the regular pension night?

Mr. POWERS. I am very glad my friend has propounded that inquiry. I omitted to state the special reason for calling it up at this time. It is far down on the Calendar and probably will not be reached during the session. This mother is threatened with the necessity of appealing to the poorhouse for her own support, as well as that of the daughter, unless this relief is speedily granted. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if it is a proper thing to pass this bill, I am sure he will agree with me in saying that we can not be too quick in doing it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will say in answer to the gentleman that I do not think it is right to enlarge the operations of the act of June 27, 1890, merely because a person is in want. Let the local authorities of Vermont take care of these cases. I object.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE, BOOZE VS. RUSK, THIRD MARYLAND DISTRICT.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE], in order that he may present a unanimous report in an election case.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a report in the case of William S. Booze vs. Harry Welles Rusk, from the Third Congressional district of the State of Maryland. It is a unanimous report, and I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That William S. Booze was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Third district of the State of Maryland, and is not entitled to the seat as such Representative.

Resolved, That Harry Welles Rusk was elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Maryland, and is entitled to retain his seat as such Representative.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the report printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report of the committee will be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 2, to whom was referred the contested election case of William S. Booze vs. Harry Welles Rusk, from the Third Congressional district of the State of Maryland, report that, after having heard the argument of counsel for the respective parties, read their briefs, and carefully considered the evidence adduced and questions involved, they submit the following: This district is composed of the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Fifteenth, and Sixteenth wards of the city of Baltimore. At the election held therein on the 6th day of November, 1894, William S. Booze, contestant, was the Republican candidate, and Harry Welles Rusk, contestee, was the Democratic candidate.

On the face of the return the district gave a majority for contestee of 518. A certificate of election was thereupon issued to him by the governor of the State of Maryland, by virtue of which he now holds his seat in this Congress. Contestant claims that he was legally elected, and his contention is based upon the following grounds, which will be considered in proper order:

First. That he was deprived of a large number of ballots which were cast for him at the election, and a number of ballots were improperly counted for Mr. Rusk, as is shown by the recount and inspection of the original ballots cast at said election. Relative to said contention, your committee found that the voting was carried on under the provisions of the Australian ballot law, so far as the same has been made applicable to Maryland; that the ballot boxes were produced from the proper custody, appeared to be properly sealed, and the ballots preserved in the manner required by law.

That a recount of the ballots was had which resulted in a net gain to the contestant of 101 votes. That as a result of the recount by the examiner of the ballots in the rejected ballot boxes there was a net gain to the contestant of 30 votes, making in all a net gain for contestant, as result of the recount and in support of his first contention, of 131 votes. Contestant's second contention was that a number of legal bona fide voters of said district who intended to vote for him at said election were refused the right to vote by the officers of election in said district. Your committee finds from the evidence of witnesses who testified that they were denied the right to vote at their respective precincts simply because some one had already voted on their names. Forty persons testified that had they been allowed to vote they would have voted the Republican ticket, and on that account your committee believe that 40 votes should be added to the vote of contestant.

As to the third contention of contestant, that a large number of fraudulent and illegal votes were cast at said election for the contestee, and improperly counted for him, your committee find that while the evidence is not of the highest order and of the most convincing character, yet it seems to show that 161 such votes were counted and cast for the contestee. Your committee therefore believe that 161 illegal and fraudulent votes which were counted and cast for the contestee should be deducted from his vote. The fourth contention of contestant is, that in several precincts of said district fraud, irregularities, and intimidation were openly practiced and perpetrated by the political adherents of the contestee, Mr. Rusk, to such an extent as to render the election in said precincts void and require the rejection of the returns from said precincts in determining the true results of said election. One of the precincts attacked was the eighth precinct of the Fourth Ward, in which it was alleged that fraudulent voting was allowed with impunity; that a Republican judge was denied access to the books between 5 and 6 o'clock; that ballots were taken from ballot clerk before names found; that at time of count Republican judge was ordered from the box, and that the polls closed three minutes too soon. Your committee find from the evidence of Thomas M. White, the Republican clerk of this precinct, that no improper voting was done; that the ballot clerk was simply hurried; that nothing was done to affect the result of the election; that the number of ballots given out by the ballot clerk tallied exactly with the list of names in the poll books; that the polls did not close three minutes too soon. Your committee did not believe that the evidence would warrant the throwing out of the returns of said precinct. Contestant insisted the seventh precinct of the Second Ward should be thown out, because he claimed that a Democrat who pretended to be a Republican was appointed as a Republican clerk; that a Republican whose fingers were cut off was appointed ballot clerk; that a Republican was appointed judge who was not fully acquainted with the people of the ward, and that the ballot box appeared at the station broken open.

Your committee find from the evidence that the person who was appointed clerk testified himself that he had been a Democrat, but that he was at the time of his appointment a Republican, and had voted the straight Republican ticket ever since the first election of Benjamin Harrison; that the Republican ballot clerk, whose fingers were cut off, could write his name, and that he was appointed by the Republican executive of the ward; that the Republican who was appointed judge had lived in the precinct for upward of twenty years; that the ballot box, in carrying it to the station by the handle, broke open at the lock, which was immediately wrapped and tied up, and as soon as the judge reached the station house he closed the box in the presence of the police by pasting a slip of paper over the lid, thus fastening it, and on this paper he wrote, "Lock broken carrying to station house."

W. D. Myer, a Republican, testifies in substance to the above relative to the breaking of the ballot box. The contents of the box were found intact and the ballots counted by the examiner exactly tallied with the lists on the poll books.

Your committee did not believe that the evidence would warrant the throwing out of the returns of said precinct. Contestant insists that the fifth precinct of the Second Ward should be thrown out because the Republican challenger was driven or scared away from the polls, and because the police census and the registration of the precinct differ. Your committee find from the evidence that there is nothing to show that the challenger was driven away or induced by sinister motives to leave the polls. Your committee also find from the evidence that there was a difference between the police census and the registration of the precinct. Under the law of Maryland the voter, in order to be registered, has to appear before the registration board, consisting of three members, two of the majority party and one of the minority party, and make oath that he has been a resident of the State for one year and of the voting district for six months, and that he has attained the age of 21 years.

There was ample opportunity under the law to purge the registration list by applying, first, to the board of registration; should they refuse, then to the court of appeals. The court of appeals of Maryland, in the case of Langhammer vs. Munter, says: "The fact that a man's name does not appear upon the police census of registered voters is too uncertain to be entitled to much weight."

The court declined to strike names from the registration list because their names did not appear on the police census returns.

Your committee did not believe that the evidence would warrant the throwing out the returns of said precinct. Your committee also believe that in said Congressional district repeaters voted at said election, and that they voted for contestee, and have been deducted from his vote, as heretofore shown. Inasmuch as the committee is of the opinion that, after giving the most liberal interpretation to the evidence introduced by the contestant, he has failed to prove himself entitled to the seat which he claims, it recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That William S. Booze was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Third district of the State of Maryland, and is not entitled to the seat as such Representative.

Resolved, That Harry Welles Rusk was elected a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of Maryland, and is entitled to retain his seat as such Representative.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

SAFETY OF EMPLOYEES AND TRAVELERS ON RAILROADS.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee has withdrawn his objection to the bill (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers, etc."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I withdraw the objection that I made.

Mr. HOPKINS. My colleague [Mr. CANNON] examined that bill, and he thought it a matter that ought to be carefully considered before it passes the House. He was called out, and requested me, if it should come up, to interpose an objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ENOCH DAVIS.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2735) for the relief of Enoch Davis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers of the Government be, and hereby are, directed to liquidate and settle the claim of Enoch Davis, late a member of Company G of the Sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, for pay and bounty; and the sum of $300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the amount that may be awarded to him on account of said claim.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MAHON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2735) for the relief of Enoch Davis, submit the following report:

This claim was before the Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses; was on each occasion favorably reported upon, but no final action was taken in the House of Representatives.

The present bill proposes to pay the claimant the same amount as was recommended by the committee on former occasions, and is identical with the bill which received favorable action by the committee of the Fifty-second Congress.

A copy of the report of the Fifty-second Congress is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 278, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3176) for the relief of Enoch Davis, having examined and considered the same, report the same back to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

A bill identically like this passed the Senate in the Fifty-first Congress and was favorably reported in the House, the House adopting the Senate report, which we now do, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 65, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 570) for the relief of Enoch Davis, report as follows:

Enoch Davis was a private in Company G, Sixth Iowa Infantry Volunteers. He served his original enlistment of three years and then reentered as a veteran soldier in the same regiment and company, and thereby became entitled to certain bounty, a part of which he has never received, for the reason that he was marked on the rolls of his command as having deserted.

The rolls show him to have been absent on the 21st of June, 1865, the day on which his regiment was mustered out of the service at Louisville, Ky.; hence the entry thereon that he was a "deserter." It appears, however, from his own affidavit that he left but the day before to visit friends across the Ohio River in Indiana, with no idea of deserting, but intending to return. The next day his regiment was mustered out, and there was no one to whom he could report.

Affidavits from two of his officers and several of his comrades satisfactorily show that he was with his company until the day before its discharge. They also show him to have been an excellent soldier in camps and in battle, and that he was twice wounded in battle.

Standing on the rolls as a deserter, Davis made application to Congress for a correction of his record; and under similar proof to that now filed with this committee Congress passed an act June 8, 1880, correcting his record and ordering the proper officer to give him an honorable discharge. This was done, but the disbursing officer refused, under a technicality of the law, to pay him the balance of his bounty. Hence this bill S. 570.

It is hardly to be believed that so good a soldier, serving so long a time—up to the close of the war—would desert after the war was over and while waiting to be discharged, which would have been only one day after he absented himself from his command.

The committee, believing the absence of Enoch Davis to have been merely temporary and free from any intention of desertion, recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POWERS. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] withdraws his objection to the consideration of the bill which was under consideration a few minutes ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PETTIGREW, Mr. PLATT, and Mr. ROACH as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1906) in relation to the pay of Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel, retired; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

MARY B. HOUK.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4606) to grant an increase of pension to Mary B. Houk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Mary B. Houk, widow of Col. Leonidas C. Houk, late colonel of the Third Regiment of Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, a pension of $50 per month in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment, striking out "fifty" and inserting "thirty."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. ANDERSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4606) granting an increase of pension to Mary B. Houk, respectfully report:

The facts in this case are as follows:

Mary B. Houk is the widow of Hon. Leonidas C. Houk, late colonel of the Third Regiment of Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and who died in May, 1891, while a member of Congress.

Mr. Houk was drawing a pension for chronic diarrhea at the time of his death, and had suffered from this disease for many years, in consequence of which he had become very much debilitated. While in this condition he accidentally drank a dangerous liquid, to get which out of his stomach an emetic was necessary. But his weakness was such that he died of heart failure, resulting directly from his vomiting, but indirectly from the debility arising from the diarrhea.

Mrs. Houk applied for a pension under the general law, but her claim was rejected on the ground that her husband's death did not result directly from his disability, but from heart failure, as already stated. She thereupon applied for a pension under the act of 1890, and was granted a pension as a widow without other means of support than her own daily labor.

Mr. Houk left no property except an average amount of house furniture. His widow has a daughter about 12 years old, and no means of support, as the Pension Bureau has adjudicated.

Under these circumstances the committee feel amply justified in recommending the passage of the bill to increase her pension from $8 a month to $30 a month.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to state to the gentleman that this is only the statutory amount. The law allows $30 a month to the widows of colonels.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to know whether the cause of death is traceable to disability in the service?

Mr. GIBSON. It really is, indirectly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to have you explain that.

Mr. GIBSON. He was very feeble, and died really from the effects of the disability for which he was pensioned. The bill was passed unanimously by the Committee of the Whole, and unanimously passed through the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Judge Houk was a member of this House for twelve years, and was known to a great many members of the present House.

Mr. COX. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.

Mr. COX. What amount of money was appropriated by Congress for his widow? He was a member when he died, and an amount of money was appropriated by Congress for his widow and child.

Mr. GIBSON. She only got one-half the amount, I will state to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. What was the amount?

Mr. GIBSON. I can not answer that.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, that question was carefully examined in a previous Congress, and a substantial amount of money was appropriated to the widow of Mr. Houk and their child; and if that was not enough it is astonishing to me, after that appropriation was made, you now propose to add to that a pension.

Mr. GROUT. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the sum to which he has referred was more than the usual sum?

Mr. GIBSON. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee in that connection that Mrs. Houk only got one-half of the amount heretofore voted by Congress to the widow of a deceased Congressman. I want to say further that this is not a charity; Mrs. Houk is entitled to this pension under the law of the United States of America as it stands to-day on the statute book.

Mr. COX. I know she gets a pension, and you know and I know a controversy arose here as to the amount to be appropriated, and then the question came up as to who should have the money.

Mr. GIBSON. This is not that, but a pension.

Mr. COX. A pension to whom?

Mr. GIBSON. A pension to Mrs. Mary B. Houk.

Mr. COX. She is entitled to a pension.

Mr. GIBSON. That is what I say. That is why I want the House to give it to her.

Mr. COX. Then why not apply to the Pension Office?

Mr. GIBSON. This was considered in Committee of the Whole, and discussed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX. Is not the object of this bill to increase the pension of Mrs. Houk?

Mr. GIBSON. It is simply to give her the statutory pension of $30 a month.

Mr. COX. If that is so, why not get it from the Pension Bureau?

Mr. GIBSON. For the reason already stated. The Pension Bureau allows pension only for the immediate cause of the husband's death. The immediate cause of Judge Houk's death was heart failure.

Mr. COX. We will not talk about that.

Mr. GIBSON. She is pensioned at the rate of $12 a month as a pauper widow.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The gentleman from Tennessee stated that this party was drawing a pension of $8 a month before, and he now states that she draws $12 a month.

Mr. GIBSON. Twelve dollars. I beg pardon; it is $8, under the act of 1890.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to ask the gentleman, if this House is only to give this lady what she is already entitled to by statute, why pass this bill?

Mr. GIBSON. I will state that the Commissioner of Pensions rules technically, and under the ruling of the Commissioner of Pensions the immediate cause of the husband's death must have been incurred in the service. Now, the immediate cause of Judge Houk's death was heart failure, as found by the Pension Bureau, resulting from this excessive vomiting; but if the man had been stout he could have overcome it. He was debilitated, having chronic diarrhea, from which he had suffered for over thirty years, and for which he was pensioned. If he had been a stout, able-bodied man, he could have thrown that off his stomach; but in his weak condition he was overcome by the excessive vomiting, and died of heart failure; and that was the immediate cause of death. I hope the gentleman will not interpose an objection. This bill passed the Committee of the Whole unanimously, and also passed the Committee on Invalid Pensions unanimously. Out of respect to an old member of the House, I hope the gentleman will interpose no objection.

Mr. COX. I had the very highest respect for Mr. Houk; but what I want to know, and what this House wants to know, is what pension you now propose to give Mrs. Houk?

Mr. GIBSON. Thirty dollars a month—what the statute gives.

Mr. COX. If the statute gives it to her, why should the House give it to her?

Mr. PICKLER. The Pension Office claims that it can not be sufficiently shown that death was caused by the disability incurred in the service. The Committee on Invalid Pensions think indirectly it is shown. Now, this bill only proposes to give Mrs. Houk a pension at the rate she would be entitled to as a widow according to the rank of her husband in the Army.

Mr. COX. That is upon the idea and basis that his death was caused from disease contracted in the service?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIBSON. For chronic diarrhea.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope the gentleman will not object.

CASSIE A. DAVIS.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York who interposed an objection to the bill which was recently called up on my motion withdraws his objection with the understanding that I consent to an amendment striking out "thirty" before the word "dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twelve." I understand that that will make the bill unobjectionable to the gentleman, and I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 5814) granting a pension to Cassie A. Davis.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Vermont why this bill has not been considered in Committee of the Whole, like other pension bills?

Mr. POWERS. I would say to my friend from Kansas that the Committee of the Whole has been engaged during the entire session in considering other pension matters. If the gentleman was present at the session on Friday evening last he probably learned the true character of that meeting. This bill is brought up now because of its special urgency to keep a poor woman from going to the poorhouse, and I hope that I shall have the hearty support of my friend from Kansas in rescuing her from that fate.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, if I remember correctly, the time of the session on Friday evening last was largely taken up by a humorous speech by the gentleman from Vermont. I object. [Laughter.]

CAPT. HENRY S. PRATT.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2451) to correct the records of the War Department in the case of Capt. Henry S. Pratt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue, in the name of Henry S. Pratt, late captain of Company A, Tenth New York Cavalry, an honorable discharge as of date the 18th day of May, 1863, and that so much of Special Order No. 263, of the War Department, dated May 5, 1863, in conflict with his honorable discharge be, and the same is hereby, annulled and set aside, said order having been issued under a misapprehension of the facts in the case: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to authorize the payment to the said Henry S. Pratt, or to his heirs or legal representatives, of any pay or allowances to which he was not entitled at the date of his original discharge from the military service.

The report (by Mr. FENTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2451) to correct the records of the War Department in the case of Capt. Henry S. Pratt, having considered the same, report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

REPORT FROM WAR DEPARTMENT.

The records show that Henry S. Pratt was mustered in as first lieutenant Tenth New York Cavalry to date September 27, 1861, and as captain to date December 12, 1861, for three years.

He performed active field duty until August 31, 1862, when he was captured by the enemy. After his exchange he rejoined his command December 19, 1862, and served with it until on or about May 5, 1863, when he and eight other officers of his regiment were summarily dismissed by order of the War Department. * * *

The facts connected with his dismissal are as follows: On the 21st of April, 1863, Col. John C. Lemon, Tenth New York Cavalry, and Capt. Delos Carpenter, of the same regiment, made affidavit that Captain Pratt had by falsehood and fraud obtained from the Government the sum of $86.80 for the pretended use and risk of one horse and equipments for two hundred and seventeen days, whereas he was only entitled to such pay for the term of seventy-eight days.

The affidavits were referred to the Judge-Advocate-General, who, on April 22, 1863, forwarded them to the Secretary of War with the recommendation that Captain Pratt and the other eight officers be dismissed and their pay withheld and applied to reimburse the Government.

After ineffectual efforts looking to a revocation of the dismissal, the case was reopened on the request of Colonel Irvine, who succeeded Colonel Lemon in command of the Tenth New York Cavalry, and was referred by the Secretary of War to General Canby for report. After a careful examination of the facts that officer, on the 17th of January, 1864, reported as to the merits of the case and recommended that the disability incident to Captain Pratt's dismissal be removed.

The following is a copy of General Canby's report in the case:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 7, 1864.

W. W. Paige, Henry Field, Henry S. Pratt, John Ordner, L. S. Baldwin, late captains of the Tenth New York Volunteer Cavalry, ask to be reinstated, having been dismissed May 4, 1863, on charge of "fraudulently receiving from the Government pay for risk and use of horses while they did not have horses."

It appears that charges of the above nature were preferred against these officers and four others, since reinstated, by I. C. Lemon, late colonel, and D. Carpenter, late captain, of that regiment, who both resigned when on the point of being tried on charge of incompentency, etc. Lemon's statement, as shown by letters of Hon. Thomas T. Davis, Lieutenant-Colonel McIrvine, Tenth New York Cavalry, and others, is not entitled to credence, and has, in fact, been disproved by the reinstatement of four of the officers against whom he preferred charges, and by his own recommendation to that effect in the cases of Captain Field and three others.

It seems that these officers charged the Government from the dates of their commissions (part of the time before the regiment was complete and ordered into the field) with 40 cents per day "for the use and risk of their own horses and horse equipments," and received pay for same in the summer of 1862; that Colonel Lemon himself called their attention to this claim, and recommended them to make out their papers, and that he did not make the charges upon which they were dismissed until nine months after they had received the money.

Captain Ordner stated under oath that until he purchased a horse in Baltimore, in the spring of 1862, and for the whole time charged previous to that date, he had at his command and owned a horse at his home in Buffalo.

Captain Pratt makes a similar statement, supported by the evidence of Lieutenant-Colonel McIrvine, Tenth New York Cavalry.

Captains Paige, Baldwin, and Field state under oath that up to the time they purchased their horses they had each a hired horse constantly at their disposal and in use whenever required. These statements are supported by the sworn evidence of the parties hiring the horses.

No mention is made in either of these five cases of equipments.

These officers were dismissed without a hearing, and on the statements only of Lemon and Carpenter.

The Judge-Advocate-General considered that a revocation of the order of dismissal was not justified, from the apparent fact that these officers did not actually have, use, and risk their own horses and equipments, as required by act of Congress July 22, 1861.

On the other hand, the officers claim that they were told by Colonel Lemon that this allowance was part of their pay and emoluments, the same as subsistence and forage, and that this view was approved by Major Turner, to whom the case was submitted in the first instance, and who dismissed the charge as frivolous.

These officers all produce certificates from general and field officers showing their character as gentlemen and as brave and faithful officers and good disciplinarians. They disclaim any intention of wronging the Government.

The abuse for which these officers were dismissed was common at the time, under the false impression that this allowance was a part of their pay and emoluments, and this abuse had its influence in causing the repeal of the original law so far as company officers were concerned. There is no question that the charges were made in violation of the law.

Four of the nine officers who were dismissed under this charge of fraud have been restored, and it seems just that at least Captains Ordner and Pratt (who certify under oath that they actually owned horses during the time charged), if not also Captains Paige, Baldwin, and Field (who hired horses), should receive the same favorable consideration.

Respectfully submitted, with the recommendation that the disability be removed in all these cases.

ED. R. S. CANBY,
Brigadier-General, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Thereupon the Secretary of War, on February 6, 1864, removed the disability resulting from the dismissal.

Official statement furnished by Hon. THEODORE L. POOLE, M. C.

By authority of the Secretary of War:

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
War Department, January 29, 1896.

In view of the fact that Captain Pratt is exonerated in the foregoing report, which shows that he was a faithful and competent officer, and that if he committed any error it was the fault of the colonel of his regiment, who preferred charges against the said Pratt for acting under his (the colonel's) direction, your committee are unanimous in recommending the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POOLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHARLES W. RINEHARDT.

Mr. HANLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2054) to correct the military record of Charles W. Rinehardt and to grant him an honorable discharge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Charles W. Rinehardt, late third-class musician in the United States Marine Corps Band, by removing the charge of desertion against him therefrom, and granting him an honorable discharge as of date August 15, 1882.

The report (by Mr. BISHOP) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2054) to correct the military record of Charles W. Reinhardt, and to grant him an honorable discharge, having considered the same, would respectfully report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

This young man enlisted in the Marine Band; afterwards all of his family died except his father, who desired the consolation of his only child in his old age, and he went home. Your committee think his leaving the service excusable.

The facts are fully set forth in the reports and affidavits hereto annexed.

[In the matter of House bill No. 4919, House of Representatives, for the relief of Charles W. Reinhardt.]

Charles F. Reinhardt, being duly sworn, on his oath says: That he is aged 63 years, and resides at Lafayette, Ind.; that he is the father of said Charles W. Reinhardt; that said Charles W. Reinhardt is his only child; that his brother and sister and mother died after his enlistment in the Navy, which left me alone, helpless, and heartbroken in my declining years; that I am much in need of his services and his company.

He is a good boy, my only hope; but being handicapped by reason of being a deserter at large, he can be of no service or comfort to me unless the charge of desertion can be removed, and he be permitted to again come home and give me aid and comfort the few short years I have to live; and I hope that you will be charitable to me; that you will restore to me my only living child, one who was my pride, and is now my only hope. His habits are good, and his record in the service was first-class.

I went to considerable expense to educate him in music, and he enlisted without my consent. He was made to believe that he could be honorably discharged at any time he so desired.

CHAS. F. REINHARDT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 23d day of December, 1893.

Notary Public.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Whereas Charles W. Reinhardt, son of Charles Reinhardt, an old and well-known and highly esteemed citizen of Lafayette, Ind.; did, on the 15th day of August, 1882, desert from the Marine Corps at Washington, D. C., and is still a deserter at large; and

Whereas the circumstances under which he enlisted in said Marine Corps on February 9, 1881, and deserted, at the time mentioned, are as follows, viz: He, said Charles W. Reinhardt, lived in Lafayette, Ind., from the time of his birth, in 1859, until 1878, when he left for Leipsic, Germany, to finish his musical education at the conservatory of music in that place. He remained there two years. On his return to the United States he met Mr. Sousa, the then director of the Marine Band, and finally enlisted, as aforesaid. After enlisting he wrote to his father, Charles Reinhardt, telling him what he had done. His father was much displeased and sharply reprimanded him for enlisting as a third-class musician on so small a salary, i. e., $21 to $24 per month. He replied that there was no opening except in the third class, and that Mr. Sousa assured him that the members of the corps were earning from $60 to $125 per month extra from outside engagements. But shortly after his enlistment this source of income was cut off by an act of Congress prohibiting military bands from taking outside engagements. Being greatly disappointed at the turn things had taken, young Reinhardt became despondent and finally deserted, as stated above, and is now a deserter at large; and

Whereas since said Charles W. Reinhardt deserted from the Marine Corps his mother, brothers, and sisters have all died, leaving his father alone in his old age, except this one remaining son; and

Whereas said Charles W. Reinhardt, except his one act of desertion, has always borne a good reputation and had always been a good and useful citizen:

Therefore, considering the offender's youth, his former irreproachable character, the circumstances under which he entered and left the service, the yearning of his aged and lonely father to have his son with him in his declining years, and believing that to relieve this young man from the consequences of his one thoughtless act could work no harm to the service, we, the undersigned, respectfully pray this Congress for the passage of a special act relieving Charles W. Reinhardt from the charge of desertion.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, August 27, 1892.

SIR: The Department has considered the statement made by you in June last, addressed to the President of the United States, and by his direction referred to this Department, in which you request the pardon of Charles W. Reinhardt, a deserter from the United States Marine Corps.

In reply I have to inform you that it appears from the record of service of Reinhardt that he enlisted in the Marine Corps at Washington, D. C., for five years, and was rated third-class musician, February 9, 1881; that he deserted from the Marine Barracks at that place August 15, 1882, and that he is still a deserter at large.

The Department is empowered to remove the charge of desertion only in cases coming under the provisions of the act of Congress "to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion," approved August 14, 1888, which applies only to deserters from enlistments during the late war, or when such charge is conclusively shown to have been erroneously entered or retained upon the records. It appearing that the charge of desertion was properly entered on the records of the Marine Corps against the name of Reinhardt, the Department has no power to remove said charge, and in view of the facts stated, no recommendation for pardon can properly be made in his case. An application might very properly be made to Congress by the friends of Reinhardt for the passage of a special act for his relief from the charge of desertion.

Very respectfully,

F. M. RAMSAY,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LOUIS KIMMEL,
United States Marshal's Office, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would state to the gentleman from Indiana that there is abundant power now in the Secretary of the Navy to grant this person a deserter's discharge, and that is all he is entitled to.

Mr. HANLY. I think not.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I am satisfied of it. I have secured such discharges myself in meritorious cases.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ARKANSAS NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MEIKLEJOHN, and Mr. LITTLE.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The first thing in order is the call of committees.

The committees were called.

RECESS.

Mr. LOUD (at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess for fifteen minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. The House accordingly took a recess until 1.30 p. m.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 1.30 p. m.

AMBASSADOR BAYARD.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the special order, the resolution in relation to certain speeches delivered by our ambassador to Great Britain.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.
The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, said in a public speech delivered in Boston, England, on August 2, 1895, as follows:

"He (the President of the United States) stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek to have their own way—and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States"; and

Whereas Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, said in a public speech delivered in Edinburgh, Scotland, on November 7, 1895, as follows:

"In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled 'protection,' which I believe has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind to familiarize it with reliance upon State aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause. * * *

"It (the said policy of protection) has unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the public conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes, whose support is thereby attracted. Thus it has done so much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen": Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, in publicly using the language above quoted, has committed an offense against diplomatic propriety, and an abuse of the privileges of his exalted position, which should make him the representative of the whole country, and not of any political party. Such utterances are wholly inconsistent with that prudent, delicate, and scrupulous reserve which he himself, while Secretary of State, enjoined upon all diplomatic agents of the United States. In one speech he affronts the great body of his countrymen who believe in the policy of protection. In the other speech he offends all his countrymen who believe that Americans are capable of self-government. Therefore, as the immediate representatives of the American people, and in their name, we condemn and censure the said utterances of Thomas F. Bayard.

Resolved further, That in the opinion of the House of Representatives public speeches by our diplomatic or consular officers abroad which display partisanship, or which condemn any political party or party policy or organization of citizens in the United States, are in dereliction of the duty of such officers, impair their usefulness as public servants, and diminish the confidence which they should always command at home and abroad.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, two days after the last election, which took place on Tuesday, the 5th of November, the ambassador of the United States to Great Britain delivered an address in Edinburgh, in which he inveighed in a violent diatribe against the policy, the dominant tenet in the political creed, of the Republican party in the United States. It was an amplification and repetition of a plank in the national Democratic platform denouncing protection as a fraud and robbery. The question in the election that had just passed had been, in largest part, the question between the protectionists or Republicans and their opponents, the Democrats. The distinguished audience whom he addressed had in the papers of that morning and that afternoon read the details of the election in the United States, and no doubt with great regret, all of them recognizing that with the coming ascendency of the party of protection in this country a policy was to be expected which would have what they considered a depressing effect upon British interests.

It was under these circumstances that this passionate partisan speech was delivered by our ambassador on a foreign platform to foreigners. It drew attention in that country and in every other, and it again revived attention to a speech which our ambassador had made a short time before, in August, at old Boston in England, in which he had said that his countrymen were "a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek to have their own way, and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States; fortunately in this case there is a real man to govern the people of the United States and hold their highest office."

These utterances excited painful attention and great regret all over this country. They were brought to the attention of Congress as soon as this body assembled, but the House, moving with caution, instructed a committee to ascertain whether such statements had been made by an ambassador of this country and what action should be taken in the premises if they had. That committee, after due deliberation, reported a resolution of inquiry which was adopted by the House, asking the President whether, in fact, such declarations had been made by the American ambassador to Great Britain; and if so, what action had been taken thereon. By and by the President sent us all the correspondence, with the information that all that was alleged to have been declared by our ambassador in Edinburgh last November was indeed said by him, and that no action had been taken thereon whatever. That is the case on which your committee have reported the resolutions now pending, expressing the disapproval of this House of the action of an ambassador of the whole people of the United States in making passionate, partisan declarations—in indulging in anathemas aimed at a great part of his countrymen.

There was an implied doubt in the inquiry of the House. We wished, we hoped, at the first news, that it would be found on examination that the declarations made by our representative abroad had not been accurately reported; that it might turn out that he had used such general terms that they could be accepted as not offensive to his countrymen; that it was perhaps mere "academic" discussion of cold, general questions of political science, which, in the condensed form of the news report, had seemed harsh and partisan. But not so; all such hopes were dissipated by the full text. When we came to read the very words, as sent by his own hand, it was found that he spoke of a party cry, a partisan word, and in his first line strictly limited it to its harshest meaning. He sharply defines "protection" as he denounces it, not as a general term in political science, or as it might be treated in discourses in the French Academy or at a German university. He says:

In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled "protection."

That which is styled "protection" in his own country is all that he speaks of—exactly that and nothing more. The word "democrat," the word "democratic," the word "republican," the word "republicanism"—all these have a general significance as they are found in literature, in political science, and in history. In that sense every member of the Republican party is a believer in democracy as opposed to aristocracy; and every Democrat in this Hall and in this country is a republican as opposed to a monarchist. They have a general definition far different from what they mean in his own country, where what are styled "Democrat," "Democracy," and "Democratic" refer to the adherents and tenets of a powerful political organization, and what are styled "Republican" and "Republicanism" refer to a party organization and a party creed; and what is styled "protection" in this country, in the strife of parties, is a party tenet, the essence of Republicanism. So it is known and understood by every boy on the street when he sees the word "protection" inscribed on a transparency in a political procession.

There was no mistaking his meaning. To such an audience, depressed with the day's news of the success of the protectionists in the elections in the United States on the previous Tuesday, our ambassador broke out in bitter denunciation of what was styled "protection" in his own country as "corrupting public life, banishing men of independent mind and character from the public councils, lowering the tone of national representation, blunting public conscience, divorcing ethics from politics, placing politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble, and throwing legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen."

It was said on this floor, when the question was first brought up, that the President of the United States had uttered similar sentiments in the past. He uttered them at home, in the midst of political strife. The ambassador uttered them abroad, just after an election favorable to protection, and after he had made a previous speech to Englishmen saying the American people were self-confident and oftentimes violent, whom it took a real man to govern, but fortunately they had a real man holding the office of President.

If the gentleman who uttered those words had been an American citizen, traveling in his own personal private capacity, we could have taken no notice of them, whatever might have been our opinion of the good or the bad taste of an American talking in that strain in other countries. If Americans when abroad choose to reflect upon their country or their countrymen or their institutions, it is their right; as private citizens they can do it. But not so with a man who goes from our Government to the court of the British Empire clothed with authority—who stands for the majesty of the whole Republic—who represents every citizen in all this country. He is received as a public representative, and as such his statements are accredited, justly accredited, as they would not otherwise be. When he speaks of his country he represents his countrymen—he represents all of them; and his words, whether to our honor or dishonor, are taken as the voice of the nation. Therein we all were wounded when he spoke with this bitter tongue of more than half his countrymen.

His predecessor, Mr. Lowell—a famous personality always and everywhere honored, but who when ambassador was treated with still greater respect, with the profoundest regard—when he was speaking to an English audience one day, and reference was made to American politics, said, "It is a rule with us, recognized as most fit, that family affairs should not be discussed before strangers." [Loud applause.] That same Lowell once delivered an address in England with a title which could be perverted by a narrow-minded man into a partisan word. The subject of the address was "Democracy." But he treated it in a higher sense, with a loftier spirit. It contained no partisan railing; and when he concluded an Englishman would have vainly asked of his neighbor, "Is he a Democrat, or is he a Republican?" No; he was an American, and only an American. He conducted himself in accordance with the duty of an ambassador in his action and his utterances.

In truth, I believe there has not in a hundred years been a public utterance by any representative of the United States on any spot of the globe, from the humblest consular agent to an ambassador, made either in eulogy or in denunciation of political parties at home.

When the ambassador went to old Boston the account before us says that he was taken on a special train, that the bells in the city were rung upon his arrival, that flags decorated the public buildings as the cortage passed, and that he was welcomed by the mayor and dignitaries of the city. That gentleman has been in Europe before, when he was not an ambassador, and when he then arrived in towns the flags were not displayed on the public buildings, nor the bells rung, nor special trains, nor mayors, nor civic dignitaries necessary.

He was presented to that great audience in Edinburgh with the profoundest respect as the American ambassador, and with such surroundings our ambassador launched into these anathemas upon his countrymen. Had he been at home, had it been before election, he might have used strong partisan language and it would have fallen unheeded, but this was addressed to foreigners, and every American of every party, of every shade of political opinion, felt the impropriety.

When, by reason of inquiry of this House, the President, through the Secretary of State, sent to the ambassador for information as to his speech, the ambassador replied transmitting it and justifying it. He challenged article 7 of the instructions to diplomatic officers as not having been violated. Think of it—an ambassador and an ex-Secretary of State defending himself against the offended sense of propriety of the whole nation by citing the mere strict letter, the bald letter, of a rule of the Department. He says no political canvass was approaching in that country. What had a speech denouncing a party in his own country to do with party conflicts in England? It is prohibited by the regulations that any officer in our service shall take part in the political contests of the country to which he is accredited. But no President, no Secretary of State, has ever deemed it necessary heretofore to caution even the humblest or the most ill-informed consular agent that he was not to go abroad and talk about our domestic politics. That has never been included in the regulations. He says, in justifying this strange speech:

The judgments so delivered were formed by me after careful deliberation.

Does anybody doubt that? Is that any justification? His old speeches in other places, in partisan conflicts here, undoubtedly expressed similar sentiments, and no one questioned his sincerity. But that was in his campaigns at home, when he was not an ambassador, but an ordinary Democratic politician trying to catch votes. What has that to do with the gross impropriety of taking these violent sentiments, these partisan likings or dislikings to other lands, and uttering them when acting as the representative of all the people? In this justifying dispatch he seems unconscious of the real nature of his offense.

He wounded the feelings of all Americans at home, not because he censured Republicans or Republican tenets, not because he was a Democrat—that we knew from other sources. Had a Republican, acting as ambassador, indulged in railing at the Democratic creed or its adherents as degrading and corrupting public life, is there a man in the whole country among the millions of Republicans who would not have felt hurt, humiliated, and offended at such a gross impropriety and injustice on the part of the representative of all the Democrats as well as all the Republicans in the United States?

There lies the offense; not in the sincerity of the belief, not in the truth or falsity of what he utters; that has nothing whatever to do with it. The seventh article of the instructions in their spirit prohibits any such course, and the sincerity of the belief of the man who uttered such sentiments has nothing to do with the question.

One of the essential qualifications of a diplomatic agent is to observe at all times a proper reserve in regard to the affairs of his Government.

That, Mr. Speaker, was issued by Secretary of State Bayard. [Applause.]

It is forbidden to diplomatic agents abroad to participate in any manner in the political concerns in the country of their residence; and they are directed especially to refrain from public expressions of opinion upon local, political, or other questions arising within their jurisdiction.

It is deemed advisable to extend a similar prohibition against public addresses, except upon exceptional festal occasions, in the country of official residence. Even upon such occasions the utmost caution must be observed in touching upon political matters.

If our representatives abroad are to be cautious in touching on political matters in other countries, how much more in touching upon those that reach the quick sensibilities of the millions of their countrymen at home?

Now, when this was reported in the papers some were incredulous, some censured, some criticised, and some regretted. The press of the country, with almost absolute unanimity, rebuked or censured or criticised the passionate partisan strain of the ambassador. Even the English press, which was in sympathy with the political economic views of the ambassador, felt and expressed also their sense of the impropriety of the utterances. One of the great London journals, explaining to its readers the close relation of protection to American politics, illustrated the irritation of the American people at the utterances of their ambassador by saying:

How would we feel if the British ambassador at Washington had delivered a speech at some public assembly in America in favor of Irish home rule and denouncing the Tory party, that prevailed at the last election?

The London Times, in a comment on the speech, which is a curious mixture of patronizing and contempt, said that—

Speeches such as those made by Mr. Bayard would not be delivered by a European diplomat, and even in Mr. Bayard's case they were rather surprising.

Now, after the declaration by our ambassador that the political faith of one of the great parties of this country was degrading and corrupting, after he had taken a declaration found in the national Democratic platform, that protection is a fraud and a robbery, and translated it into his own more impulsive, specific, and passionate phrase, what action did the President take with reference to it? None whatever. Not a suggestion of admonition, although he had delivered his "judgments after careful deliberation" in such strain as this:

In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled "protection," which I believe has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon state aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble, than any other single cause. * * * It—has unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes whose support is thereby attracted. Thus it has done so much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen.

The policy of protection—

Does that refer to the displacement of parties in this Hall from the aisle on my right to the aisle on my left? The result of the last election has in fact so increased the Republican or protectionist members of this House that they now occupy it clear around from the end of the Hall on my right to the aisle on my left, beyond which the Democrats extend one-third of the House, instead of the great majority they formerly had. Is there anyone on the floor so bitterly imbued with partisan sentiment that he would utter in any presence such a slander as that the displacement on this floor by the last election put "jobbers" and "chafferers" in the place of "statesmen"? Could we, would any Republican here, find it in his heart to say that the result of the previous election where we were displaced and the Democrats given control of this House put jobbers and chafferers in the place of statesmen? No Representative of a district here on either side would use such language. Is that the language for a representative of the whole people of the United States? Had action been taken by the Executive, as has been so often done in cases of indiscretions and improprieties far less than this by our officers abroad, this might have passed without notice by the House. But the President replies to our inquiry that though months have gone by no word, even of admonition, has been given to this offending officer.

Mr. Speaker, the indiscretions and the offenses of consuls and ministers abroad have often been rebuked by admonition or by censure, and sometimes by recall by the Department itself. There are innumerable examples of this. One of the early ministers we sent abroad was James Monroe, afterwards so justly famous, then young in the public service, and who indiscreetly made a glowing address in the French National Convention a few days after the fall of Robespierre in 1794. It was undoubtedly an ill-advised thing to make such a speech to that blood-stained, dreadful assembly. For that he was rebuked by an admonition from the Secretary of State, and General Washington wrote a few words about it which it is worth while to read and ponder to-day in connection with the pending question.

The truth is Mr. Monroe was cajoled, flattered, and made to believe strange things. In return he did or was disposed to do whatever was pleasing to that nation, reluctantly urging the rights of his own.

It often happens that a minister takes on the hue or opinions of the country where he resides in its contests with other countries. I have seen that often. In the contest between Chile and Peru in 1881 it so happened that our ministers to those Republics came to Washington on leave of absence at the same time, reporting at the Department on the same day. I heard them both. Each stated that the country to which he was accredited was in the right and that the other was the aggressor, and they spoke almost as if attorneys for those Governments. That is but natural, and it is a caution constantly given to our representatives to beware of it, but we never before had one who needed cautioning to prevent his speaking against his own people.

The ambassador himself justified his course in his letter before us to the Secretary. He sends a copy of this speech issued by the "Printers in Ordinary to Her Majesty." His speech has been reprinted in this country as a partisan pamphlet by the New England Free Trade League. The committee charged to consider this question has reported resolutions censuring such utterances. Is it not time that Congress should speak?

The minority in their report say that the proposition to censure by resolution is "unwarranted and unprecedented." Whether it is warranted or not I think nearly every citizen of the United States is perfectly qualified to answer, and the press of the United States long ago answered.

It is not unprecedented—far from it. The very last Congress passed a resolution to censure Mr. Stevens, minister to Hawaii. The minority find fault with this as an invasion of the functions of the Executive with which Congress should not interfere. It is not so considered by the President. The President, by his influence and pressure upon Democratic members in this House, drove through a resolution, by the votes of reluctant members here, censuring Minister Stevens, who, it was alleged, had been too strongly zealous for his country, though the Democratic committee of the Senate afterwards found on careful examination that he had acted throughout within the line of patriotic duty. You who were members of the last House, many of you, know that that vote was reluctant, gathered up from men who disliked it to the very last moment. I heard them myself in conversation disavow their sympathy with the resolution, but they said they would yield because it lay so close to the heart of the President. He was then bent on overturning the Hawaiian Republic and restoring the Queen.

We have often had ministers who went to the verge of indiscretion in the performance of their duties, where they were influenced by the public opinion where they resided, taking sides with that country in its contests with neighboring countries. But in none of these cases was fault found with the patriotism of the minister, nor did he indulge in any criticism of his own country. So, too, within a few days the Spanish minister in this city has been criticised for some public utterances, but they were not harsh judgments of his own people or any part of them. Minister Stevens was not condemned by the Democratic majority of this House for any word or act against any of his countrymen. If that was an occasion for a resolution of censure by the House, the gentlemen who voted for it must agree that this is a far more fitting occasion for the House to act.

In these resolutions the House lays down a just rule for all our diplomatic and consular officers in all countries—that they should not in public speeches display partisanship, or condemn any political party or party policy or organization in the United States; that such conduct is in dereliction of their duty, impairs their usefulness, and diminishes the confidence they should always command. Such a rule of conduct I think ought to have the vote of every member of the House and the assent of every American, so that it will never again happen that an ambassador representing the seventy millions of the great Republic will anywhere in the world forget that he represents, not a party, but the whole people, and that it is his duty not to darken the good name of any part of them. It is a wrong to the country he represents, to that great Republic with whose majesty and dignity he is clothed, and to all the people for whom he speaks in all his public utterances. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the pending resolutions, and I hope after proper consideration they will not be adopted. Three months ago resolutions relating to the impeachment of Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, United States ambassador to Great Britain, were presented in this House, based upon brief extracts from two speeches delivered by him in Boston, England, and Edinburgh, Scotland. The Constitution of the United States provides that civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors. Treason consists in levying war against the United States or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. A high crime or misdemeanor is an offense indictable under common law or statute law. It is apparent, therefore, that the proposition to impeach Ambassador Bayard for his utterances in public speeches is absurd and unwarranted. Leading Republicans caused the resolutions to be amended before they were sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, so as to practically annul all attempts at impeachment.

Resolutions of censure were also offered in the House of Representatives, containing the same extracts from the two speeches made by Ambassador Bayard, and they were also referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That committee, after holding these resolutions for nearly two months, reported to this House the resolutions now under consideration to censure and condemn Ambassador Bayard. The delay of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in ordering any report on the Bayard resolutions and the delay in this House in considering the resolutions show plainly that there are many Republicans who are doubtful about the propriety of such action by the House and who are not eager to vote condemnation and censure upon one of our worthiest diplomatic officers.

The resolutions reported are unprecedented in Congressional history. No diplomatic officer has ever in the past been censured or condemned by the House of Representatives for freedom of speech. The framers of the resolutions did not dare to make them joint resolutions or concurrent resolutions, but made them simply House resolutions. They were unwilling to allow the Senate of the United States to consider them, for they well knew that such resolutions would never receive the indorsement of the Senate.

The proposed action by the House of Representatives is an invasion of the rights and authority of the President of the United States. Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, says:

> The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers, the national Constitution being the instrument which specifies them and in which authority should be found for the exercise of any power which the National Government assumes to possess.

The Constitution of the United States provides for three coordinate branches of government—the executive, legislative, and judicial. In enumerating the powers of the legislative branch of the Government the House of Representatives is given no authority whatever to confirm or censure diplomatic representatives. On the contrary, it is specially provided in the enumeration of the powers of the Executive that—

> The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls.

The House of Representatives has no authority in the appointment or confirmation of ambassadors or ministers, and in all the years that have passed since the organization of our Government the House of Representatives has never attempted before to censure or condemn a diplomatic officer for his public utterances. The House of Representatives might as well censure a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States for a decision rendered by him, or a United States Senator for a speech made by him, as to censure a diplomatic officer for his utterances.

Since the organization of our Government the President of the United States has controlled our diplomatic officers, and the commissions issued to them declare that each is appointed for and during the pleasure of the President. He has recalled them, or removed them, or reprimanded them when, in his judgment, it was deemed proper. There are many cases to support this position, but I will only refer to a few. In 1890, while Mr. Mizner was United States minister to Guatemala, an attempt was made to arrest General Barundia, a passenger on the American steamer Acapulco, in the port of San Jose in virtue of a letter from Mr. Mizner to the captain directing his surrender. No judicial warrant or proceeding appears, and the attempt at arrest was made by the military commandant of the port and a squad of soldiers. General Barundia resisted and was killed. Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, November 18, 1890, recited and analyzed the case, and by direction of the President Mr. Mizner was recalled and removed.

In 1869 Mr. Motley was commissioned as minister to Great Britain and charged with the conduct of the Alabama claims negotiation. His course gave great dissatisfaction to the President, and on July 1, 1870, his resignation was called for by the President, and he resigned and another minister was appointed.

In 1892 Mr. Scruggs was minister of the United States to Venezuela, and was invited August 26, 1892, by direction of the President of the United States, to resign, and did resign. I did not expect to bring into this debate the old and worn-out subject of Hawaii, but my friend and colleague from Illinois [Mr. HITT], who preceded me, said President Cleveland forced the Democratic members of this House last Congress to pass the Hawaiian resolution. I deny that statement fully and positively, and I am surprised that the present chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs should have made it.

The resolutions which were introduced by me in the House of Representatives with regard to Minister Stevens and the Hawaiian Islands were passed by the House of Representatives by 101 majority, and there were but two Democrats in this House who voted against them. The Hawaiian resolutions were not analogous to the resolutions now being considered. We are now called on to censure and condemn an ambassador for freedom of speech. Mr. Stevens, the minister to Hawaii, was censured and condemned because of his acts; because he had violated his instructions; because he had violated international law; because he had taken down the Hawaiian flag and run up the American flag and declared a protectorate in Hawaii. The President of the United States—a Republican President—disavowed the action of Mr. Stevens, and he was condemned because of his acts and not because of his utterances.

I will read the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives:

> Resolved, First. That it is the sense of this House that the action of the United States minister in employing United States naval forces and illegally aiding in overthrowing the constitutional Government of the Hawaiian Islands in January, 1893, and in setting up in its place a Provisional Government not republican in form and in opposition to the will of a majority of the people, was contrary to the traditions of our Republic and the spirit of our Constitution, and should be and is condemned.

Second. That we heartily approve the principle announced by the President of the United States that interference with the domestic affairs of an independent nation is contrary to the spirit of American institutions. And it is further the sense of this House that the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to our country, or the assumption of a protectorate over them by our Government, is uncalled for and inexpedient; that the people of that country should have absolute freedom and independence in pursuing their own line of policy, and that foreign intervention in the political affairs of the islands will not be regarded with indifference by the Government of the United States.

It is evident that there is no analogy between the proposed action in regard to Ambassador Bayard and the action taken in regard to the Hawaiian Islands. A treaty was sent to the Senate for confirmation by President Harrison, which required our Government to pay three millions and a half of dollars in order to annex Hawaii, and President Cleveland, after he was inaugurated March 4, 1893, wisely withdrew the treaty from the Senate, and the House of Representatives indorsed him for so doing. My friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] in his speech this morning said that the President of the United States by his power induced Democrats to adopt those resolutions. I say to-day that, practically, the most important of those resolutions, to wit, the last one, has been indorsed by the Republican party at this session of Congress. We indorsed the President for withdrawing the treaty of annexation, and this Congress has been in session for three months and nothing has been done in regard to annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, if the speeches of Mr. Bayard referred to in the pending resolutions require any action by the President, I am sure he will do his full duty at the proper time. The Edinburgh speech was delivered November 7, 1895, and the resolutions assailing Mr. Bayard were offered in the House of Representatives on the 10th of December, one month after the speech was made.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Is there not an error in relation to the election? The last general election was a year prior to the 5th of November, 1895.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I thank my friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER]. He has called my attention to the error of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]. The election of members of Congress was in November, 1894, and the Edinburgh speech was made on November 7, 1895, or more than one year after Congressmen were elected in the United States. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] is therefore in error in the statement he made, that Ambassador Bayard's Edinburgh speech was made just after he had heard from the Congressional elections in the United States.

I have stated that no diplomatic officer was ever censured or condemned for his public utterances. There is, however, one case where the acts of a diplomatic officer have been condemned by a resolution of the House of Representatives, and that is the case of a prominent Republican, Hon. Robert Schenck, minister to Great Britain, whose conduct in connection with the Emma silver mine was investigated by a committee of the House of Representatives and resolutions reported and adopted condemning his action.

It is hardly necessary in this connection for me to remind members of this House that Mr. Schenck was also made conspicuous while representing the United States at the Court of St. James by an address which he wrote on the subject of draw poker.

To those who have not seen the book containing this address I now exhibit a copy which I have obtained from the Library of Congress. There was no effort made to censure Minister Schenck for anything written in this book nor for his departure from the ordinary and regular duties of an American minister.

The title of the book is Rules for Playing Poker, by Hon. Robert C. Schenck, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America near Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland. [Applause.]

I will read only the first line in the book: "The deal is of no special value, and anybody may begin." [Laughter.]

The position of the American ambassador at London is unique and different from that of any other American ambassador or minister accredited to any other nation of the world. He is an English-speaking ambassador, and he represents a country whose laws and institutions are in many respects similar to those of the country to which he is accredited. The English people invite him to their great college commencements, public assemblages, and important banquets. Nearly all of our American ministers have made themselves more or less conspicuous by their speeches while officially representing the United States at London. Edward Everett while minister to England made 12 speeches, and in the preface to the volume containing these speeches he says:

This interchange of public courtesies between a foreign minister and the people among whom he resides is a valuable step in advancing the civilization of the present century.

In former times the public intercourse of a foreign minister was exclusively with the government or court to which he was accredited. At the present day in England and in this country he is a welcomed guest on all public occasions not in their nature exclusively national. The change appears to me favorable to a good understanding between the countries in many important respects.

I now refer to the gentleman to whom my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], referred—James Russell Lowell—the gentleman whom my colleague on the committee held up as a man who while he was minister to Great Britain did not speak on political subjects. Mr. Lowell made a number of speeches. The chief address and the best made by this great Republican was on "Democracy."

I read from his address on "Democracy." He says:

Universal suffrage has in the United States sometimes been the instrument of inconsiderate changes under the notion of reform; and this from misconception of the true meaning of popular government.

He was then discussing universal suffrage. He says again:

The arguments against universal suffrage are equally unanswerable. "What," we exclaim, "shall Tom, Dick, and Harry have as much weight in the scale as I?" Of course, nothing could be more absurd; and yet universal suffrage has not been the instrument of greater unwisdom than contrivances of a more select description.

That is what Mr. Lowell says; that is an extract from his speech on "Democracy." But I will give you another. He did not forget to talk about protection:

I hear Americans sometimes playfully accused of sending you all your storms, and I am in the habit of parrying the charge by alleging that we are enabled to do this because in virtue of our protective system we can afford to make better bad weather than anybody else.

Thus this paragon, this perfect minister to whom the gentleman from Illinois referred, discussed universal suffrage and discussed also protection.

I have here a book that was written by Charles K. Tuckerman, who was at one time minister of the United States to Greece. In speaking of the minister to England he says:

When this gentleman, on his arrival in England, was invited to a reception by the Chamber of Commerce at Liverpool, that respectable and influential body of free traders hoped to elicit from the new minister of the United States an opinion favorable to the principles they espoused. But Mr. L. (the minister) disappointed them. He was the last man to commit himself to that doctrine; for he had accumulated a large fortune from his cotton mills which but for protection would not have been realized. He told them in his address that were he an Englishman, residing in England, he should certainly be a free trader, which sentiment elicited a burst of applause.

It seems that even a Republican minister, when he was in England, did not like protection as well as some of my Republican friends in this House. He certainly was not in favor of censuring and condemning a minister for referring to protection, because he himself referred to it. He said also, being an American, living in his own country, his interests there demanded the protection of American industries. Which statement was received with appalling silence, and the sagacity of the diplomatist, in the opinion of the Chamber of Commerce, fell considerably below par.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have not time to read any more extracts. I call the attention of members of this House to the great speech made by Mr. Edward Phelps. When he was minister representing the United States at the Court of St. James he made a great speech at the same place at which Mr. Bayard spoke. He made his speech before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, and he made it on "The law of the land." Every minister whom we have had in England has been conspicuous more or less for the speeches he has made, and it is unjust and unfair to select garbled extracts from Mr. Bayard's speeches as a pretext or excuse for censuring and condemning him. Ambassador Bayard is not the first diplomatic representative of the United States who has been assailed by his political opponents while representing the United States in England. Martin Van Buren was assailed while he was minister to England, and the criticisms helped to open the way for him to be Vice-President and President of the United States. The attacks on James Buchanan made by his political opponents for conduct and expressions while he was United States minister at London helped to elect him President in 1856. A vote of censure now, prompted by prejudice and partisanship, will not injure Hon. Thomas F. Bayard. The animus and purpose are too well understood. It may prove a garland of distinction and open the way to him for higher offices and greater honors.

The people of our country are behind Mr. Bayard in his opposition to protection and trusts in far greater numbers than they are behind those who seek to condemn and censure him. The people know that Thomas F. Bayard has proved himself a patriot, a statesman, and a faithful public servant; that he was conspicuous for many years as United States Senator, and faithful and able as a Cabinet officer; that he has filled the great office of ambassador of the United States in England with ability and honor; that he has won the respect and regard of the English people; that he has done much to promote good will and friendship between the people of Great Britain and the United States; that he has added to the reputation and importance of our great country abroad, and that he has by a long life of usefulness at home and faithful service abroad earned not the censure but the thanks of the American people. [Applause.]

Even if there are Representatives in this House who believe that Mr. Bayard has been guilty of an indiscretion or an impropriety, I ask them to pause and refuse to commit a greater indiscretion or impropriety by making an unwarranted intrusion upon the rights and prerogative of the President and by doing that which will echo through Europe as well as through our own country and cause the people to ask what is the standard of public decorum in America, and what has caused the House of Representatives of the United States to assume authority and power which it is not entitled to and which has never been assumed before under the same circumstances. Besides, at this time to censure Mr. Bayard will be detrimental to cordial and pleasant relations between our country and Great Britain, and would detract from the prestige and confidence which he should have when he, as a diplomatic officer, represents our country in negotiations concerning important questions now pending.

Mr. Speaker, what has caused the pending resolutions to be presented? Why has this attack been made upon an American ambassador? It is not because he made a brief extemporaneous speech at Boston, England, when invited to address the grammar school and present the awards, but it is because of his reference in his Edinburgh speech to "protection" and "trusts." The high priests of protection are moving forward to that point where their pet schemes of protection and their combinations and trusts are not to be criticised, and the freedom of speech, even in an academic address, is to be denied. If Thomas F. Bayard is to be tried because of speeches made by him, he should not be tried or condemned upon one phrase, but he should be tried on the whole context, and the full meaning of the speech should be considered. He says in his lettter to the Secretary of State, in referring to his Boston speech:

At some personal inconvenience and hoping to strengthen the ties of friendly good will between the people of this country and my own, I made the journey to Lincolnshire, returning to London by midnight. The exercises were of a very simple and informal nature, and without a note or prepared words of any kind I made a short prefatory speech and handed over the prizes to the successful competitors. In the afternoon we adjourned to a public hall or hotel, where a dinner was served, and, as is customary here, there were toasts and responses, and I responded to the health of the President of the United States and subsequently to a toast to myself. So far as I was concerned, everything was impromptu, and a kindly, humorous, postprandial tone prevailed. It seems a reporter was present, but I did not see him.

Mr. Speaker, now let us compare the words presented in the pending resolutions for which an American ambassador is to be censured and condemned with the full statement made by him. The pending resolutions declare that Mr. Bayard said:

He, the President of the United States, stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek to have their own way, and I tell you plainly it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States.

It will scarcely be denied, I presume, that our people are strong and self-confident, and when he said oftentimes violent people he may have been thinking of the riots at Chicago and Pittsburg and other points, where United States troops were necessary to preserve order. The full text of his extemporaneous speech, when called upon to respond to a toast to the health of the President of the United States, is as follows:

The office of President of the United States is not only one of great dignity, but it is one of great responsibility and great anxiety. He is called to that position by the voice of his countrymen—not unanimously, for that would be impossible, but is called by a majority of the voices of his countrymen and against oftentimes a powerful minority. Therefore there is no bed of roses for the man who occupies the position of President of the United States. He stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek to have their own way, and men who seek to have that way frequently obstructed, and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States. [Cheers.] Fortunately in this case there is a real man to govern the people of the United States and hold their highest office. [Cheers.] He may displease a great many, he may disappoint and obstruct a great many, and I hope he will continue to do so [cheers], but, on the other hand, there is not a man, woman, or child in the United States that does not in his or her heart respect the man who is their chief ruler. [Cheers.] His life is an open one; it is simple, straightforward, easy to be understood; it is surrounded by none of the forms that prevent inspection; it can be understood as fairly as the life of any private citizen, and even more so, because attention is directed to it.

We told something of the fierce light that beats upon a throne, and the fierce light that beats upon a throne beats also upon a presidency, and every act, public or private, is open to inspection and receives it. Now, it is characteristic, and it is a great deal to be said for our race—I say our race ["Hear!" "Hear!"], for it is the same [cheers]—that whenever the people have been left free to choose their own ruler they have chosen the men, they have chosen a class of men who, however mistaken they may have been in the eyes of certain people—they have chosen a class of men about whose personal character there is not the slightest stain to be perceived. [Cheers.] To-day, therefore, in what we call in our simple fashion the White House—it is a good color; it is white, and it is pure [cheers]—there is a manhood that has never shrunk, an honesty that has never been questioned, and an ability that finds respect everywhere. [Cheers.] These are the man's qualities; but in addition to that, my friends, there are the charms of as sweet a womanhood as ever dwelt in a man's house. [Cheers.] Little children cluster round his knee, and a fond and pure mother watches over them and rears them, and to-day the American people have the great cause of profound satisfaction that the home of their chief ruler is the home of an honest manhood, of a pure womanhood, and of an innocent childhood. [Cheers.]

Surely there is nothing in this speech to justify the adoption of the resolutions now under consideration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to question the sweet womanhood or the prattling childhood, but I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is a true statement where the ambassador says that Mr. Cleveland governs the people of the United States; and if the gentleman thinks it is true, will he kindly state in what way Mr. Cleveland governs the people of the United States, and especially whether he can govern the Democratic party; and further, whether he can govern the gentleman himself upon any question of politics?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I thought my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who is generally dignified, desired to ask me a question for information, but the latter part of his question shows he is trying to be facetious.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desired information.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky (continuing). I suppose that he is to-day so happy over having been recently selected as a delegate at large from the State of Ohio to help nominate McKinley for President that he is inclined to be humorous. [Laughter and applause.] But I will answer the gentleman's question. The President of the United States, in my opinion, governs the people according to the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, and I am ready always to uphold the President of the United States when I believe he is discharging his duty faithfully and according to the Constitution and the laws.

I shall not dwell longer on the Boston speech, for it is perfectly clear to my mind that the real gravamen of the charge against Mr. Bayard and the real cause of this attack is the reference to "protection" in his Edinburgh speech. His address on "individual freedom the germ of national progress and permanence," taken as a whole, is a scholarly, able, patriotic, and thoroughly American address. In it he refers to the wonderful growth and development of our country, its freedom, its inventions, its productive industry, its progress in science, literature, and art, its opportunities for intellectual advancement, its wonderful agricultural advantages, and he makes many other eloquent and appropriate allusions; but the reference to protection and trusts is the so-called offense against diplomatic propriety and the so-called affront to the devotees of protection and trusts for which it is now asked that he be censured and condemned.

There are many extracts from this great speech that I would be glad to read to the members of the House of Representatives. To fair-minded men who are not blinded by protection prejudice or political partisanship I believe they would offset any alleged indiscretion in the brief extract which has been thrust in the pending resolutions, and which no more represents the real speech, taken as a whole, than does one stone taken from this great Capitol represent the symmetry and proportions of this splendid building. I will, however, venture to read a few eloquent, forcible, and appropriate extracts from Mr. Bayard's speech at Edinburgh.

He spoke ably and forcibly of capital and labor. He said:

It is clear and indubitable that the interests of capital and labor are united by a common fate; they are copartners, not adversaries, and there should be no obscuration of this important truth. The legislation or the party management that proceeds upon the false idea that the interests of capital and labor are divisible and antagonistic should alike be condemned, for the prosperity of each is bound up with the other, and the principles of personal liberty are equally necessary for the welfare of both.

He said further:

Autocracy, plutocracy, oligarchy, socialism, or mob rule, each and all are equally fatal to well-ordered government, of which the end is the personal liberty and happiness of the individual, a society in which the essential unit is a free man.

His reference to the freedom of the individual is worthy of the most careful consideration. It is as follows:

The freedom of the individual in human society is, and always must be, the essential and immutable factor to meet and obediently to recognize and carry out the developments of the Supreme will as it shall be permitted to become known to the minds and consciences of men, if progress or even permanence in civilization is hoped for. For, as man is "heaven born and destined to the skies again," the laws that placed him here will surely vindicate themselves. * * * In the scrupulous safeguarding of personal liberty, independence in judgment, thought, and lawful action, the true seed of progress and permanence can alone be found.

Of truth, free conscience, and mental exertion he said:

Truth has been called the daughter of time, and assuredly the history of the nineteen centuries which have passed since the light of the Christian moral order has been shed upon the world discloses the indubitable fact that every discovery under which improvement in human relations has been accomplished and by which the civilization of mankind has progressed has been brought into the world's use through the channel of an individual mind, and in no instance by the associated power of mankind. No great discovery can be named which has opened new fields of beneficent and useful industry, increased benevolence, widened and deepened sympathies, and elevated human thought and action but is due to the free conscience, private judgment, and mental exertion of an individual.

His eloquent and appropriate allusion to the growth and development of our country must have made an impression even on his English audience. On this subject he said:

You will, I believe, agree with me in holding the rapid growth and development of the United States to be the most remarkable page in the history of civilized mankind. The echoes of the savage war whoop, the crack of the rifle, the sound of the settler's ax, and crash of the falling timber had scarcely died away when behold, a continental civilization presented itself. One flag waving from the Atlantic to the Pacific shores, and from the Frozen Ocean and the Canadian line to the gulfs of California and Mexico, over the homes of nearly seventy millions of self-governing, vigorous, and intelligent people, sanguine of the future and animated with the best results of the world's progress in the scale of civilization. Yet little more than a century has rolled by since, breathless, bleeding, clad in ragged homespun, but radiant with solemn triumph—

Rough, poor, content, ungovernably bold;
War in each breast, and freedom on each brow!

their ancestors, emerging from an unequal contest, gathered themselves together as a family of republics, united under a single independent Government, stepped into the family of nations, and calmly took their place at the council table of the world's powers.

This marvelous progress can only be adequately accounted for by the freedom permitted to the units of that population, to each individual citizen, without surrender of conscience, to enjoy the admitted right to accomplish his own manhood, to be fully himself, to select the suitable occupation for which instinctively he felt himself to be competent, and upon which he embarked with the energy born of hope and confidence.

I close with his reference to liberty and law, which is as follows:

No proclamation of their liberties, from Magna Charta on this side of the Atlantic to the colonial Declaration of Independence on the other side, or the written Constitution that followed it, was a mere recital of measures or a dry catalogue of statutes, but each and all were vitalized by the eternal principles that make and keep men free, and were laid down with stern and clear significance, not for a day, but for all time, principles of daily life and action, to which the changing forms and conditions of society as it progressed would be adjusted and guarded at every point, and shining like a golden thread through every sentence was the liberty of the individual. * * *

No man in this country is so high that he is above the law. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance with impunity. All the officers of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, are creatures of the law, and are bound to obey it.

I wish I had time to read other extracts from this scholarly and eloquent speech, but I will not trespass upon the time of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended, so that he may conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am very grateful for the courtesy of the House.

Mr. Bayard's utterances at Edinburgh on the subject of protection and trusts were no stronger than the declarations which he often made in the Senate of the United States, and which other Democratic leaders have often made, or than were made in our last national Democratic platform. I have no doubt it seemed proper to him in the elaborate address he was making that he should refer to protection.

The platform on which the President was elected who appointed him ambassador to Great Britain declares: "We denounce Republican protection as a fraud, a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few."

His statements in his Edinburgh speech that protection "fosters class legislation," "creates inequality of fortune," and "dangerously depletes the Treasury," are true, and are supported by facts which can not be satisfactorily controverted.

The Democratic national platform adopted in 1892 denounced the McKinley tariff law enacted by the Fifty-first Congress as the "culminating atrocity of class legislation," and the people indorsed the truth of this statement when they elected Grover Cleveland President.

If we wish proof of the "inequalities of fortune," we have but to read the reports of two eminent statisticians, who have shown that less than 50,000 persons in the United States own one-half in value of all the property in the United States, while 68,000,000 people own the other half.

That a Republican protective tariff "dangerously depletes the Treasury," is shown by the fact that at the close of Mr. Cleveland's first Administration, in 1889, he left in the Treasury $97,874,422 of free gold in excess of the gold reserve, while at the close of President Harrison's Administration there was in the Treasury of the United States less than $1,000,000 above the gold reserve, and if the just indebtedness then due had been paid, there would have been no available money in the Treasury.

A considerable deficit in the Treasury during President Harrison's Administration was only avoided by the use of a fund of nearly $60,000,000 which had been placed in the Treasury by the national banks, and it is well known that before President Harrison's Administration ended orders had been issued for the preparation of plates and the printing of bonds for issue, and it was only by a great strain that the issue of bonds was postponed and this burdensome legacy given to President Cleveland's Administration.

Thus we see that the allegations made by Ambassador Bayard, to which I have referred, are strongly supported by facts, and when we remember the assessments and large contributions which have been made by great companies and corporations interested in protection to elect those favorable to their interests, we can but admit that the tendency of protection is to corrupt and debauch public sentiment and "throw legislation in the political markets."

In seven Congresses Democrats have earnestly worked for tariff reform. In the last Congress their hopes were partly realized. The advocates of a protective tariff have run the whole gamut of subterfuges. In the early years of the Republic they plead infancy, and assured the people that a protective tariff was only necessary to foster and encourage our infant industries. When these industries became gigantic and full-grown and equal to any in the world they plead "war necessity," and declared that high-tariff rates were necessary to raise extraordinary sums of money needed to preserve the Union and defend the nation's life. But they did not tell the people that for every dollar that went into the Treasury of the United States at least four dollars went into the pockets of the manufacturer because of the tariff laws.

As far back as 1861, when Mr. MORRILL of Vermont reported the tariff bill that bore his name, he made the distinct pledge in Congress that "this is intended as a war measure, a temporary measure, and we must give it our support as such." Thirty-five years have passed since that pledge was made. The Union is preserved, peace reigns supreme, and fraternity and friendship bless every part of our country; but the advocates of protection are not willing that that pledge shall be redeemed. When the McKinley bill, in 1890, was passed, the Republicans admitted that they were in favor of protection for protection's sake. The mask was then thrown aside, and the battle for protection has grown stronger as the years roll on.

At the present session of Congress, on Christmas day, Republican Congressmen prepared a bill, which was passed next day with less than two hours' discussion on each side, which increased the tax on wool and woolen goods 40 per cent and made a horizontal increase on all other articles, except sugar, of 15 per cent, thereby adding about $44,000,000 annually to the burdens of taxation imposed upon the people, and this, too, when the President and the Secretary of the Treasury declared that it was not necessary to increase the revenue. In 1884, 4,874,000 American citizens who elected Grover Cleveland declared against Republican protection, and 5,556,000 American citizens, who in 1892 elected Cleveland a second time, reaffirmed their previous declarations, and expressly declared against Republican protection.

The question of so-called protection is a living, important, absorbing question, which is engaging the attention of the civilized world. Our consuls abroad make reports on the effects of a protective tariff, and our diplomatic representatives are continually required to consider and discuss matters affecting protection and conduct negotiations concerning reciprocal trade relations. It was natural, therefore, in a comprehensive address to educators and students, that Mr. Bayard should give his views on protection.

Mr. Speaker, when a citizen of our free country becomes an ambassador or a minister should he be required to surrender or suppress his true sentiments? Should he not have the right to speak his sentiments politely and respectfully if they are in accord with the policy of the Government he represents? The people of the civilized world are aware of the political revolutions which occur in this Republic, and they are aware that we do not have in this country a special diplomatic corps in office for life, but that our ambassadors and ministers are appointed from the political party in power. They are men who supported the President whose commissions they bear, and they uphold the policies of his Administration. "Their views on these policies should give no offense at home if they give none abroad." Members of the American Congress should not be afraid of the discussion of any great national or international question in which the people of the world are concerned, in order that truth and the best interests of mankind may be advanced. Rule 64 of personal instructions to the diplomatic agents of the United States in foreign countries was very pointedly referred to by the gentleman [Mr. HITT] who preceded me.

A careful examination of that rule will show that it refers to the duty of diplomatic representatives as regards the public or political affairs of the government to which they are accredited.

Rule 65 is taken literally from a circular issued by Mr. Seward October 1, 1862, and has been since universally interpreted as referring to political matters concerning the country of the diplomatic agent's residence. In its present context it obviously bears an explanatory relation to what precedes, and as used by Mr. Seward it similarly explained and defined the instructions it supplemented. Like the consular prohibition, the collateral diplomatic rule has never been enlarged to cover all domestic questions or politics and forbid their discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken longer than I intended, and I appreciate the attention and indulgence of my colleagues of the House of Representatives. In conclusion I wish to say, when the present Speaker of this House was chosen in Republican caucus he is reported to have given to his supporters a wise warning when he said:

History will accord us praise for what we did in the Fifty-first Congress, and it may accord us praise in this Congress for what we did not do.

I am sure the Republican majority in this House will have more praise for abstaining from the adoption of the pending resolutions than they will have if they adopt them.

Great and important problems which concern Great Britain and the United States have to be solved in the near future. In the crisis which may come in the consideration of great international questions and in the maintenance of a doctrine which is sacred to our country and dear to our people, we need an able, well-equipped, and experienced ambassador such as Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, and he should not now be embarrassed or his usefulness impaired by being censured and condemned. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DRAPER. Mr. Speaker, I shall say the little that I have to say from a conservative standpoint, or at least one that I believe to be conservative. I should not speak at all on these resolutions were it not for the fact that my position on the committee and my relations to gentlemen from my own State who are in a sense responsible for the consideration of this subject seem to make it necessary for me to define my position better than I could do by a mere yea or nay vote.

The two resolutions are of a radically different character. The first condemns and censures the utterances referred to of Ambassador Bayard, and also says that in publicly saying these things he has committed an offense against diplomatic propriety and abused the privileges of his exalted position. The second resolution makes simply a general statement in regard to the kind of speeches which should not be made by diplomatic officers abroad, and which might well be a part of our diplomatic rules.

I presume I am not alone in the House in feeling that while the speeches of our ambassador in England may call for some action on our part, the extreme wording of the first resolution presented goes a long way toward defeating its own object.

This does not seem to me a suitable occasion for sensationalism or exaggerated denunciation.

We have sufficient trouble and threatenings of trouble already, in our foreign affairs, without unnecessarily discrediting an ambassador that we have not the power to remove.

Now, I do not believe that there is a man on this floor who thinks the speeches referred to were in good taste, or that they ought to have been made by an American diplomatic representative in a foreign country.

My point is that the case can be better reached without personal denunciation, and by a simple resolution like the second one before us, stating that no American diplomat abroad ought to make partisan addresses, or addresses reflecting on the views and purposes of a large part of the American people.

More than this, it is fair to say that, in my belief, this first resolution would never have been before us if gentlemen on both sides of the committee who agreed in the main had shown a willingness to act together on this matter from a broad, national standpoint, without considering party lines.

I hope that this error will not be perpetuated in the action of the House. If every member who has said privately that he is opposed to denunciatory resolutions on this subject votes as he has talked, we shall be better satisfied with the result when we review the work of the session.

Action should be taken that will embody the substantially universal sentiment of the House, rather than extreme action supported merely by a party vote.

I desire to appeal to the common sense of the House, a quality that perhaps as much as sentiment ought to be recognized in dealing with the delicate questions that have relation to our foreign affairs.

If in order, I shall ask now that votes be taken on the two resolutions separately; but if not, I shall hope to be recognized to make that request when the proper time arrives. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of great regret that the nation should be obliged to suffer the humiliation that necessarily ensues from any inquiry by the Congress into the conduct or official character of a prominent representative of the Government. The censure of a high official is not only a disapproval of his misconduct, but is likewise a confession to the world which reflects somewhat upon the Government that is obliged to make it. Nevertheless, the duty to disapprove a wrong must not be shirked for the mere sake of avoiding the humiliation which may possibly attend it. The subject having been brought to the attention of this body, it must in some manner be disposed of. Either we must approve or we must disapprove. For my own part, I would very much prefer that it had never become necessary for this subject to be projected into Congress. To be obliged to make a public record of an exceptional performance so out of color and keeping with the high character that has heretofore characterized and been maintained in our representation at the Court of Great Britain is for me a matter of profound regret.

When we recall the names of the many and distinguished representatives who in times past have represented this Republic at the Court of St. James, we wish that the succession of honor and dignity and ability had not thus been broken. But this deliberate and unexampled breach of diplomatic etiquette—this ungrateful, unprovoked, and unbecoming insult to a majority of the people of America, to her distinguished living and to her honored dead, by one who bore their confidence, their mission, and credentials—must not be left unchallenged, since it has entered the annals of our diplomatic history. The charge on which this resolution rests is not denied. It is, in fact, admitted. The answer of the President to the inquiry of the House of Representatives contains both speeches of Mr. Bayard that are complained of.

The first speech delivered at Boston, England, is reported in the Boston Guardian and the Lincolnshire Independent of August 10, 1895, under the following headlines:

BOSTON, EAST AND WEST—THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR VISITS THE BOROUGH—SPEECH DAY AT THE GRAMMAR SCHOOL—COMPLIMENTARY DINNER—PRESENTATIONS OF AN ILLUMINATED ADDRESS.

This account of the performance is authentic, because Mr. Bayard attaches it to his letter to the Secretary of State, Mr. Olney. His only explanation of the silly affair is that he spoke "without premeditation," that everything was "impromptu," and that "a humorous postprandial tone" prevailed, and that the reporters failed to catch his words, sometimes in Latin, and confused them. [Laughter.]

This authenticated account goes on to say that his excellency (Mr. Bayard) was accompanied by his worship the mayor, who wore his "robes and chain of office," and that several of the best citizens were present. It also informs us that Mr. Bayard's lineage can be traced back to the same family as that of the "ideal chivalry," the Seigneur Pierre du Terrail de Bayard, the chevalier sans peur et sans reproche. [Laughter.]

Having thus laid a substantial foundation for the social standing of the American ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary among the grammar scholars of Lincolnshire, the account further says that:

Mr. Bayard's acknowledgment was marked by a depth of feeling, a sincerity of tone.

Now, whether it was "humorous and postprandial" or with "depth of feeling" and "sincerity of tone," the confusion, Mr. Speaker, is no doubt satisfactorily explained by the newspaper account of the ambassador attached to his letter to the Secretary of State, and which says that—

Some of those who took part in the evening proceedings betrayed a lack of appreciation of the importance of the guest, otherwise they would not have interrupted his remarks by the cracking of filberts.

[Great laughter.]

I am not quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that we should hold an ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary, etc., strictly responsible for his "postprandial" Latin jokes delivered to a grammar school of English pupils while cracking filberts. It is possible that some future generation of Lincolnshire pupils, in a more serious and thoughtful mood and in more solemn environments, may translate the Latin of the minister into genuine English humor.

Of course it is a terrible thing to perpetrate a joke that may lie dormant in an English community for a generation until the pupils who cracked filberts during its delivery in Latin have grown old and passed away, but, as Mr. Nye suggested, "even after that it is liable to break out on their posterity." [Laughter and applause.] And so time may eventually vindicate the Latin portions of Mr. Bayard's address, and reconcile his own and the English reports and appreciation of it.

Passing over, for the present century, Mr. Bayard's facetious acknowledgments, we come to the evening speech, which is mostly in English, and about which there is no confusion and which caused so much of cheering in England and so little in America. [Laughter and applause.]

Responding to the toast "The President of the United States," among other things he said:

He stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek to have their own way, and men who seek to have that way frequently obstructed; and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States. Fortunately in this case there is a real man to govern the people of the United States and hold their highest office. He may displease a great many, he may disappoint and obstruct a great many, and I hope he will continue to do so, etc.

Then he proceeds to assure his English audience that the life of the President is "an open one" and "straightforward," and that "his honesty has never been questioned," and that "little children cluster around his knee" [laughter]; and that for four years of his life it was his duty to see Mr. Cleveland "in the morning and at noon and at midnight, in the household and out of it," every day, and that he saw him in times of trial and of pleasure, and that he was always "true and steady and manly and just." How refreshing all this is to the people of America, Mr. Speaker, to know that their representative at the Court of St. James has assured our ancestors that although we are a "violent" people, nevertheless "in the present case" we have a President strong enough to govern us, and that after all he is not a bad man, and that he is honest and straightforward, and does not eat little children, but allows them to cluster around his knees. [Laughter and applause.] What occasion was there for assuring Great Britain as to the personal character of the President of the United States? Is it necessary for the people of America to rent a house in London and pay the salary of an ambassador in order to maintain and defend the personal character of our President [laughter and applause], and to testify, as he does, that for four years the President has been watched at morning, noon, and midnight, and found to be all right both in and out of his household? [Laughter.]

Even if it were true that as a nation we are often violent, is it the business of one of our own family to gossip it across the seas? All peoples and all governments, perhaps, have their faults; but does it become the function of the office of our representatives abroad to exploit our defects in foreign lands? Imagine, if you please, the English ambassador at Washington to-day prating to an American audience about the personal character of Her Majesty and about the faults of the people of her realm. Think of the ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the English Government descanting to an American grammar school upon the power of the Queen to govern a turbulent and violent people. Imagine the representative of the French Republic glorying in the delight that the President of France had displeased a great many of his people, and hoping that he might continue to do so.

Such a declaration, Mr. Speaker, by any of the representatives of foreign powers at Washington would challenge the credulity not only of their own countries, but of every citizen of America endowed with common patriotism and good taste. It goes without the saying, the world over, that the President of the United States is a strong man, likewise an honest man. Can you improve virtue by averment, or integrity by official proclamation? It was evidently not only Mr. Bayard's intent to contrast the President with the so-called violent people, but it was also his intent to distinguish him from other Presidents, for mark you, he says:

In this case there is a real man to govern the people of the United States.

Who could become President of the United States except a real man? [Laughter.] Of course the President of the United States is a strong man. But then, Mr. Speaker, are there not others? [Laughter.]

Look, for example, into the Senate of the United States. Have our memories lost the name of that Senatorial Hercules who, less than two years ago, compelled our real and powerful and honest President to acquiesce in a bill of legislation which he had designated as perfidy and dishonor? [Laughter.] Aye, Mr. Speaker, it would seem that strong men exist even beyond official circles; for has it not been averred by gentlemen upon this floor, who will oppose this resolution, that once upon a time, not very long ago, a certain business man of New York City wove about the will of the strong and honest President a web of speculation and extracted from his helpless, honest hand, below the market price, $62,000,000 of Government bonds, that fasten the chain of debt upon the so-called violent people for generations yet to come, and which will clank around our national form and humiliate us as we cross the threshold into the twentieth century? [Applause on the Republican side.] Why, sir, we are evidently a nation of strong men.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give way?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Just for a question. If what you say is true, and you believe it, why do you not have the courage to pass a resolution here to investigate it?

Mr. COUSINS. Why, my dear sir, this is the only opportunity I have had of appearing when this subject was under consideration. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Bayard would behold a real Ajax up to date, unterrified, let him go to the Department of Agriculture and I will show him what is strong. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I deny the right and the propriety of our foreign representatives to criticise their own Government abroad, or to cast reflections upon the Government whose confidence and mission they bear. I deny the declaration of Mr. Bayard that the people of America are ofttimes a violent people. I say that a hundred years of free government in the United States challenges the history of the world for a corresponding century of patience, morality, and progress. [Applause.] And as for the present time, no people since the creation of this world ever exhibited such enduring patience as have the people of America under the past three years of gross and blundering misrule. [Applause.] If there have been acts of violence, they have been exceptional, and do not merit the characterization which has been uttered by this recreant ambassador and applied to the people of America as a whole.

Somebody estimates that getting born costs the people of the United States $250,000,000 annually, getting married $300,000,000, and getting buried $75,000,000. But, Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely nothing. The cost of being governed by this Administration, the extra cost to business and to commerce and to labor over and above what it ought to be, would marry and bury every man, woman, and child in America every month, and then pay the cost for every one of them to be born again in the latest and most approved fashion. [Laughter.]

According to Bradstreet's figures, which nobody denies, showing the bank clearings, the business transactions in the United States of America during the first ten months under the operation of the Wilson-Gorman tariff law was $6,144,834,680 less than for the corresponding ten months prior to June 30, 1891. In other words, $600,000,000 per month less than for the corresponding ten months prior to June 30, 1891. Nevertheless, during all the trials of these three years the people have been patient and long-suffering.

But even if a patient people could forgive this ambassador for his extravagant and senseless criticism on this first occasion, what must they think of his ungrateful, unprovoked, and violent indictment against the people of his country, delivered on the 7th of November last, before the Edinburgh Philosophical Society, in which he departs from the legitimate and natural pursuance of his subject and deliberately insults not only the majority of the people of his own native land, but the high and dignified position which he occupies? As to the matter which he uttered on this last occasion, Mr. Speaker, there can be no question.

There was no heterogeneous mixing of Latin and of English, no cracking of filberts or of jokes. It was a speech deliberately and carefully prepared, a copy of which he attaches to his response to Mr. Olney and which we have before us as an official document, and in which we find this false, extravagant, and shameful language:

In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled "Protection," which I believe has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon State aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause.

Step by step, and largely owing to the confusion of civil strife, it has succeeded in obtaining control of the sovereign power of taxation, never hesitating at any alliance or the resort to any combination that promised to assist its purpose of perverting public taxation from its only true justification and function, of creating revenue for the support of the Government of the whole people, into an engine for the selfish and private profit of allied beneficiaries and combinations called "trusts." Under its dictation individual enterprise and independence have been oppressed and the energy of discovery and invention debilitated and discouraged.

It has unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes whose support is thereby attracted.

Mr. Speaker, in the first place, every line and syllable of that diatribe against the people of America is refuted by the history and experience of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] In the second place, it is a political harangue, violating the express regulations and instructions given by authority of our own Government to all consular officers of the United States. In addition to his own instincts of propriety, every consular officer is charged with these regulations and instructions. Some of them have been read in your hearing by the chairman of the committee. Let me read them again:

They will not give publicity through the press or otherwise to opinions injurious to the public institutions of the country or the persons concerned in their administration.

They—are not allowed to allude in public speeches to any matters in dispute between the United States and any other government; * * * it is a still better rule to avoid public speeches when it can be done without exciting feeling in the community in which the officer resides. They will be particularly careful to refrain from unfavorable comment or criticism upon the institutions or acts of the Government to which they are accredited.

And then follows the two regulations read, I think, by the chairman of our committee, as follows:

One of the essential qualifications of a diplomatic agent is to observe at all times a proper reserve in regard to the affairs of his Government; and the knowledge of these affairs, possessed by persons belonging to the legation, must be regarded as confidential.

It is deemed advisable to extend a similar prohibition against public addresses, except upon exceptional festal occasions in the country of official residence. Even upon such occasions the utmost caution must be observed in touching upon political matters.

As we learned from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT] the other day, it was once proposed to enlarge these instructions so as to forbid the discussion of all domestic questions or politics; and Mr. Blaine, who at that time was Secretary of State, said:

No; such instructions are unnecessary. We never have had and never will have an officer who will go abroad and talk about our affairs at home.

Strange as it may seem, the very first to violate these instructions is one who used to give them over his own signature. Thomas F. Bayard issued similar instructions when Secretary of State, closing with this injunction:

They are to be carefully observed in all respects.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Looking across the sea to his native land, whose mission and confidence he bore, the same Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States at Great Britain, on the 7th day of November last, saw the party of protection and of progress carried back to power on the tide of the popular will. Putting his ear to the ground, even in a foreign land, he could hear the victorious tread of the triumphant column of protection, once led by the immortal Lincoln, and he could not resist the temptation, even though he had to violate the delicate proprieties of the office which he held and the instructions which he bore, to satisfy the vengeance of his ancient prejudice. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] And so he toadied to the Cobden Club and the school of Manchester and to his prejudice, and told Great Britain that protection in America had "banished men of independent mind and character from its public councils." When he knew that the list of its illustrious advocates, beginning with the distinguished names of Washington, Madison, and Franklin, had never ceased to grow where progress marked the way until it had recorded in the register of independent mind and fame the names of Clay, of Jackson, of Webster, of Lincoln, of Grant, of Garfield, of Randall, and of Blaine. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] And he knew that almost on the very day he uttered that indictment, the list of independent minds that champion the doctrine of protection in America had grown to the greatest and most significant majority that ever spoke their independence at a popular election. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He knew when he uttered that libel on the memory of the greatest statesmen of America that if you should blot out the list of names identified with the doctrine of protection in our history you would leave it a literary desert as insignificant and barren of achievement as Disraeli's grandfather's Chapter of Events that never took place. [Laughter and applause.] Smarting with the certain knowledge that the free-trade policy of his party in America has again been demonstrated as an ignominious failure and overf whelmingly defeated by the independent votes of labor and o-capital, he splutters out the partisan assertion that under the dictation of protection "individual enterprise and independence have been oppressed" and the "energy of invention and discovery debilitated and discouraged."

Why, Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, by the stimulus and safeguard of protection the genius of America developed a continent. It has achieved the impossible. It went into the ground and found the iron, and brought it out to the light and usefulness. It formed it into wheels and turned it into shafts. It set the spindles turning and the axles whirling. It took the wool and cotton from the Middle, the Southern, and the Western States that had been feeding English looms and sent them spinning through our own. It touched the deft and cunning hand of toil and made invention dream of better things, and since that time God only knows the limit of inventive genius in America. [Applause.]

With a band of iron in either hand it started at the Orient and with its sublime and determined face toward the west it took up its continental march. It would not stop. Where it could not find a place to stand it spanned with iron. It laughed and toiled and hurried on, until at last it found the Occident. [Applause.] Then it became a moiling, tireless spider and wove the desert into a web of commerce. It stopped at every station and took the produce of the farm and left the product of our own American factory. It looked into the childhood face of citizenship and, studying its tendency of faculty or genius, opened a thousand doors of various and different enterprise and said: "Denizen of the free Republic, take your choice." In short, it set America to work and at the highest wages ever paid in any land. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

Several MEMBERS. All the time you want. Go ahead.

Mr. Speaker, when I contemplate this statement in the declaration of our ambassador to Great Britain I am reminded of what I have thought many times about the progress, the inventive genius and discovery of my own country during the period which he describes. I remember, only a year or two ago, when I came for the first time over the Alleghanies and down to Harpers Ferry. It revived in my recollection the great things that history had portrayed to me and I recalled the prophecy, the grandest prophecy, in my judgment, that ever has been made in the history of this country, made and fulfilled in the lifetime of the man who uttered it. It was the prophecy of Wendell Phillips, the proud and persecuted Puritan of Boston, the man who walked across the stage of life without looking either side to catch his image in the mirrors of the world. As I recall it now, this was his prediction:

As long as there is a slave within our borders there can be no union; yet I believe in the possibility of justice, in the certainty of union. Years hence, when the smoke of this conflict clears away, the world will see under our banner all tongues, all creeds, all races, one brotherhood, and on the banks of the Potomac the genius of liberty robed in light, four and thirty stars for her diadem, broken chains under her feet, and an olive branch in her right hand.

[Applause.]

I looked at that Potomac River that winds and turns and runs through all that beautiful and picturesque domain of Virginia and Maryland, even as it runs like a silver thread throughout our history. Then, I thought, a little farther over, away down in that beautiful and sunny South among the tropic's flowers and here and there upon the cotton fields, an aged generation of the ebon sons of Africa bend above the tombs of slaves, dusky children clasp their hands above the graves of sable mothers from whose bosoms they were torn in infancy, and weep in freedom as did the parent in her bondage.

Over there an old log cabin, down by the tangled swamp a toothless hound. The whipping posts are gone. Uncle Tom lives only in memory. It was the ruins of that romantic land of slavery. But on those ruins, even in the Southland, industry had reared her temples, and in them freedom turned the wheels of commerce, and over them there shone the banner of the Union, and not one star was gone. [Applause.]

It seemed to me that there was a fulfillment of the Phillips prophecy. And when I went back over the Alleghanies, down into the great White City of the West, that miracle of modern municipalities; I walked into the archway of the greatest exposition of all history. I went up and down the aisles in those great buildings that represented all the nations of the earth. Why, sir, there was the flag of France—France that was the first to make America her debtor, France who gave us Lafayette—splendid, splendid France! There was the emblem of the German Empire—Germany that sends us more hard-working citizens perhaps than any other power. And there was Russia's emblem—stern old Russia of the snows, whose cheering voice thundered from St. Petersburg when our nation's heart was in despair, and said to those imperial scoundrels who were about to interfere, "Hands off!"—Russia, who has always been our friend!

There was the flag of every nation. I looked at that great array of buildings, in which Cæsar might have gloried, and on which Phidias and Angelo might muse, seeming more like the growth of centuries than of a single year. I walked up and down the aisles of that manufactures building, and I saw the handiwork of mankind—of Jew and Gentile, of Oriental, of Pagan, and of Christian—lying side by side with that of our own American artisans, and I thought to myself, "This is enough to fill the prophecy—the Genius of Liberty robed in light." [Applause.] And then I went into that great building over the vast archway of which there were inscribed the names of Liszt, of Mozart, and Beethoven, and I heard the melodies of Paderewski mingled with those of our own great Thomas orchestra, and when the last low tones had died away, it was nighttime then; and I went out by those little inland lakes that washed their waters up against the marble terraces. I saw the great light that had emanated from the brain of Edison within a decade, and I thought to myself, "Surely here is the Genius of Liberty." I thought to myself, "What if only Washington could be excused from his seat of everlasting glory up there by the God of nations long enough to be here and receive our imperial guests for us. What if they could only excuse Abraham Lincoln from high heaven long enough to visit Illinois again, and say to the kings and queens and to the freemen of all the earth, 'Welcome to America and to Chicago, the metropolis of my adopted State!'" Ah, I thought if only the nameless, unknown veterans who bore the colors under Washington and those who fell before rebellion's awful fire could be there and see the glory of the cause and country that they died to save! That was my thought on that occasion. Now I think, bringing it up to the present, that if some man in the midnight hour had written over the archways of that great exposition the statement of Mr. Bayard, that the "energy of invention and discovery have been debilitated and discouraged," there is not a Democrat in the United States who would not have concluded the next morning that somebody had escaped from Jacksonville. [Laughter and applause.]

Sir, there is not a man, woman, or child who if any one of them had seen the sentiment of Bayard displayed anywhere on that great Exposition ground would not have made affidavit that it was uttered either by a lunatic or by an enemy of the United States. [Applause.] There was not an owl that perched upon the rafters in that great electric building that was erected to the memory of Edison that would have had so little patriotism in its measly soul as to have thought of hooting such an utterance. There was not a bat that alighted in the top of the great monastery over there by the agricultural building that would have dared to squeak such a sentiment as Bayard has uttered to Edinburgh. What a recommendation was that shameful utterance for the greatness of our country!

But last of all, Mr. Speaker, our ambassador confides to Edinburgh the startling news that protection in America dangerously depletes the Treasury! Shades of Ananias! [Laughter and applause.] Why, even Edinburgh knows that the champions of protection took the Treasury of the United States when there was nothing in it but a Democratic free-trade vacuum and filled it up with gold and silver coin. [Applause.] So that the greatest charge that existed against us four or five years ago was the fact that we had $400,000,000 saved. Suppose that to-day we had $400,000,000 collected instead of $200,000,000 borrowed, what a splendid Navy we could have—a Navy big enough at least to go duck hunting with. [Laughter.] If we had those four hundred millions we should then have the courage of our convictions and could "recognize" whom we pleased. [Applause.]

Even Edinburgh knows, and knew at the time that this speech was delivered by Mr. Bayard, that from the time the party of protection took the Treasury of the United States. for twenty-five successive years there was never a deficiency until the black raven of free trade perched again above our Treasury door, and hooted "Surplus, surplus never, never more." [Applause and laughter.]

No, Mr. Speaker, our ambassador to Great Britain has not only violated the regulations of his commission, not only been false to his position, but false to the facts of his own country. Who would have thought that within forty years after the eyes of the immortal Lincoln were closed in martyred death amid the homage and adoration of this great and grateful land—that within so brief a time the ambassador of his country to the mother land would so far forget the dignified and delicate requirements of his high position as to thus stigmatize and villify the honest followers and the exemplifiers of one of the first and dearest principles of the great emancipator. [Applause on the Republican side.] When we ask our history for such an example it gives us back no answer. We look in vain for such ignoble precedent. It was reserved, in the fullness of time, for this period of calamities.

Mr. Speaker, no citizen of the United States claiming the protection of the American flag and enjoying the distinguished honor of representing this great Republic in any foreign court can be excused for publicly condemning either the principles or the followers of Abraham Lincoln, and he who does it should either be recalled for his imbecility or censured for his impudent misconduct. [Applause on the Republican side.]

One word more and I am done. Nearly a half century ago, when the Hon. Richard Rush, a Democrat, was our representative in Paris, his party in America, through the chairman of its national committee, requested him to lay before the National Assembly and executive government of France resolutions of congratulation on the change of government which had been recently declared. He declined to do it, and in replying to his party in America used this noble language in a letter addressed from Paris to Benjamin F. Hallett, Boston, chairman of the committee of the national convention of the Democratic party of the United States.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, Paris, July 31, 1849.

DEAR SIR: (After acknowledging receipt of the resolution and referring to certain occasions on which he had presented communications from the Government of the United States he says:)

On all of the foregoing occasions I appeared for the whole United States—the United States in their aggregate character, great, powerful, and known. I acted in my representative capacity. I am here in no other. Can I waive it or step down from it? These are party resolutions. It is so avowed with frankness on their face. They point to the existence and necessity of parties in free States.

* * * * * * *

Is it for me to exhibit the political parties into which we divide? Being here on national grounds, I can only hope to act or speak with due effect when speaking or acting in full identity with the national will; not as fluctuating through the different parties among ourselves, but as heard in the voice of the nation which wields the strength of all parties. Then we are really powerful. What are we in the eye of Europe, without this unity of name and power?

* * * * * * *

Dear sir, your sincere and faithful servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

[The reading of the above was greeted with frequent applause on the Republican side.]

While censuring with regret our ambassador at London, let us commend him to an earnest contemplation of this great example to a wider tolerance of his fellow-citizens at home and to the patriotism that becomes an American. [Continued applause.]

I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, there is a question of fact which I desire to look into, and one of the elements I can not look into to-night. I ask, therefore, that I may reserve the time allotted to me until a later stage in the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks permission to reserve the ten minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINSMORE Mr. Speaker, I realize the embarrassment in which I find myself in attempting, at this late hour of the day, to address the House, after the most attractive speech of my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS]. I can not hope, sir, to entertain the House as he has done, nor to amuse the galleries with bright sallies of wit. My hope must be in the soundness of my position, the just sense of this body, and the strength of the cause which I advocate. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the affected amusement which this remark has provoked, there is strength in my cause, and the opposition only attempt to deride what they have utterly failed to assail and are wholly unable to meet with dignified and pertinent argument. I applaud the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] in his glowing apostrophe to our great country, its thrift, its energy, its resources, its achievements. He can not boast of more national pride or love of country than I possess. But I take issue with his statement that all our progress and material prosperity have come by the agency of protection.

I maintain, sir, that the American people have achieved their greatness despite protection; that they have, notwithstanding the discriminations of unjust protection fostered, promoted, and enlarged by the Republican party, notwithstanding the burdens of protection which the toilers have borne upon their backs, accomplished our national prosperity—a prosperity wrought by the unprotected, but enjoyed and realized by the favored few who constitute the protected class. While they have not reaped the rewards of their own labor, but have seen them transferred to the possession of the few, who toiled not for them, with magnificent forbearance, with patient and patriotic fortitude they have gone steadily forward and made this great country what it is.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to consider what it is that is presented to the House for its consideration. What is the purpose of the resolutions which have been offered here? Gentlemen have indulged in expressions of regret, more feigned, I fear, than real, that they are called upon to pass resolutions condemnatory of a public officer representing the Government of the United States at a foreign court. They deplore the fact that this matter is presented to Congress to consider and determine by its deliberation. How came it here? Who brought it here? For what purpose were these resolutions introduced? Let the Republicans who are responsible for them explain.

What is to be accomplished, Mr. Speaker? Have the gentlemen who have already addressed the House shown any salutary end to be subserved? Have they revealed any benefit to be conferred upon our public service in asking you to consider and pass these resolutions of condemnation? Have they pointed out to you any good to be accomplished by it? No, Mr. Speaker, the majority need not try to disguise it, the fact is plain to all, and I admonish them now the country will understand they emanate from partisan spirit and seek party advantage alone. The majority has seized upon a paltry pretext to assail a Democratic official, even at a risk of sacrifice of national dignity. To me it seems a most inexcusable, not to say reprehensible, proceeding. No complaint is made that any injury has resulted to anybody as a result of the speeches of Ambassador Bayard, save as certain supersensitive people are wounded in feeling. This is the gravamen of Mr. Bayard's offense. They say the American people have been insulted.

But let us come at once to the question here. That question is, Is it the duty of the House of Representatives to censure Thomas F. Bayard, the ambassador of the United States, for certain expressions contained in his accredited speeches? If it is our duty, why is it? I assert that it in no sense belongs to the duties of this House. If Thomas F. Bayard has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor, if he has been guilty of any such outrageous conduct as disgraces the service or dishonors his country, bring in your articles of impeachment that you used at the beginning of this episode under false pretense, merely to get immediate consideration and an opportunity to gratify your impetuous desire to speak upon it. We all knew what would result; that gentlemen only desired an opportunity to defend the system of protection which Mr. Bayard had assailed, that they would content themselves with denouncing him and dwelling upon the beauties of protection; that they cared not to devote themselves to a defense by their efforts of the dignity of the foreign service of the United States.

Mr. Bayard is a servant of our people, and since this matter has come here you owe it to yourselves to deal fairly with him as a representative of all the people of the country and to deal with this question upon its merits, and to settle it according to the duty which is presented to you. I reassert, it is no part of the duty of the House of Representatives to pass resolutions of condemnation against Mr. Bayard when it is only contended that he was guilty of an indiscretion, or at most an impropriety.

It in no sense belongs to the province of the House of Representatives or of Congress to hold foreign ministers responsible for the propriety of their conduct. There is not a precedent for it anywhere in the diplomatic history of our Government. When the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs this morning said, in answer to the views of the minority, that there is a precedent and cited the case of Mr. Stevens, formerly United States minister to Hawaii, and the resolutions of the Fifty-third Congress condemnatory of his conduct, I respectfully submit to him that it is not a precedent.

It has been said, and truly said, that the cases are not analogous. Mr. Stevens was not at the time of the passage of those resolutions a minister of the United States. His term of office had expired. He had been succeeded by another. His successor had been installed and accredited to the Government where he had resided as the representative of the United States, and he had returned to his home at the time, and the resolutions, introduced in that Congress and passed, dealt with an entirely different question—one more material, one more formidable, than the one presented in these resolutions. His offense was not a breach of propriety, but an unwarranted and outrageous abuse of his authority; a palpable violation of his instructions, making his country guilty, through him, of a breach of national good faith and its solemn treaty with a friendly power.

The resolutions reveal the nature of the charge against him. Let me read them. But first let me remark that the resolutions were offered after the attention of the country had been called to to the disturbances existing in Hawaii and Minister Stevens's participation therein had been brought officially to the attention of the House. Gentlemen had harangued the House and the country upon the subject. The world's attention had been directed to it and the part played in it by an officer of the Government of the United States, and it was the duty of Congress to explain to the world the position which we occupied in the matter, because, as a great nation, we have a foreign policy—a policy of noninterference in the affairs of other nations—and by the act of that minister, if we adopted it and acknowledged it to be ours, we departed from that policy and adopted one entirely different, one claiming the right for ourselves of determining who should govern in a foreign State, even to the extent of overturning the recognized and legally constituted Government. Here are the resolutions, the first of which it is sufficient to read:

Resolved, First. That it is the sense of the House that the action of the United States minister in employing naval forces and illegally aiding in the overthrowing the constitutional Government of the Hawaiian Islands in January, 1893, and in setting up in its place a Provisional Government not republican in form and in opposition to the will of a majority of the people, was contrary to the traditions of our Republic and the spirit of our Constitution, and should be and is condemned.

What was it that was charged against Mr. Stevens? Everybody knows that a ship of war of the United States was there at Honolulu. Everybody knows that at the request of the minister to Hawaii the troops from that ship were landed there at the time there was a popular insurrection. Whether the government sought to be established was a better one than that existing and the one then at issue is entirely irrelevant to the question now at issue. The question was, Had the Government which was overturned been recognized by the United States, and was it a Government with which we had at the time a treaty of peace and friendship?

Everybody knows what was done. The Fifty-third Congress disavowed the action of that minister and placed upon the record these resolutions of its disavowal. There was a purpose to be accomplished in that. In this there is no such purpose. Neither, Mr. Speaker, are the gentlemen who seek to pass these resolutions actuated by a purpose of elevating and purifying and reforming the foreign service of our country; but they seek an opportunity to hurl anathemas against Mr. Bayard simply because he is an official of the Democratic party, and because as such he has the courage to speak his convictions as an American freeman.

Mr. Speaker, that magnificent American citizen has never, under any circumstances nor in any presence, failed in the courage of conviction. A worthy son of a long line of illustrious sires, he has maintained the ancestral honor and chivalry, and has been ever the bold advocate of right and justice, the champion of freedom and liberty, the defender of the oppressed and the poor. When our civil war had ended and the soldiers of the South had laid down their arms, the Chevalier Bayard, with the spirit of the great soldier Grant and the great-hearted citizen Lincoln, was foremost in their defense against those who sought to oppress and humiliate them. He interposed himself and received all the darts of malice and hate full and fair on his own untarnished shield, and they fell broken and battered at his feet. There are gentlemen here who have not forgotten his glowing words of patriotism and courage, his proud defiance, when, in the United States Senate, in 1876, he inveighed against political intolerance and sectional animosity. He was criticised and taunted by Mr. Boutwell, a Senator from Massachusetts, and his motives questioned. Let me quote those words:

The Senator has suggested that in some way I have been a party to some act or deed unfaithful to the integrity of the Government of this country. I will simply say that every drop of blood in my body comes from men and from women who, since this Government was established, never harbored a thought or did an act unfaithful or unpatriotic.

No man can assert the contrary. The Senator dare not do so. He might attempt it by an innuendo, by classifying me with those whom he terms the enemies of the country; but he knows as well as I that the man who says I ever did an act or uttered a word unfaithful to the integrity of my country's Government has lied in his throat. [Applause in the galleries.]

He bids me beware of November. In November the people of this country will submit their candidates for the popular verdict, and then the Senator may repeat his speech where he pleases. Then he may assault men as he pleases. If it shall please a merciful heaven to give to this country a feeling of fraternity and union, then he and those who think and act with him will be consigned to private life and to an absence from political power. * * *

Is it to be held up to me as a source of reproach that I have tried to make my brethren of the South feel that this was their country, that this was their Government, and that they were bound to come and support it and find protection as they give it allegiance? If it be a crime, then I am the greatest sinner on earth.

If such feelings, such professions, and such principles shall consign me forever to a minority, then welcome the shades of private life with the unstained conscience that I shall carry there with it. I would rather have it than all your power, than all the power the people of this country can give, for I have something they did not give, and which they can not deprive me of, and that is my own self-respect. [Applause.]

These are the passionate utterances of patriotism, true patriotism and courage, and I commend them to the gentlemen of the House who seek now to belittle him, but whose assaults will be fruitful only of their own discomfiture, because I warn you, gentlemen, you can not tear him from the hearts of Americans.

It has been asserted that he violated the instructions issued to him by his chief. The gentlemen who have preceded me have made this assertion. They have read from the instructions. I shall ask the patience of the House while I refer to them again, to show you that Mr. Bayard in this did not violate any instruction which had been issued to him by the Department of State. What are they?

One of the essential qualifications of a diplomatic agent is to observe at all times a proper reserve in regard to the affairs of his Government.

Now, let us stop long enough to consider these instructions in reference to the duties which ministers are called upon to perform.

In regard to the affairs of his Government he is to maintain at all times a proper reserve. Where? At his post. With whom? In his relations with the officers and people of the country to which he was accredited. What affairs of his Government? Those affairs in which the two Governments are mutually concerned.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. That refers to state secrets.

Mr. DINSMORE. He is especially instructed as to confidential matters in regard to the affairs of his Government.

And the knowledge of these affairs possessed by persons belonging to the legation must be regarded as confidential.

There is nothing in all this to prevent the expression of his opinion as an American citizen. But what else?

The attention of diplomatic agents is especially called to the provision of law by which they are forbidden to correspond in regard to the public affairs of any foreign Government or in regard to any matter which may be a subject of official correspondence or discussion with the Government to which they are accredited with any newspaper or other other periodical, or with any person other than the proper officers of the United States.

They are forbidden—

To participate in any manner in the political concerns of the country of their residence.

What is his residence? That does not mean the country of his own home. It means the country of his temporary official residence. They are precluded from expressing—

Opinions upon local political or other questions arising within their jurisdiction.

Then Mr. Bayard is charged with a violation of that instruction. What "local question" did he speak of? What matters did he refer to in his Edinburgh speech within his local "jurisdiction"? What provision of this instruction has he violated? Not one.

The gentlemen know, they must know, that the construction that has been placed upon this is contrary not only to the letter, but to the spirit also.

It is deemed advisable to extend a similar prohibition against public addresses except upon exceptional festal occasions in the country of official residence. Even upon such occasions the utmost caution must be observed in touching upon political matters.

Why? Why is this injunction? To prevent any embarrassment in the relations of the ambassador with the court to which he is accredited, and with other diplomatic representatives. Caution must be observed in speaking of political matters, so that no offense may be given to any in his official circle which might impair his influence and usefulness.

It means that and nothing more, and no gentleman can with any consistency contend that it means otherwise. These are all the instructions upon the subject, and I think I have shown that there is not one of them that has been violated by Mr. Bayard in the speech which he made at Edinburgh, or in the one which he made in Boston, and the effort of these gentlemen to show otherwise falls futile and a failure. What, then, remains, if our ambassador has not violated an instruction? You still propose to censure him, and for what? For indiscreetness? For impropriety?

I tell you that is no part of your duty. It is an assumption upon your part to take up the affairs of another department of the Government and deliver lectures to its officers. The idea of the House of Representatives, of all bodies under the sun, contending that it should make itself "the glass of fashion and the mold of form" on matters of propriety! What scenes are enacted here! What a paragon of propriety is this same House! No question that comes into it gets out of it without partaking in some degree of a partisan character. Men here are actuated by the fierce passion of partisan zeal. It is so upon all occasions, and that, in itself, is evidence of the propriety of restricting the action of this body within our proper jurisdiction and refraining from inter eena f with the jurisdiction of other officers of the Governmennc iretn entirely different department of the public service.

But, Mr. Speaker, the pending resolution is in criticism, in censure, of two speeches made by Ambassador Bayard. The first one to which I shall allude, and which has been alluded to by gentlemen who have preceded me in this discussion, was made at Boston, England, before the pupils of a grammar school. The last gentleman who spoke, my friend from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS], was pleased to indulge his humor upon that speech and upon the character of the remarks made by the ambassador on that occasion.

Mr. Speaker, it is well enough for him to laugh who can offer no better argument. But take the speech itself, consider the conditions under which it was made, consider the youthful minds to which it was addressed; remember that Mr. Bayard was attempting to instruct those young people with reference to the conditions which existed in America, and you may take the part of that speech which is characterized as most offensive by the opposition and I maintain that there is no offense in it. Mr. Bayard said that it required a strong man to govern the American people; that the President stood in the midst of a strong, self-willed, and oftentimes a violent people. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asked my colleague on the committee [Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky] if he thought the President of the United States did "govern" the people of America, and if he was his governor. Gentlemen resent the statement that they are governed.

Mr. Speaker, in the sense in which the ambassador used the word "govern" I say that the President of the United States does govern the American people. Why is it that the chief executive of every State in the Union is called a "governor"? Is it not because in a sense he does govern? As the word was used by Mr. Bayard, and as it is used by every American, the President of the United States is a governor. He is a governor in the sense of standing as the Chief Executive of the country, holding the administrative power in his hand. He is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. He has the power to appoint the officers of the Government. He participates in making the laws of the Government, and it is his duty to see that they are executed, enforced, and obeyed. In this sense he is a governor and does govern, and only in this sense was the word ever used by Ambassador Bayard. But Mr. Bayard also said that our people are ofttimes a violent people, and we are told that that is an insult to the American people.

Mr. Speaker, it is only an insult to the man who wants to be insulted by it. The American people are a strong people. The very genius of our institutions makes us strong and willful. In this country every man is a sovereign; he has a right to use his influence, his vote, his personal power for his own advancement and the advancement of his people as he understands his and their necessity. He asserts himself. The American people are ofttimes a violent people; not violent as a whole. Mr. Bayard did not mean that this characteristic is everpresent, or that it could ever be asserted by any class to the overthrow of peace and general order. How often have we seen evidences of the violence of our people! The history of the country is full of them. When, a few years ago out in one of the western Territories, at Rock Springs, the people rose up and by the strong hand slew dozens of Chinese, was that a scene of violence? Was not that a matter which appealed to the executive power and to the good sense and judgment of the Chief Executive of the country, happening as it did in one of the Territories of the United States?

We have had many such instances. Remember the Mafia affair at New Orleans. Recall the recent riots at Chicago, where men, laboring men, ground down under the heel of combined capital and power, the uniform friends of the Republican party, united together for the purpose of trying to defend themselves against that great organized combination. They resented the changes that had been brought about by their employers and insisted that they had a right to a continuance of their previous wages and of the conditions that had previously prevailed; and when their demand was refused they struck and laid down their tools, as they had a right to do. Nevertheless, smarting under injury and wrong, they went beyond the bounds of right, as men frequently do in such cases. These men were urged to extremes, and they did go to extremes. They undertook to prevent the employment of other men and resorted to violence, to the destruction of property, to all manner of violence, and to threats of injury to life itself.

Was this violence? Were these American people? Do these facts authorize and justify the statement made by our ambassador when he spoke at Boston, England, saying that our people are often a violent people? Take the early days of our Republic, when Jefferson's time as President was largely consumed in suppressing riots and disorders that existed throughout every part of the land. Why, Mr. Speaker, naught but the violence of the American people ever gave to Thomas Jefferson and Old Hickory and Abraham Lincoln the opportunity to show the strength of their characters, that they were "strong" men, and their capacity to "govern" the American people. When the rumbling of nullification came up from South Carolina, and this country was threatened with violence, stern old Andrew Jackson laid his strong grasp upon the question and settled it to the pacification of the people of the country. I say it does require a strong man to govern our people, and it is no insult to them to say it, but rather a compliment to the energy, the independence, the manliness, and stern determination of American citizenship. [Applause.]

But there was another speech; and what was said in that speech? Ah, there is "the milk in the cocoanut." Mr. Bayard dared to use expressions there which aroused the sensitive feelings of people in this country who live and fatten upon discriminations against the poor and the lowly. That is what caused these resolutions to come here. Whence comes this pseudo righteous indignation on the part of gentlemen who represent the protective theory in the House of Representatives? Why is it that you rise up so quickly? It is not the man, Mr. Speaker, who feels strong in his cause that springs up so eagerly to defend it against criticism; it is not the man who feels that he is fortified in the right that can not brook any criticism of his views. Ah, can it be that these gentlemen who represent protection and stand by the bond that binds together the different factions of the Republican party in this country—the party of greed, the party of unjust discrimination, the party that is not willing to stand upon the equal rights of all the people, but holds itself together by fostering classes at the expense of a large majority of the people of the country—can it be because you have seen the sands shifting from under your feet, that the sentiment is growing in favor of justice and equality? By the verdict of the people of the United States in 1892 upon this very question you saw yourselves hurled from power.

You know it is true—it is confessed by the leaders of the Republican party to be true—that this was the issue. Upon this issue the people spoke, and in it you see the handwriting on the wall for the future. My friend from Illinois, the chairman of the committee [Mr. HITT], when he spoke this morning asked whether it was the result of the demoralizing influence of protection that these seats were made vacant and members were transferred to that side; whether a like cause produced the reverse result in 1892. I do not say that it was because members elected to this Congress came here as the result of bribery and corruption that that side was filled, but I do say that when Republicans refuse to assist the manufacturers extract their unjust tribute from the people those manufacturers will cease to support them if they can find others who will, and they can not be found in the Democratic party.

The Democratic party has no favored influences behind it. It appeals alone to the untrammeled patriotism of the people, to those who love liberty and exact equality. Mr. Bayard meant exactly what he said. He meant that the tendency of protection is to corrupt and debauch public sentiment; the tendency of it is to "throw legislation in the political markets and relegate it to jobbers and chafferers who take the place of statesmen." Mr. Bayard did not pretend to say that when a man is turned out of office it is in all cases the result of this influence, but he says that the tendency of this system is to bring about these results. And I verily believe it is so. And we are not alone in that view. I may cite the testimony of distinguished individuals not of our faith to bear out this theory. Within the last forty-eight hours we have seen evidence brought before the public bearing out the statement of Mr. Bayard on this question.

For the edification of the House and in illustration of this subject let me read what I find in the press of yesterday morning, the Washington Post, upon this very identical issue. Does anybody know who Mr. CHANDLER is? I mean a Senator of the United States from the State of New Hampshire of that name. This paper gives an interesting interview with that gentleman, from which I read. The reporter asks him:

> What is thought and said among the Republicans whom you have met about the recent developments showing that money contributions are being solicited from the manufacturers of the East to help Mr. McKinley?

Here is Mr. CHANDLER'S reply:

> It has been very seldom that I have heard more indignation expressed on any minor subject of politics than within the last few days as information has come as to the extent to which these levies upon protected interests are being made. Anger is uttered by the friends of all other candidates, and also by the most sagacious politicians, who have no preferences as yet.

Anger! Anger at what? What is the provocation that arouses the anger of these leaders of the Republican party? Why, that money is being levied upon the protected industries in the interest of the boom of a certain candidate for the Republican nomination for the Presidency. Does this illustrate, does it justify, the position taken by Mr. Bayard? "Levies upon protected industries," says Mr. CHANDLER, "are being made" in behalf of the boom of a Republican candidate. But that is not all. There is more of this delicious reading:

> To invade Senator QUAY'S State with demands, oral and written, that the Pennsylvania manufacturers are under such obligations to Mr. McKinley that they ought to furnish cash contributions with which to secure the election of McKinley delegates to St. Louis seems to be a most ill-advised proceeding.

Demands, oral and written, in the State of Pennsylvania, upon the manufacturers thereof are, he says, "out of place—not in keeping with propriety."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DINSMORE. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask the gentleman whether he indorses the truth of that statement?

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, that is a matter entirely beyond my ken. The gentleman from Ohio must not attempt to hold me responsible. I am only telling the House what one of the most respected and respectable leaders of the Republican party says. I can not undertake to testify on the subject. I am not taken into the councils of the Republican party. I can only pick up bits of information its leaders see proper to possess me of.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to say that that has been already characterized as an absolutely false statement, without any qualification whatever, and I defy any man to prove the truth of any one of the statements mentioned in that report.

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not pretend to know whether the statement be true or otherwise, but when this thing comes before the country, between the men who are clearly reaching out for the protected interests of the country and asking their support to place them in power, it must go to each individual for what it is worth. I have no doubt if the contest were confined to the nominees of the Democratic and Republican parties this painful, most disagreeable story would not have obtained currency. The embarrassment grows out of the fact that the candidates for the Republican nomination are now scrambling for the manufacturers' support. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARRETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DINSMORE. Certainly.

Mr. BARRETT. The gentleman has alluded to an alleged statement that money was being contributed for a political campaign by the protected interests of the country, a statement which has been contradicted and has been again denied to-day on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who knows whereof he speaks.

Now I desire to ask the gentleman whether he will express his opinion on a fact not disputed, and that is that the ministership of the United States to Italy was bargained and sold by a Democratic candidate for the Presidency for $50,000, in hard cash, a statement which has never yet been denied from any quarter?

Mr. SULZER. That is not a fact. I deny it. It is not true in any sense of the word. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINSMORE. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is trying to bring in matters that are entirely irrelevant to what I am talking about. That statement has been denied and is denied. The gentleman rises to interpose another case when he finds himself in an embarrassing and exposed situation.

If it were true, which it is not, it would only argue that some candidate was willing to promise a fat office for the support of a wealthy citizen with his money to buy torches and hire brass bands. But we are here proving by Republican evidence that the protection system is vicious and debauches political society.

You gentlemen who advocate protection, you who live by the fostering influences that are held out by the legislation of your party against the mass of the people, are quick to rise up on such occasions. You are quickly sensitive to these criticisms. But do not forget that I am not giving Democratic testimony, but the deliberate statement of a man standing high in the councils of the Republican party. He says that oral and written demands are made on the people of Pennsylvania—the manufacturers of Pennsylvania—to contribute to the McKinley campaign fund, and he does not think that fair or right. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Well, there is some more of this. [Renewed laughter.]

A MEMBER. Read it all.

Mr. DINSMORE. I will read a part of it.

Mr. CHANDLER goes on to say a little further:

This seems to be an ill-advised proceeding.

[Laughter.]

And then adds:

Yet the evidence seems to be clear that a systematic and widely extended levy upon the protected industries of the country has been projected and is going forward, to what extent remains to be discovered.

Mr. CHANDLER says that even he does not know how far it has gone.

Again, speaking of the McKinley boom, he says:

Ever since the movement for McKinley began it has been rumored that Mr. Mark Hanna, now one of the Ohio delegates at large, has been expending money in Mr. McKinley's interest. There has been an unwillingness to believe this and a disposition to attribute Mr. Hanna's exertions to sincere and disinterested friendship for Mr. McKinley.

He says there has been an unwillingness to believe this, but adds:

But nobody now is so charitable. It is beginning to be believed that the McKinley movement is to be a boodle canvass from start to finish.

[Great laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

This belief will be injurious to Mr. McKinley.

[Renewed laughter.]

Well, I should suppose it would be, perhaps, if he had any other support than the Republican party.

It will be still more injurious to the Republican party, especially if Mr. McKinley is nominated.

It will be remembered that the authorship of the expression, "Frying the fat out of the manufacturers," was accredited first to Senator Edmunds, another prominent Republican, a long while ago.

The issue will be made by our opponents whether we are to have a President who was nominated by "fat-frying," by the moneyof millionaire manufacturers, and is to be elected by similar corrupt methods applied to the suffrage in the States.

Now, my friend from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, submitted an interrogatory to me while I was speaking a few moments ago and called on me to respond. I wish to say that I do not assume to be informed of the details of the methods resorted to by the Republican party to keep itself in power. But I refer him again for an answer to the response made by the distinguished authority to which I have been alluding for some time, and whose remarks I commend to his careful consideration.

I was very cautious in speaking about McKinley—

Says Mr. CHANDLER. [Laughter.] He did not want to overstate the matter—but it certainly does seem to me that he is in the hands of unscrupulous managers.

[Laughter.]

They say that this year the Republicans can elect a yellow dog if we nominate one. At the same time, look at the situation. If McKinley is nominated we shall have to meet the charge that we fried the fat out of the manufacturers in the last campaign; that he fried the fat out of them again to secure his nomination, that he is continuing to fry the fat to buy his election, and that as a result, he will pay his political debts with a high-tariff bill framed solely in the interests of the manufacturers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when Republicans come before the country, and protectionist Republicans, too, and testify to this condition of affairs in the political organization of their party, what can be said against Mr. Bayard, a foreign ambassador of the United States, who made no charge against any party, but in discussing a great economic question, a purely academic question, dared to give expression to the views which prompted him as an American citizen in holding to his theories of government, views which have been justified by every precept and declaration of his party, its every tradition and experience throughout all the past? There is no secret about it. Everybody knows the position of the party upon this question. Yet protection is the basic stone of the Republican organization; protection not of the individual, not of each and all of the people of the country, but protection of certain manufacturing industries in the country in the hands of men of wealth and capital, for whose benefit they levy tribute upon the millions of producers who earn their bread in sweat and toil, and in which protection these same toilers have no share whatever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, from the very statement made by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire do we not see that "legislation is falling—has fallen—into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen"? That is what Mr. Bayard said.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. And into a mercenary scramble.

Mr. DINSMORE. And, as my distinguished friend by my side suggests, into a mercenary scramble among the people as to who shall get the spoils and pay the biggest price? Now, I want to call attention further to Mr. Bayard's remarks. What was the purpose of this address? What was the subject of it? It was an address delivered by Mr. Bayard upon "Individual freedom the germ of national progress and permanence."

Individual freedom, not only in America but throughout all civilization, the right of man to participate in his self-government, and as to the principles which were most conducive to the broadest recognition of human rights. The burden of this address is individual freedom. He says in one place:

The forces of productive industry were never so great and the burdens upon their products were never so heavy. Combination and consolidation to resist injustice and competition for success have gradually arrayed capital and labor in opposite camps, in which the power of each is separately and too often adversely organized, and serious conflicts have occurred, and conflicts more serious are impending, which threaten disaster to that tranquillity and good order of the State which are essential not only for its progress but for the maintenance of the civilization to which the world has attained. * * *

When I contemplate the autocratic power which is exercised in some countries to-day, and behold the organized and associated powers of wealth and numbers welded in such an overwhelming phalanx in others, I ask, Where is the safety and personal freedom of the individual? How is it to be guarded and secured? For the freedom of its individual members is the essential basis of the freedom of the state. The movement of the day, sometimes open, sometimes concealed in the robes of philanthropy and paternalism, but more often discernible in policies purely selfish, is toward state socialism as an opposing force to autocracy. But either is despotism and fatal to that individual freedom of man's mind and soul which is the instrumentality by which the world, under the very laws of its origin and progress, has been raised from brutality and barbarism to its present standard of civilization.

These problems of society rise on every side, and the peace and order of the world are seriously menaced.

I told you that Mr. Bayard was discussing this as an academic question. He is not confining it to his own country. He does refer later on to his own country, but he speaks of the general view he is taking of it as a question which interests civilization everywhere:

The centripetal forces seem to move almost irresistibly toward consolidation and centralization, and in the presence of such exaggerated militarism, with its stupendous powers; with the vast plutocratic combinations of incorporated wealth and capital so closely in alliance; with the widespread national and international popular organizations of labor, with their solidified, massed, numerical force, one asks, with just alarm, what is to become of the individual, the free man, the essential unit of a society that hopes to retain the principle of growth and progress; of adaptation to those advances and improvements which demand the open mind, the complete liberty of human faculties, first for their discovery, and after that for their reception and assimilation? Is there not cause to fear lest between the upper and the nether millstones of the twin despotisms, military absolutism and socialistic tyranny, the freedom of the individual may be ground to death?

I read this to show the topic and burden of his address all through, which is the recognition that should be given by all governments to the social unit, the individual man; and, Mr. Speaker, on this foundation all good government is erected:

We are witnessing in our day the decline and fall of empires once mighty in their material force, but now inert, decrepit, devoid of the seminal principle of growth or the sustenance of a moral order. And it is plainly apparent that these are the necessary and logical consequences of despotic government, the destruction of personal freedom, the enfeeblement of the moral fiber, the paralysis of individual intellectual and moral growth.

* * * * * * *

It has unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes whose support is thereby attracted.

The gentleman says it is meant for the Republican party. Why do you say that? The Republican party is not meant; but it is meant for that class of citizens and subjects of the different governments of this world who demand that government shall be administered for their benefit, discriminating against other people. They demand the levy of tribute for their sake on other individuals, and this is in utter nonconformity with any just principle of government.

But my friend who last addressed the House so entertainingly and so eloquently referred to a long line of statesmen whom he enumerated, whom he aligned upon the side of the protective system.

Webster, said he, and Clay and Lincoln. Hear what Mr. Webster said in answer to the position taken by the gentleman that all the great achievements of American manhood and thrift have been under the benign influence and made possible by the system of protection. Here is what Webster said in speaking of the great merchant marine of the United States, of our ships, and our commerce:

How, sir, do shipowners and navigators accomplish this? How is it they are able to meet and in some measure to overcome universal competition? Not, sir, by protection and bounties, but by unwearied exertion, by extreme economy, by unshaken perseverence, by that manly and resolute spirit which relies on itself to protect itself.

That is the language of Webster. He did not adopt the sentiment expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, nor did he adopt the sentiment expressed by any of these gentlemen. Webster paid a higher tribute to American character than my friend. Webster said he should rely and did rely on his own energy, his own power of achievement and accomplishment, upon his own intellect, his own brawn; and it is these that have made the American character great, Mr. Speaker.

The tendency to establish a system of protection, building up one interest at the expense of other interests, has a tendency to debauch political society. It is necessity that is the mother of invention, not protection, not discriminating laws. "Necessity is the mother of invention," and therefore my friend, when he speaks of the great march in discovery and inventions and science by the people of the United States, is wrong when he attributes it to protection, because protection enables men to obtain unearned profits. Protection is not protection if it does not enable him for whose benefit it is imposed to demand of him who deals with him more for his merchandise than he could otherwise demand for it.

Protection does not foster an industry unless it gives power to take from the pockets of those who consume the products of that industry more than could otherwise be obtained for them, and the only means by which more can be obtained is by precluding others from coming here and selling us articles of the same character at cheaper prices, every dollar of the excess price being taken from the pockets of the consumer, every cent of it taken from the toil and sweat of labor and given to the men who do not earn it, to the men who still stand up in solid column with those of his own persuasion and vote the Republican ticket and contribute of his unjust gains to nominate as his candidate one who personifies the principles by which they live. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I have no interest in who shall be the nominee of the Republican party, but some of these people—some of these leaders of the Republican party—resent this boom which has been manufactured for Mr. McKinley by the use of "fat" fried out of the manufacturers, because they say "there are others." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] There are other people in this country who favor protection. There are other people who have illuminated the subject and enlightened the country upon it. There are other people who are familiar with the details, and who are willing to have the manufacturers' votes. Why, that is true. There are men of eminent ability, men of learning, men of leadership. But they must settle the controversy among themselves. Shake not your gory locks at us; you can not say we did it. The testimony as to that does not come from us. That is testimony from good Republican authority to us, and by good authority I mean certainly a reputable witness. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, shall the House of Representatives by the passage of resolutions indulge in the censure of Ambassador Bayard? Why is he to be made the first example? This is a new departure in the history of Congress. Why did not a Republican Congress select a Republican victim? Why not go into the judiciary of the country and denounce the learned judges on the Supreme Bench of the United States for daring to speak out against this plutocratic power, operated in the interest of a select few? Doubtless all of you remhmber the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in 20 Wallace, in the case of the Loan Association against Topeka. This principle is spoken of by the learned judges, Republican judges. Here it is in the Supreme Court reports of the Government of the United States, coming from the highest judicial tribunal in the world. It is placed upon record there. Say the Supreme Court, by Justice Miller, a member of that great court:

The power to tax is, therefore, the strongest, the most pervading of all the powers of government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people. It was said of Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax is the power to destroy. A striking instance of the truth of the proposition is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 cents imposed by the United States on the circulation of any other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year or two after its passage. This power can readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.

Then he goes on with this language:

To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and to build up private fortunes——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, my friend is nearly through with his remarks and asks unaimous consent that he be allowed to continue his remarks this evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to continue his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARRETT. Does that mean that the time is to be actually divided between both sides?

Mr. DINSMORE. I am sure that nobody will have reason to complain as to the division of the time. I will draw my remarks to a speedy conclusion.

But, says Justice Miller:

To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.

Nor is it taxation. A "tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by government for the use of the nation or state." "Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes."

Ah, Mr. Speaker, here you have the Democratic view. Here you have the view that was sustained by the great statesmen whom the gentleman from Iowa ranged before the House to-day. A tax which is imposed for the purpose of raising revenue for defraying the necessary expenses of the Government is a legal, constitutional, just tax; but a tax which is taken by the hard hand of power to bestow a fostering protection upon any industrial institution is robbery.

Why were not resolutions introduced to censure Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court? You seem to cover all creation, gentlemen of the House of Representatives. Your powers are not restricted to the legislative department of the Government. They are in the Constitution, but not in your conceit. No pent-up Utica confines your powers. You just reach out and take in all creation, notwithstanding the provisions of the Constitution as to the restricted jurisdiction of the different departments of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to go further into Mr. Bayard's views, to read them and to place them before the country as they appear in this magnificent speech which I commend rather than condemn before the people of this country. What is it he has done? He has stood as an American citizen speaking, in the face of the world, in advocacy of one of the dearest of all the inestimable blessings which the American people enjoy, the right of the individual citizen, the freedom of the man, the sovereign unit of American society, in whose behalf Mr. Bayard uttered these bold statements, which I indorse from beginning to end with heart and soul [applause on the Democratic side]; a sentiment, Mr. Speaker, which not only lies at the foundation of our Government, but which is the chief stone of the corner, the beautiful keystone of the arch which, while it adds to the beauty and symmetry of the fabric, strengthens and holds up the whole towering superstructure.

Individual rights, equality before the law! This has ever been the slogan of Democratic battle—the recognition of the rights of every citizen, and the denial of the right of Government to lay its hand upon your property and deprive you and your wife and children of it, and bestow it upon others who did not toil to earn it. Then, Mr. Speaker, shall we be told that a representative Democrat, I care not where, I care not in what character nor in what presence, shall be denied the privilege of opening his mouth and speaking for the birthright of American freemen? Go tell the eagle that bathes his plumage in the pure air and golden sunlight of God that he shall not send forth his hoarse cry of defiance from his eyrie on the rock! [Applause.] Go tell the antlered monarch of the forest, that drinks from the brook in the valley and crops the flowers from the hillside, that sniffs the breeze, that when danger approaches he shall not sound a shrill note of alarm on the crisp morn to his following herd!

Mr. Speaker, as air and light are gifts of God to created living things, his greatest gift to man is the right of equal government, the right to enjoy the widest liberty, and the right to be protected form unjust taxes and unjust discriminations. This, Mr. Speaker, is democracy. This is Americanism. This is republicanism in its broadest sense; not in the narrow partisan sense. It is what every man, whether in office or in private life, should ever dare to speak for; and so long as I have the power of utterance I expect to stand by it. Mr. Bayard's speech was addressed to the manhood of the world; to those who are willing that the rights of the individual shall be conserved and protected; to those who are unwilling that the hand of taxation shall be laid upon the masses for the benefit of any special class. To these it comes as a glad message and is welcome. If it is unwelcome to those who hold different views, I care not. I say, with all dutiful respect to individual gentlemen, that I am indifferent how they regard it. Let the galled jade wince! [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is not present, I move that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 141) directing the Secretary of War to submit plans and estimates for the improvement of Fairport Harbor. The measure is similar to the one just passed. It is necessary to have a survey of the port of Fairport, and a joint resolution is required. I therefore ask that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from its further consideration and that it be put upon its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Committee on Commerce will be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution. The Senator from Ohio asks for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. FRYE. I simply wish to say that the joint resolution from which the Senator from Ohio had the Committee on Commerce discharged, and which is now upon its passage, I was instructed by the committee to report favorably this morning.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROVIDENCE RIVER AND NARRAGANSETT BAY.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. It is a joint and not a concurrent resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a joint resolution. It requires the assent of the other House and the approval of the President. That is the way I intended to have it.

Mr. HOAR. The committee came to that conclusion?

Mr. FRYE. We came to the conclusion that a joint resolution is necessary.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. ALDRICH. From the Committee on Rules I report the resolutions which I send to the desk, and I ask for their present consideration.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXV be amended so as to include within the list of standing committees a Committee to Establish the University of the United States, to consist of nine Senators, and a Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, to consist of seven Senators, and a Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, to consist of five members; and that from and after June 30, 1895, the designation of the Committee on Epidemic Diseases shall be Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Resolved, That the membership of the Committee to Establish the University of the United States, the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, and the Committee on Corporations in the District of Columbia continue during the present Congress the same as the select committees on those subjects are now constituted, and that the said select committees be, and are hereby, abolished.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolutions.

Mr. ALDRICH. These are changes made in the form of the committees named, and they are changes that were generally agreed to at the time the organization of the Senate was completed. I think there will be no objection on the part of anyone to the adoption of the resolutions. The purpose is simply to make the select committees standing committees, and the membership of the select committees is to remain as the membership of the standing committees constituted for the present Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether either resolution proposes to abolish any of the committees; and if so, which committees?

Mr. ALDRICH. It simply changes the names of three committees and makes those three committees standing committees of the Senate instead of select committees.

Mr. HARRIS. It continues the committees under another name and makes them standing instead of select?

Mr. ALDRICH. Precisely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], coming over from a preceding day, proposing to instruct the Committee on Foreign Relations to submit to the Senate a report relative to the war in Cuba.

Mr. ELKINS. Let that go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], coming over from a previous day, proposing an investigation by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment upon the administration of the civil-service law in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of Senate bill 2132.

Mr. CHANDLER. What becomes of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]?

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Massachusetts is absent. I suggest that it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the resolution would go over.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not hear the announcement of the Chair. It goes over, retaining its place, without objection?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call up the conference report, the privileged question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the resolutions relative to the war in Cuba.

Mr. SHERMAN. No motion is required. Being a privileged question, it comes up of itself, although any Senator can raise the question.

Mr. HARRIS. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow me to ask the Senate to consider the little bill that I have indicated. It will not consume three minutes of time, and I am compelled to leave the city to-morrow to be absent two or three weeks. It will be a personal accommodation to me if he can allow the bill to be considered this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. The trouble is that there are a number of Senators in precisely the same position, and I think this privileged matter ought to be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from Ohio as a privileged motion. The Chair is of opinion that it requires a motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the circumstances, I will yield, if no one else objects, although other Senators have insisted that we shall go on with the Cuban resolutions this morning.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I trust the Senator from Ohio will include me also in that permission.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is the difficulty.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I addressed the Chair before the Senator from Tennessee for the purpose of calling up a little bill. My bill is a very short one, and I have been absent from the Senate for four weeks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Louisiana for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the Senator from Louisiana calling up his bill, but I am trying to make terms with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Senator from Ohio has agreed to yield, I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Ohio does not object, I shall certainly not object to the consideration of the bill in which the Senator from Louisiana is interested.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read for information.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel bound to object. I have already given notice that I would ask the Senate to proceed with the Cuban resolutions at this time; and I must insist upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to say that but for the fact that I am compelled to leave the city to-morrow, after the statement of the Senator from Ohio, I should withhold my request to take up the bill, but it being important to pass this bill at an early day, if at all, I must beg the Senate to consider it at this moment.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which he will indicate.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE AT KNOXVILLE.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. 6304) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at Knoxville, Tenn.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call up the privileged question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the resolutions relative to the war in Cuba.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Nevada will allow me, I wish to state that I have heard from the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who is entitled to the floor, and he states that he is sick in bed. He is therefore not able to be present.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not propose to prolong this discussion. I am anxious for action. The facts are too notorious to need further statement. Spain has sent during the present war more than 125,000 soldiers against a population of 1,500,000. That population has resisted Spain in this last war for more than a year. It is known of all men that for nearly a century this contest has been going on, and the people of Cuba have been struggling for liberty. If such people, situated as they are, are not entitled to the sympathy and support of the people of the United States, our boast of being lovers of liberty is vain. It is a reproach to the American people that we have stood by so long and witnessed the vain attempts of Spain to govern Cuba.

The whole situation discloses the motive for this extraordinary effort on the part of Spain to subject Cuba to slavery. The population of Cuba is about fifteen hundred thousand, two-thirds of Spanish descent, one-third colored. The area is about 43,000 square miles. In area and population Cuba is about equal to Virginia or Tennessee. Virginia, for example, has an area of 42,450 square miles and a population of between sixteen and seventeen hundred thousand. Virginia has been struggling under a debt of less than $30,000,000. See how Cuba is situated, and judge ye whether she is not the victim of a conspiracy to enslave her.

Spain is indebted about twelve hundred million dollars. Three hundred million dollars of her bonded debt is secured by the customs revenues of Cuba, and a much larger proportion of the interest on that debt; then the interest on $300,000,000 must come from Cuba. Is it right for us to stand by and see Cuba enslaved for the purpose of paying this debt?

We have one example before us which ought to make humanity blush. A profligate Khedive of Egypt involved that country in a debt of $500,000,000, receiving for that amount of bonds about 60 cents on the dollar. The money was wasted in extravagance and foolishness. To collect that debt Great Britain took military possession of Egypt and compelled with the lash the payment of the interest and much more. There are 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 acres of land in Egypt which are annually cultivated. It requires the proceeds of that quantity of land to pay $25,000,000 of interest on $500,000,000 of 5 per cent bonds, and from $27,000,000 to $28,000,000 annually to support the expenses of a government to enslave them. From $52,000,000 to $53,000,000 is raised upon less than 8,000,000 acres of land, and it is done with the lash.

That same policy is being extended to this hemisphere. Cuba is already pledged for $300,000,000, and the expense of the present war will be added, so that her obligations will be more than the obligations of Egypt. She will have more than $25,000,000 per annum to pay for interest on the public debt, besides the armies that will be necessary for her to support, which will be used to subject her to slavery. If it were not for the obligations resting upon Cuba, if it were not for the purpose of enslaving her to make her pay for her own subjection, Spain would have abandoned her long ago. She would be compelled to abandon her to-day if the bondholders were not aiding Spain for the purpose of maintaining their security on Cuba.

If Spain holds Cuba she must hold Cuba as she has for the last one hundred years; she must hold her with an army; she must increase the debt; she must enslave her people. There is no possibility of any arrangement between Cuba and Spain which does not mean slavery of the most degrading kind for Cuba.

What would be thought if there were a mortgage of over $300,000,000 resting on Virginia or Tennessee? They are as able to pay as Cuba. What would be thought if a proposition was made to collect that amount from them with the lash? The foundation of this attempt to hold Cuba rests on the idea of greed. Is it honest, is it just, to enslave Cuba because Spain has incurred this vast debt in attempting to enslave Cuba? The debt under which Cuba groans grows out of the inability of Spain to govern her, grows out of the vast armies which have been sent there, grows out of the military persecution of Cuba; and as the military persecution goes forward the debt is increased.

We know that this is a chronic war; we know that Cuba is our neighbor, and that the people of the United States sympathize with Cuba. If the Government and the people of the United States have any duty, it is to humanity and to liberty. Here is the time, and Cuba is the object to which that sympathy should be extended, and it is extended by the American people. We can judge of this as we please. The heart of every patriot in the land goes out to Cuba, to that suffering people. Every freeman in America protests against the enslavement of that people to support Spanish armies, to collect taxes and deprive the people of the common rights of humanity. Why, then, do we need any refinement of debate? Reports from committees amount to nothing. It has been even suggested in this Chamber that we ought not to act without the report of a committee. The facts are known to all men. Cuba is at our doors. She has been groaning under Spanish oppression for a century. Her people have caught the spirit of liberty born on this continent. They are as brave, as self-sacrificing, and as heroic as any people that have ever lived on earth. They ask our sympathy in their struggle for liberty. Shall we answer the demand of the American people and extend that sympathy in the most effective way, by resolution or otherwise—anything to make it effective—and answer the aspirations of the American people, or shall we spend our time quibbling about the fact as to whether there is war in Cuba? War in Cuba! How many soldiers will it take to make war against a million and a half of men, women, and children? Is not the fact that 125,000 soldiers have been struggling for the past year ineffectually to restore peace evidence enough of war? Has not this struggle been going on during all our lives?

I hope we shall have action, and speedy action, on this conference report; and if it does not bring results let us pass a joint resolution and throw the responsibility on the Executive for thwarting the desires, the anticipations, and the hopes of the American people.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, in the first place, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to have the question stated in the form in which it will appear upon the Journal. Is it an affirmative or a negative question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, as I do not agree to the conference report, I feel it imcumbent upon me to state very briefly the reasons which compel me to withhold my assent to that report. This matter of an expression of opinion by the Senate and House of Representatives concurrently in regard to the state of affairs in Cuba and the war now being waged there by the insurgents against the Spanish Government has been thoroughly discussed in the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the first place, and afterwards upon the floor of the Senate upon the report made from that committee. The resolutions adopted are expressive of the sense of the Senate, and in them they asked that the House of Representatives might concur. Those resolutions confine themselves to an expression of opinion of the two Houses of Congress that "a condition of public war exists" in the Island of Cuba "between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba;" and they further express the opinion—

> That the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerency in the ports and territory of the United States.

That resolution received not only the cordial assent of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but it received the overwhelming assent of the Senate, after due debate and consideration.

The last resolution went further:

> Resolved further, That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Mr. President, that resolution, couched in carefully considered and courteous language, also received the almost unanimous assent of the Senate of the United States. These two resolutions were sent to the other House, and in due course came back stricken out, and a substitute adopted by the House of Representatives was presented to the Senate as the action of that House.

While it is easy enough to say that the two sets of resolutions, those adopted by the Senate and those afterwards adopted by the House of Representatives, are substantially the same, that both express the sympathy of this country for the patriots of Cuba who are struggling for independence, and both give voice to that feeling which exists in this country undeniably in favor of any people who unfurl the banner of freedom and make a patriotic and gallant attempt to uphold it, still in a matter of this kind, where words are things, where the phraseology, though apparently differing little, may mean much, it is consistent with the dignity and sense of duty, I submit, of this body to insist upon the form in which they have chosen to give expression to their views in regard to this unhappy condition of things in this near-by island.

It would be vain to attempt to disguise the feeling of sympathy which occupies the breast of every true American in regard to this struggle. There is no use in attempting to stifle the expression of that feeling. It has been lying dormant sometimes, it is true, in the hearts of the American people, for more than a generation, and yet the Government of the United States, as in duty bound, has been observing strictly its duties toward the friendly Government of Spain; it has strictly enforced the neutrality laws which the law-making power has placed upon the statute book; it has suppressed all aid in the shape of military expeditions; it has discouraged those who would by force of arms and with their lives in their hands stand by the side of those men struggling for the freedom of their country; and it has gone to the very verge of international obligations in protecting Spain from the effect of this widespread sympathy in our country. But, Mr. President, in this, as in all other free countries, government can not deal with opinion, government can not deal with the expression of opinion; and that opinion to which I have alluded in regard to the struggle in Cuba has found proper, respectful, and courteous expression in these resolutions of the Senate.

However much Spain may be irritated, however much she may regret or complain that this feeling of sympathy exists here, and that these resolutions should find hearty support here, she has no right, from any international point of view, to find fault or call to account the Government of the United States for this expression of the opinion of its people.

Mr. President, all these resolutions of the Senate attempt to do, confining themselves within what I believe, and a majority of this Senate I think believe, is within the sphere of its power, is to express its opinion, and in expressing this opinion of the Senate and asking the concurrence of the House of Representatives, giving expression also to what we believe to be the opinion of the great mass of the people of this country. Having done so much—it seems to me that we could do no less—having expressed that opinion, we have left to the executive branch of this Government what undeniably belongs to it solely, that is, to possess itself of the requisite information and to act in accord so far as it may with this opinion of the two Houses and the opinion of the American people so far as it may think the opinion of the Houses voices the opinion of the American people. But upon that branch of the Government rests the responsibility; and I do not complain that it should proceed with caution, with circumspection, and with a desire, holding in its hands perhaps the issues of peace and war, to do only that which, from every point of view, internationally, morally, and patriotically it is its duty to do.

But there is no reason, Mr. President, why we should here in the Senate abandon the form of resolution and of expression of opinion which we have so deliberately adopted. There is no reason why, having first acted in this matter, we should accept the substitute resolution offered by the House of Representatives, our own resolutions, prior in point of time, being contemptuously swept aside, and adopt other language and resolutions expressing a different attitude on the part of the Government of the United States and of the Congress of the United States from that adopted by the resolutions of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Would not the passage of either of these resolutions be a sufficient warrant, guaranty, or indorsement of the general proposition contained therein to enable the President to proceed to recognize the belligerent rights of Cuba or to recognize the independence of Cuba, and to proceed in that line without any further action if the President shall feel disposed to do so?

Mr. GRAY. I think he would be justified in taking that course after satisfying himself as to the facts.

Mr. STEWART. Would the resolutions not be a sufficient indorsement of the principle to warrant him in doing so?

Mr. GRAY. I do not think, as I have already said, in a matter of this kind, where the subject is a delicate one, as all matters of international concern are, that we should use language which has not been carefully considered. The language of the Senate resolution has received the overwhelming assent of this body. There are grave objections, as I conceive, to the language used by the House resolutions; and although it may be well enough to say in a broad sense that the one set of resolutions and the other mean the same thing, I do not think so. At all events, I do not think that the House resolutions put the attitude of the Congress of the United States where it ought to be as correctly as do the Senate resolutions.

I will only occupy a moment in stating, what I think I ought to state, that in voting against this conference report I abate not one jot or tittle of what I have already said on the floor of the Senate in regard to this struggle in Cuba, my own individual sympathy, and hope that it may be successful, and that Spain may be led to recognize the right of the people in that unhappy island to a government of their own. But, sir, I want, while I am on my feet, to call attention to one or two matters which seem to me to justify the language used by the first Senate resolution.

We declare in that resolution that in the opinion of the two Houses of Congress a state of public war exists in the Island of Cuba. In the dispatch about which so much has been said, which appeared in a New York paper, authorized, at all events, as is conceded on all hands, by the prime minister of Spain, it appears that he called this war a civil war. God knows the news and the facts which come to us fully justify him in using that well-understood phrase as describing the condition of things in that island. With 120,000 men composing the army of Spain to put down what has been characterized on this floor as a mere emeute, a mere struggle with a few guerrilla bands, a war that has already existed for one year, and the end of that year finding those guerrilla bands, that are so sneeringly spoken of, in occupation of at least two-thirds of the island, holding more and not less of the territory which is in dispute—surely, looking at the facts as they appear upon the surface, facts which can not be denied, we are justified, after this lapse of a year, in speaking of this as a public war between those who are struggling for the independence of Cuba and the Spanish Government.

I do not need to dwell upon the incidents of past history. For more than a generation, as I have already said, Spain has failed to give a government to that island that has made its population reasonably content; there has been a constant state of war for nearly fifty years, with intervals of enforced peace. There was a war, which we have all talked about here, lasting for ten years, from 1869 to 1879, a war that was only ended by concessions on the part of Spain. The arms of the insurgents were never laid down even at the end of that long period of battle, of suffering, and of trial until concessions had been made that promised to give them, in part, the fruition of good government, for which they had been struggling.

Mr. PLATT. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Not at all.

Mr. PLATT. We have very few facts afforded us by the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to this matter, and I wish to inquire whether the charge, which has been so often made, that Spain failed to carry out its promises made at that time, or what the Senator calls the "concessions," is true, whether Spain has lived up to the concessions and promises upon which peace was established, or whether she has broken those promises; and if so, in what respect?

Mr. GRAY. I can not answer the Senator from Connecticut except by saying that the very causa causans of the present rebellion, of the present war, is asserted to be the failure of Spain to keep those promises, to grant those concessions in the direction of self-government upon which peace was obtained and the arms of the insurgents grounded.

Mr. PLATT. That is just what I am trying to get at, whether that is so or not. I had a document at my desk yesterday giving the terms upon which the insurgents capitulated in 1878 or 1879; and while I have heard it stated here over and over again that Spain did not keep her promises in that respect, I have been very anxious that we should be informed by the Committee on Foreign Relations in what respect she broke those promises.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator if he, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, has in any way the underlying facts of the proposition which he is now stating, that this last revolt arises in a measure from the fact which he assumes, that Spain did not carry out the provisions of the pacification of Zanjon? First, I ask the Senator if he has read the terms of the promise? I would not ask this question, except that we all feel that it is remarkable in so important a matter as this that the Committee on Foreign Relations has not furnished us with any pertinent facts as to the situation.

Does the Senator know that Gen. Martinez Campos, who is almost universally lauded now in contradistinction to General Weyler, has stated in clear terms, giving the pacification of Zanjon, the items of the documents in detail; that Spain has carried out those provisions, has given home rule to Cuba, has established a council, which is made up half by election and half by appointment of all Cubans; that representation in the Cortes has been accorded, that there are members now from Cuba and Puerto Rico in the Spanish Cortes under that pacification, and that just as Spain was enlarging those concessions for the establishment of more autonomy and home rule this revolt most untimely broke out? Does the Senator know that that is so?

Mr. GRAY. No; I do not know that that is so.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GRAY. I will content myself with that answer. I just answer now that I have no personal information on that subject.

Mr. HALE. I will only state that I have the documents, and that they will not be put in as anonymous documents, but will be put in as authentic documents, verifying the facts I have stated.

Mr. GRAY. Let me say that I was speaking of what I believed, whether on sufficient evidence or not is perhaps not pertinent just now. The legal question that is raised by these resolutions is not whether there was a justifiable action on the part of the insurgents, but whether public war existed or no, and whether the Cubans were wrong or right and were entitled to our sympathy or our denunciation is not the question presented when the matter of belligerency is under debate.

Mr. HALE. The Senator had gone further and stated his belief——

Mr. GRAY. I did go further.

Mr. HALE. That one of the largely contributing causes to this revolt was that Spain had not carried out the terms of pacification, and it was to that I addressed myself.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. In that connection let me answer both questions at once.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] referred the other day—I have looked carefully at the report of his speech since, so that I make no mistake—to some promises which Spain had made at the conclusion of the old rebellion in 1878, I think that was the year of pacification, but, at any rate, whatever the time was, and said that Spain promised to do so and so, and among those promises was one to grant representation in the Cortes, and other things which he did not name, and he put in "and so forth," or some phrase of that kind, and to abolish slavery. He said Spain had failed to keep every one of those promises except as to the abolition of slavery.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow me to say——

Mr. HOAR. In a moment. The Senator said Spain refused to keep the promise to grant representation in the Cortes. As I understand, the Senator from Ohio was totally mistaken in that belief. Spain has kept the pledge, which the Senator said she had not, to grant representation in the Cortes. Now, I want to know if the Committee on Foreign Relations stand by or do not stand by that statement of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and can answer perhaps better than I can.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator so understand it for one? Does the Senator understand that Spain has broken her promise to grant representation in the Cortes?

Mr. GRAY. I do not understand that the Committee on Foreign Relations have passed definitely upon that question. What they were called on to pass upon was whether, in their opinion, such a state of public war existed in Cuba as would entitle it to a recognition of belligerency.

Mr. HOAR. Then those of us who happen to think that that is an important fact, as the Senator from Ohio has stated, or he would not have used it in his argument, are left without light from the Committee on Foreign Relations whether that was so or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I hope I will be allowed to state that I read from a letter written one year after the arrangements had been made by Campos, in which he states specifically that Spain violated all its engagements except the one as to the abolition of slavery.

Mr. GRAY. That is a very important statement by the chairman of the committee. I merely replied that I did not think that the committee in its action was considering the truth or falsity of the claim made by the representatives of the insurgents, but that their proper duty was to consider whether it was such a state of public war as would justify its recognition by the Government of the United States.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me to put in at this stage of the debate the bases of the pacification? It is a little long, but I should like to read it, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. GRAY. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. PLATT. It is as follows:

ARTICLE 1. Concession to the Island of Cuba the same political privileges, organic and administrative, enjoyed by the Island of Puerto Rico.

That is all that relates to home government.

2. Oblivion of the past, as regards political offenses committed since the year 1868 up to the present, and the liberty of those under trial or who are fulfilling sentences within or outside of the island. A general pardon to the deserters from the Spanish army, without distinction of nativity, this clause to be extended to all those who have taken any part, directly or indirectly, in the revolutionary movement.

3. Freedom to the slaves and Asiatic colonists now in the insurrectionary ranks.

4. No person, who in virtue of this capitulation recognizes and remains within the authority of the Spanish Government, shall be compelled to render any service of war, so long as peace is not established in all the territory.

5. Every person who desires to leave the island shall be at liberty to do so, and he shall be furnished by the Spanish Government with the means therefor, without entering a town if he should so desire it.

6. The capitulation of each force shall take place outside the towns, where the arms, implements of war, shall be laid down.

7. The general-in-chief of the Spanish army, in order to facilitate the means for uniting the other departments (in this convention), shall make free all the means of communication by sea and land that he can dispose of.

8. The agreement made with the central junta shall be considered as general and without special restrictions for all the departments of the island which accept these propositions.

JOVELLAR.

HABANA, 19th February, 1878.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PLATT. One moment. There are three other articles——

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to read in connection with that General Campos's statement.

Mr. PLATT. In one moment. There are three other articles in a decree issued by His Majesty the King:

ARTICLE 1. Commencing with the next coming legislature, the Island of Cuba shall have its representation in the Cortes of the Kingdom upon the same terms with Puerto Rico and in accordance with its population.

ART. 2. The provincial and municipal laws of the peninsula of 2d October, 1877, published in the Gaceta de Madrid of the 4th of the same month and year, shall also be adopted in its government and administration in the manner now in force in Puerto Rico.

ART. 3. The Government of His Majesty will be solicited to apply to this island in succession, with the modifications it may deem expedient and in virtue of the provisions of article 89 of the constitution of the Monarchy, other laws already promulgated or which may be promulgated for the peninsula.

Now, if Spain failed to keep those promises, I want to know in what respect. I do not care what somebody says about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to read from General Campos himself? One year after he made the agreement that was read by the honorable Senator, in a letter published in Madrid July 27, 1879, after the peace of Zanjon, he says:

Promises never fulfilled, abuses of all kinds, no provision made for agriculture and public works, the exclusion of the natives from all branches of administration, and other faults in plenty, gave rise to the insurrection of Yara.

At the close of the war of 1878, the insurgents had held power and possession of nine-tenths of Cuba for ten years. Finally they were persuaded to enter into negotiations for terms, and General Campos held out to them the offer that they could have autonomy, that they could have representatives in the Cortes, that they could have a body of some 30 persons to make laws for them, that they should have protection and education, and that slavery in that country should be abolished. Those terms were agreed upon. The Cubans thereupon laid down their arms, and what was the result? The Cortes refused to carry the promise into execution, and General Campos within a year after that wrote a letter in regard to the course of the Spaniards in that matter in which he said what I have read.

It is the statement made by General Campos, who made the agreement himself, that Spain violated it in every respect.

Mr. GRAY. That is a very formidable statement to the cause of Spain, it seems to me, in this regard, a statement from her own captain-general, from a man of undoubted intelligence, patriotism, and ability, and it seems to me that it goes as far as we need go in pursuit of the truth when we consider that we are only concerned as a question of law with recognizing whether a state of actual war exists, and not as to how the war occurred.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], on March 12, said:

I have here an interesting fact which I think I ought to present to the Senate. At the close of the war of 1878 the insurgents had held power and possession of nine-tenths of Cuba for ten long years, fighting constantly. Finally they were persuaded to enter into negotiations for terms, and General Campos, who was then in command, a liberal and broad-minded soldier, held out to them the offer that they could have autonomy.

Now he goes on and gives instances of how it was to be given—

That they could have representatives in the Cortes.

Does anybody deny that they have such representation?

Mr. SHERMAN. They have one representative.

Mr. HALE. I have a list of the members of the last Cortes, elected both from the Island of Cuba and Puerto Rico, and there are 45 members of the House of Deputies and 14 or 15 senators.

Mr. GRAY. How many of those representatives are appointed either actually or practically by the captain-general or the governor of Cuba?

Mr. HALE. Not one. I will go on a little further:

That they could have a body of some 30 persons to make laws for them; that they should have protection and education, and that slavery in that country should be abolished. Those were the terms which were agreed upon. The Cubans thereupon laid down their arms, and what was the result? The Cortes refused to carry the promise into execution, and General Campos within a year after that wrote a letter in regard to the course of the Spaniards in that matter.

Now, Mr. President, it is undoubtedly the fact, and it can and will be established, that every essential in that pacification of Zanjon has been granted by Spain.

Mr. GRAY. From what did the Senator read?

Mr. HALE. I was reading just now from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. Later, on the same day, the Senator said:

If Spain should renew the treaty of Campos of 1878 and faithfully observe it, the people of Cuba would eagerly accept such terms.

It has never been allowed to come before the Senate or the American people that every distinctive proposition of importance in the pacification of Zanjon has been accorded by Spain. The council of 30 persons, all Cubans, half appointed by the governor-general and half selected by the Cubans, has been in session and acting ever since.

Mr. SHERMAN. The great body of the people of Cuba are deprived of the right to vote at all.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says the people of Cuba are deprived of the right to vote. The facts do not carry out that assertion. There was a full system of voting with only a very small qualification of $5 taxes, and upon that every Cuban was allowed to vote. Then, in addition to that (we have been going on with the statement here that the Cubans have but one representative in the Cortes), I have a list which I will show to the Senator and the Senate and country, giving the names of the men who have been elected to represent Cuba in the Cortes, and, as I have said, there are 45 in the House of Deputies and 12 or 14 in the upper branch, called the Senate, and not one of those men to-day is in this revolt. Every man of them is against it. They have issued a proclamation, a manifesto, declaring that just as Spain was about to give increased representation and enlarged suffrage this revolt broke out.

I say everything of importance has been granted by Spain, and the immaterial things with reference to education, which are great in themselves, but have to be carried out according to conditions, have not been able to be carried out, because there has been a tendency to break out in revolt ever since.

I speak with some feeling in this matter, because I am laboring under a sense of indignation at the suppression of the real facts in this case and the assumption that the population of Cuba is in this revolt. The committee has kept the facts from the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will excuse me, as I expected to speak only five minutes when I got up——

Mr. GALLINGER. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the Senator's fervid oratory on this subject. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] if he does or does not know the fact that in Cuba a public meeting can not be held without a Government functionary to attend the meeting, who can suppress it whenever it suits his convenience?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Hampshire is speaking of something about which I know nothing.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Maine is talking about the independence and the liberty that the Cubans have, and I want to ask him what kind of liberty they have when they can not even hold a public meeting without its being suppressed at the wish of the Government.

Mr. HALE. I know of countries enjoying a great measure of liberty where the government does exercise, I will not say supervision, but some watchfulness, in times of military peril. There never was a government that did not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I spoke as to time of peace.

Mr. HALE. There were times in our emergency, during the suppression of the rebellion, when——

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I merely wish to say that this was not in time of military insurrection, but in time of peace.

Mr. HALE. What I was talking about was whether the promises were maintained and kept. This debate, as the Senator knows—and the Senator himself has shared in it—has gone on the theory that the pacification of Zanjon had been in all important matters violated. The Senator from Ohio states that. He goes on to state——

Mr. SHERMAN. General Campos states it.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon. General Campos, in what the Senator read, does not in any way deny that any of these important things—the abolition of slavery, the granting of the right of representation in the Cortes, the granting of a Cuban council for government—has been granted.

Mr. GRAY. We have been very much entertained with the state of belligerency which seems to exist between the Senator from Maine and the members of the Foreign Relations Committee. But what I was discussing and attempting to state in justification of my course in regard to the conference report is, in the first instance, that we are not concerned with the righteousness of the cause of the Cuban insurgents, so far as this resolution goes. It merely undertakes to say that a state of public war exists. It declares a fact, and it does not undertake in the first resolution to go into the causes that have animated the American people or the American Congress in giving this heed to the grewsome spectacle that is now being enacted before our eyes in that little island.

It does not lay the blame on anyone. It recognizes or is of the opinion that there ought to be a recognition of a state of public war precisely as Spain and France and England recognized a state of public war in this country without reference to their sympathy for or against the cause of those who had seceded from this Union of States. On the contrary, we may presume that the sympathies of those countries were against the great underlying cause which induced the secession of 11 States, to wit, the existence of slavery; but nevertheless they were compelled to take notice of the fact, and upon that fact the national and executive action was based and international relations were brought about.

Now, Mr. President, after dealing with the form of the resolutions I was proceeding to state what I can not find it in my heart to suppress, and that is my own sympathy with what I believe to be the attempt of a brave and gallant people to achieve for themselves the blessings of a free and independent government for that island. It is not an ordinary insurrection or émeute against established policy. We find a people here segregated, 3,000 miles away from the parent and governing country, in an island that geographically and politically presents all those elements that go to make up a people as distinguished from a faction or from a mere band of insurgents, bounded by the sea, hemmed in by the waters of the great Atlantic Ocean, separated from all other people and countries and with an aspiration the justice of which no American can deny. It is impossible at this late day, after all our history of a century of sympathy with every struggling republic in this hemisphere or anywhere in the world to tell us that our pulses must not beat a little quicker when we hear that men have gone out with arms in their hands ready to die for that form of government which we so proudly cherish to-day.

Mr. President, talk about a cause for an insurrection; the prima facie justification of the cause is when a people so situated band together and forsake home and comfort, abandon wives and children, and appealing to the God of nations and the God of battles for the justice of their cause offer up their lives a willing sacrifice in order that tyranny may be resisted and liberty and freedom established for those they leave behind them. That is prima facie evidence that there is a cause. No people so situated ever took such a course as that where they were living under a government that gave them a reasonable share in that liberty which belongs of right to all people and is the just inheritance of all God's creatures.

I was proceeding to say that our special and particular interest in this matter as a Government, as a nation, and as a people is the geographical proximity of that island to our own shores. We may sympathize with Armenia, but she is not our next-door neighbor. Here, however, is a community whose troubles, whose distresses, whose sufferings are taking place right before our eyes, and how long are the American people to sit quietly without any expression of sympathy when men are dying right before their faces in defense of what all Americans believe to be the rightful inheritance of mankind, the right of self-government.

Mr. HALE. Now, let me ask the Senator from Delaware, does he think it possible that there was ever an unjustifiable revolt that was in itself unreasonable and that was under conditions where wise and prudent men, loving liberty, would not advise it and sustain it? I ask if there was ever such a revolt that did not invoke all the eloquence and all the figures and all the metaphors of freedom? Does the Senator think it is possible, I repeat, that there might be an unjustifiable revolt anywhere?

Mr. GRAY. There have not been many.

Mr. HALE. Now, I should like to follow that——

Mr. GRAY. There have not been many. I can not review the whole history of the world in a moment and commit my judgment to a categorical answer or any answer other than I have given. There have not been many.

Mr. VILAS. How was it with the revolt that took place about thirty-five years ago?

Mr. GRAY. Let me read a text from which every sermon on political liberty has been preached from the time it was uttered until now, a text to which I subscribe with my whole heart, and which receives the assent, the cordial assent, of my best and most patriotic judgment. I read this, sir, in a volume that lies in the desk of every Senator:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers—> from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Mr. President, it is because the American people are permeated with the spirit of that text, it is because they believe in that great charter of their liberties, that to-day their hearts go out in sympathy to those who, as Washington said, have unfurled the banner of freedom in that Ever Faithful Isle of Cuba.

Mr. HALE. Now, right in the presence of that majestic declaration of the fathers, which the Senator will bear in mind is all upon the proposition that the people are struggling for liberty, does not the Senator think that there ought to be some information furnished which shall show that it is by the people, the whole people; I do not mean everybody, but the whole people, comprising the intelligent and educated people and people of substance; I do not say people of fortune alone, but to show that it is something more than an outbreak, a revolt only of particular classes? Does not the Senator think there ought to be some information furnished to us showing that the people of Cuba who are people of education and of substance are engaged in this revolt?

Mr. GRAY. That is almost too sweeping an inquiry to apply to a people struggling for liberty. The Senator will remember that in the Revolution that resulted in the independence of the then colonies, and afterwards the thirteen United States, there were large sections of our people, not ignorant, not slavish, not degraded, who resented the movement of that part of the people who struck for separation from the mother country; that there were great bodies of the population who believed not only that the war was improvident and inexpedient, but that it was unlawful and treasonable; and that they went from the country during the war and after the war by hundreds and by thousands to seek protection and to seek a home under the rule of the parent country. If we had had that test applied to our struggle for independence in the Revolution we would have been devoid of the sympathy of all the civilized world, because we could not have lived up to the test that the Senator from Maine would apply to the people of Cuba.

Mr. HALE. I do not insist upon the test that there shall be anything like unanimity, but what I insist upon, and what I think Senators feel who feel as I do about the matter, is that in Cuba, taking into account the question of misgovernment heretofore, or alleged misgovernment, what is called the Home Rule party, who have been calling for real reforms, reforms that would give them a representative government, representation in the European parliament, which our fathers demanded in 1776, and a council at home for home government, the abolition of slavery, great reforms in themselves—the entire party there who have been struggling for that, and therefore upon those things appeal to us for sympathy, is opposed to this revolt.

I am not speaking now of the Spanish Crown; I am not speaking of Spanish officials. My sympathy and my belief in this matter are not based upon that consideration; I care nothing for them. I have no communication with them in any way. But the Senator does not seem to know—it does not seem to have been brought out—that the party of reform and of liberalism in Cuba, who have been striving for these reforms and gradually getting them inaugurated since the pacification of Zanjon, and were on the eve of getting more reforms, are almost or entirely to a man opposed to the revolt, and they claim that there is no substantial part of the Cuban population that is in this revolt. If that is the case it is not the situation the American Revolution presented, because, while there was the faction of which the Senator speaks, he knows that the best part of the country was in the movement for independence—not all, but the best part of it.

Mr. GRAY. In the few interruptions that I may be permitted to make in the speech of the Senator from Maine I want merely to bring out the fact that, apart from the statement of the question I have just made, we are concerned merely with the recognition of a fact, and not with the causes justifying that fact; that my own course and my own sympathy, as I believe the sympathy of the American people, are founded upon a state of things that amply justifies the extension of that sympathy to this people.

Mr. President, we know how difficult it is in the excitement of a civil war to get at a clear, calm, and definite statement of the case on the one side or the other. Every report that comes to us from that unhappy island is colored, and naturally colored, with the prejudices of the environment in which the report starts. If it comes from Habana and from the seat of the captain-generalcy, we know it has been subjected to an espionage and surveillance that deprive it of the authenticity we would be glad it should possess. I confess also that where we now and then receive a scant report directly from the Cuban insurgents we have to take it with some grains of allowance. So we are thrown back, at the best, upon an examination of what we would call in court the circumstantial evidence of the case; and what is that circumstantial evidence, or, at least, what are its salient features?

Mr. President, can we shut our eyes to the fact that the great, gallant military nation of Spain has thought it necessary to send 120,000 of her best troops to Cuba in order to suppress this insurrection? Can it be that Spain has so far fallen from her ancient renown and her ancient military prowess that her soldiers must be multiplied by 10 in order to face the half-clad negroes and mulattoes who are spoken of here and compel them, half armed or unarmed, to submit to the power and might and puissance of that great and mighty Kingdom?

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator know how many years it took the entire Government of the United States to put down the Seminoles in Florida—little struggling bands of only a few hundred Indians? Does he know that before Osceola bended the knee the United States Government spent six years and sent 9,000 troops down there, 20 to 1 that the struggling Indians had? And yet from 1836 and 1837 up to 1841, 1842, and 1843, the Government was never able to conquer the little bands of Seminole Indians in the Everglades of Florida. So the argument that many troops must be sent there does not apply.

Mr. GRAY. That is true, perhaps, but does not the Senator recognize that when this Government was fighting those Seminole Indians it was fighting a war of extermination? They were savages. We claimed their land. We claimed that we had a right to wipe them off the face of the earth whenever they resisted the authority of the United States or declined to obey its behests in any particular.

Mr. HALE. But it took a great while to do it.

Mr. GRAY. And so it is that you can only justify the course of Spain upon the theory that she feels compelled to send enough soldiers into that island to exterminate the population, to make the island a desert, and then call it peace.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is diverting——

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to make a suggestion here in connection with the point made by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator from Maine surely will recognize the fact that the Seminole war was waged in the Everglades of Florida, where it was almost impossible to find solid ground on which a white man's foot could stand, and where it was impossible for even the bravest men to penetrate to the hiding places of the Seminoles.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator from Delaware will pardon me, I want to ask the Senator from Maine where is the parallel that he has suggested between this and the war in Cuba? The leaders of the Cuban insurgents have again and again approached the very capital of that island instead of hiding in the swamps, as did the Seminole Indians, while the Cuban guns were thundering but a few weeks ago in the ears of the captain-general of Cuba.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator has appealed to me, I will state that I cited it because there are similarities. I cited the instance as showing that a great government, engaged in putting down a rebellion, may be compelled to spend immense sums of money and sacrifice great numbers of troops when the element against them is small before it puts it down. The present situation, while not the same that it was in the Everglades of Florida, is to a degree like that. The insurgents here have the great advantage that the Indians had. It is hard to get at them; they appear and disappear; they do not fight battles. It takes time to do it.

Now, as to extermination, the Senator from Delaware very adroitly sought to shift the issue and pertinency of my illustration, which was simply given when he was discussing how long Spain had been in putting down the revolt. Now he says that the Seminole war was a case of extermination on the part of the Government, and he asks if I am in favor of extermination. The Seminole war was not extermination.

Mr. GRAY. I do not care to go into a discussion of the Seminole war. I think I have been indulgent enough.

Mr. HALE. I want to say that it was not a war of extermination. There never was a campaign opened when proclamation was not issued by the commanders there that if the Seminoles laid down their arms as other Indians every right of theirs would be preserved. Osceola would not lay down his arms. It became extermination because the Indians insisted on fighting.

Mr. GRAY. Now, Mr. President, so much for one great bit of circumstantial evidence that a state of public war exists in Cuba. Notwithstanding what has been said by the Senator from Maine, how are you going to reconcile it with your intelligence, with your common sense, that there in that island, containing a population about equal to that of the State of New Jersey, 120,000 soldiers, presumably brave and gallant soldiers, have been unable to suppress these insurgent bands, this revolt, these guerrillas, as they are sneeringly called? How do you account for it except by the fact that the spirit of liberty and independence permeates that whole population, or practically that whole population, and nerves their arms and gives them thews of steel to smite the oppressor that would subdue them again to the despotism in which they have been living?

Mr. President, I said there was something else. Spain considers it a war. The interview with the Spanish premier states that he called it a civil war in Cuba. We all recognize it, and why are we to be criticised here in the Congress of the United States for expressing our opinion that a state of public war exists? The resolution does not declare belligerency—that belongs to the Executive; but it may stimulate and support the Executive when he comes to use the means that are in his power and are not in ours to investigate this subject and see whether the dignity and the character and the international obligations resting upon the United States do not all justify him in acting in the spirit of this resolution and accord to these people, not the boon, but the recognition of the undeniable fact that public war exists upon that island. Whatever may be the result of it, if Spain shall again succeed in reducing that island into subjection or whether these patriots achieve what they are sacrificing their lives to achieve makes no difference. We are dealing with the present, and that is our duty, and our only duty.

But what I have said does somewhat concern the last Senate resolution, which says—

That in the opinion of the Senate the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

There is nothing in that disrespectful to Spain. She has no right to resent it. We ask for nothing but those friendly offices which one nation may offer to another in its distress and in its troubles to compose the difficulties upon some grounds that shall be just not only to Spain but also to the people of Cuba. What right has she to object to such a resolution as that?

Mr. President, international law is nothing but the body of those rules that govern intercourse of civilized nations. In their foundation and in the moral support they receive they differ nothing from those rules which govern the intercourse of civilized men in civilized society. What man, seeing his next-door neighbor engaged in a family quarrel which threatens the death of his wife and the maiming of his children, would not go and say: "For God's sake, stop this horrible struggle; let me see if I can not bring about a better state of things and restore peace at least to this distracted household"?

Mr. President, this family quarrel has been going on for fifty years, and we have stood by, loyal to our international obligations, never seeking to offend the great and renowned monarchy of Spain, but respecting her noble traditions, respecting the noble blood that courses in the veins of her people, recognizing them as a gallant and great people. But we have stood by this little neighbor, the Island of Cuba, and have heard the cries of distress. We have heard, too, the wail of the wounded and the dying year after year, and still have maintained our law-abiding character and still intend to maintain it. But are we to steel our hearts, to shut up the fountains of our sympathy and say that we no longer are men, but are only pawns on the chessboard of international law?

Mr. President, it is not human nature. We can not avoid noticing this terrible and horrible state of things that is right under our own eyes and forces itself upon our attention. We have a right, regarding the peculiar and exceptional situation in which the island rests with reference to the United States, to say to Spain, "We protest against your attempting to subjugate this people unless you can so bring about a state of things that she shall be content with a reasonable measure of self-government and of good government that you may accord her." Govern her decently; that is all we ask.

We do not want the island. I have seen it stated that the press of France and of Germany have spoken of these debates in Congress as being actuated by the desire for territorial aggrandizement on the part of the United States. I have not heard one man within the Halls of Congress or outside of them say that he either expected or desired as an American that the Island of Cuba under any circumstances or conditions should be annexed to the United States of America. There is no sordid motive actuating the American people in the expression of the sympathy which is welling up all over this land toward those people, whom we can not help regarding as patriots struggling for liberty. There is no selfish motive; it is purely the same feeling which we accorded, and which was so eloquently expressed by the statesmen of two generations ago, toward the struggling republics of South America, or more than a generation ago to the people who had raised the banner of freedom in downtrodden Hungary.

There never has been an occasion in the history of the world since the United States achieved their independence where a struggle for freedom was being patriotically made that the sympathies of the American people have not gone out to that struggle and found expression in the halls of Congress. We are self-restrained in the character of these resolutions. We are not insulting to Spain, nor do I, in supporting these resolutions, mean to pass any reproach upon her except that she has failed in all these long years to so govern that little island as to make it reasonably content. If she be in such a situation that she can not make concessions and can not acknowledge the independence of this people, if pride or circumstance of any kind prevent her, national traditions or what not, then God help her and God pity her, for she can not, with all her pride and with all her tradition and with all her history and with all the ability that characterizes her people, resist the course of events, or the manifest destiny of every people in this Western Hemisphere of the world.

Mr. President, it is not simply this year's war we are dealing with. Ten years, from 1868 to 1878, and a period of enforced peace and of ill-concealed discontent in the interval, and back of the war of 1868, and through every administration, attracting the attention of every Secretary of State from 1850 down to the present time, the troubles of Cuba have formed part of the diplomatic business of the United States. I alluded the other day to what Mr. Everett said away back in 1852. He said:

> Spain, meantime, has retained of her extensive dominions in this hemisphere but the two islands of Cuba and Puerto Rico—

This is a state paper, it is written and published from the Department of State of the United States—

> A respectful sympathy with the fortunes of an ancient ally and a gallant people, with whom the United States have ever maintained the most friendly relations, would, if no other reason existed, make it our duty to leave her in the undisturbed possession of this little remnant of her mighty transatlantic empire. The President desires to do so; no word or deed of his will ever question her title or shake her possession. But can it be expected to last very long?—

That was said nearly fifty years ago—

> Can it resist this mighty current in the fortunes of the world? Is it desirable that it should be so? Can it be for the interest of Spain to cling to a possession that can only be maintained by a garrison of twenty-five or thirty thousand troops, a powerful naval force, and an annual expenditure for both arms of the service of at least $12,000,000?

Mr. President, we can not, our common sense, our judgment, and our intelligence can not abdicate their seats and leave us without a discriminating opinion in regard to the events of the world that are transpiring right at our doors. We know something of the history of the world, we know something of the causes of events, and while human hearts beat in human breasts sympathy will well up and find expression for a downtrodden and suffering people wherever in God's world they are making the fight for liberty and for independence.

Mr. President, I have but few words more to say. I know that the history of the late war in some of its aspects is not applicable to our duty in the present situation, but some challenge was made, some challenge has been made upon this floor by the Senator from Maine, of the correctness of certain statements which appeared in public prints in regard to the conduct of the Spanish authorities in suppressing the revolution from 1868 to 1878. I agree with him that statements of that kind charging such gross cruelties and inhumanities upon a friendly people ought not to be made without authentication and without due authority. Therefore I did not approve at the time of the reading of that report from the newspaper by the Senator from Ohio. But if it be pertinent at all to discuss that, and as it has been challenged and a statement made in regard to the conduct of the war against Cuba from 1868 to 1878 by the Senator from Maine, I want to call his attention to a statement that does not lack authority and that is justified in being read in the presence of the American Senate. I allude to a letter from Mr. Fish, then Secretary of State, dated April 18, 1874, to Admiral Polo de Bernabé, who was then the minister of Spain in the United States. It is a long letter, growing out of the Virginius affair, but he says in the opening:

> The insurrection which broke out at Yara—

I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to this—

> The insurrection which broke out at Yara, in the autumn of 1868, has had the unusual good fortune of having the justice of the complaints, which it alleges in its justification, recognized by those who are engaged in suppressing it. On the 10th of September, 1869—

Says Mr. Fish—

> the minister of transmarine affairs at Madrid, in an official paper, said:
> "A deplorable and pertinacious tradition of despotism, which, if it could ever be justified, is without a shadow of reason at the present time, intrusted the direction and management of our colonial establishment to the agents of the metropolis, destroying by their dominant and exclusive authority the vital energies of the country and the creative and productive activity of free individuals. And although the system may now have improved in some of its details, the domineering action of the authorities being less felt, it still appears full of the original error, which is upheld by the force of tradition, and the necessary influence of interests created under their protection, which doubtless are deserving of respect so far as they are reconcilable with the requirements of justice, with the common welfare, and with the principles on which every liberal system should be founded. A change of system, political as well as administrative, is therefore imperatively demanded."

Mr. President, that is from a responsible minister of Spain in regard to the then incipient rebellion in Cuba.

Mr. HALE. I caught something there that is important historically. Will the Senator read over the particular revolt, with the local name given, that Mr. Fish uses there?

Mr. GRAY. "The insurrection which broke out at Yara in the autumn of 1868."

Mr. HALE. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. GRAY. The date of Mr. Fish's paper is April 18, 1874.

Mr. HALE. And the revolt is alleged as breaking out in 1868?

Mr. GRAY. In the autumn, he says.

Mr. HALE. I wanted to get that fact, because it does not seem to accord with the time referred to before.

Mr. GRAY. I think I am justified in relying upon Mr. Fish as as an authority of sufficient respectability to read in the Senate of the United States. Mr. Fish quotes the minister of transmarine affairs at Madrid, when that minister says:

> A deplorable and pertinacious tradition of despotism, which, if it could ever be justified, is without a shadow of reason at the present time, intrusted the direction and management of our colonial establishment to the agents of the metropolis, destroying by their dominant and exclusive authority the vital energies of the country and the creative and productive activity of free individuals.

Mr. Fish goes on and speaks of what I have just read:

> But while admitting the existence of the injuries which had provoked the outbreak at Yara, the government of the revolution of 1868 refused to remedy them until the armed insurrection should be suppressed. "Spain would already have given all constitutional liberties to Cuba," said Mr. Silvela to General Sickles, "if the unfortunate insurrection of Yara, and the cry of 'Death to Spain,' uttered by some Cubans, had not alienated the sympathies of the nation, and obliged the government to accept the impolitic contest to which it was provoked. The government considers that it can come to no definite decision in regard to the political situation and future government of the Island of Cuba until the insurgents lay down their arms and cease the struggle." This would indicate that it is the resistance to admitted wrongs, and not the wrongfulness of resistance, which Spain is endeavoring to suppress.

Nothing more epigrammatical and sententious and weighty than that sentence has been uttered in this whole debate.

Mr. HALE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a mistake manifestly made on the part of the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Ohio has invoked the expression and the letter of Gen. Martinez Campos in referring to the revolt at Yara as a justification of his statement that Spain had not carried out the pacification of 1878. It turns out that the revolt at Yara was in 1868 and that General Campos is talking about the course of the Spanish government and misgovernment ten years before the pacification. I am obliged to the Senator for bringing out that fact, because the Senator from Ohio laid great stress, after he declared that Spain had not carried out the provisions of the pacification of 1878, on the statement that Gen. Martinez Campos refers to that, when Gen. Martinez Campos is referring to a revolt that was ten years before that.

Mr. GRAY. I am not concerned with any dispute the Senator from Maine may have with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HALE. I was glad——

Mr. GRAY. Except, I will say, that this language of Secretary Fish is in regard to an insurrection which broke out at Yara in the autumn of 1868, not the insurrection of Yara, but the insurrection which broke out at Yara in 1868 and continued for ten long years.

Mr. HALE. But what I suspected was (and I am glad this has been brought out) that General Campos was not talking about anything that had taken place after the pacification, but of what took place before.

Mr. GRAY. Oh, the war went on. It commenced at Yara in the autumn of 1868 and went on for ten years, and thousands of lives were sacrificed and millions of treasure expended. It was only ended, not by the overthrow of the insurgents in arms, but by concessions made to them and promises that were entered into by the Government of Spain, or its military authority, that the reforms they were seeking would in a large measure be granted.

Now, then, one thing more may be pertinent as a fact, an incontrovertible fact, of the history of that melancholy period, for Mr. Fish quotes it in this same dispatch. On the 24th of March, 1869, the captain-general of Cuba issued a decree which is referred to by Admiral Polo de Barnabé, and from which I will read an extract. I think we may take this as authentic history. Here is the decree by the captain-general:

Vessels which may be captured in Spanish waters, or on the high seas near to the island, having on board men, arms, and munitions, or effects that can in any manner contribute, promote, or foment the insurrection in this province—

A barrel of biscuits could do that—whatsoever their derivation and destination, after examination of their papers and register, shall be de facto considered as enemies of the integrity of our territory, and treated as pirates, in accordance with the ordinances of the navy.

Now—

All persons captured in such vessels, without regard to their number—will be be immediately executed.

All persons—

Mr. President, if we wanted anything to characterize the manner of warfare to which these poor people were subjected in all those melancholy years here we have it. If that be true, no wonder they went out to the field with arms in their hands and under the blue sky offered up their lives a willing sacrifice in order that their wrongs might be in some degree righted.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator know that that policy was undertaken by the Federal Government in 1861?

Mr. GRAY. God forbid that that should be true.

Mr. HALE. That policy was undertaken. Of course it was not carried out.

Mr. GRAY. God forbid that that should be true.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator has stated always——

Mr. MORGAN. Why was it not carried out?

Mr. HALE. It could not be carried out. Nobody expected it to be carried out.

Mr. MORGAN. You did not dare to attempt it.

Mr. HALE. Our Government took the ground that any persons found under just such conditions as the Senator has described would be treated as pirates, and that means but one thing. No; it could not be carried out; nobody ever expected that it would be carried out. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me——

Mr. GRAY. Do not answer me now; I am going to close. You have stated that fact. I am coming to a conclusion, and then the Senator may take the floor.

Mr. HALE. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly; I will be glad to hear the Senator from Maine.

I am not dealing now with the loose statements of excited and prejudiced correspondents; I am not dealing now with the waifs of newspaperdom; but I am dealing with sober history cited by the State Department of the United States. It would be no reply if, as the Senator from Maine says, it is true that this Government ever resorted to any measure so inhuman and so cruel as that which I have just read as the decree of the captain-general of Cuba; but I do not believe, notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from Maine, that that is true. He has been misinformed. He has misread the history of our country, for I as one citizen of this great Republic would hang my head with shame if it could be told me with any semblance of truth that under this flag any inhumanity so gross as that could have been committed or that its bright and unsullied folds had ever been stained by such a crime as is set forth in the proposal of that captain-general.

It is true that under the remonstrance of the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, that order was modified, but not until after American citizens spattered with their blood the white walls of Morro Castle, and it was not until the remonstrance of this Government was brought to the attention of Spain that her agents were transgressing those great laws of humanity as well as of war that Spain declared that they had acted without her authority; and it is to her lasting credit that she disavowed the barbarity of her own military commanders.

Mr. President, I have not said and I have not intended to say one word that can justly wound the sensibilities of a loyal Spaniard or the Spanish Government. I do not mean to say that they take pleasure in this situation. I do not say that they may not in the heat of their patriotism resent it; but when they come to consider it calmly and dispassionately they will agree—it seems to me all reasonable men will agree—that the Congress of the United States could do no less than they have done in giving utterance to the sympathy of the American people for the people of Cuba in this crisis of their existence, and in expressing their desire that Spain, without rupture of our friendly relations, should sit down with us at the council board of nations and consider whether there might be some other issue to this distressing conflict than the extermination of a brave people fighting for their liberties.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, it is not to be expected that the tendency of opinion in the Senate can be arrested by any words spoken in these closing moments of the first act in the play of Cuban intervention; but I am well satisfied that whether that play shall turn out to be a farce or a tragedy, we are now called upon by the conference committee to take an incautious part.

I suppose that there are few in this body who believe that a concurrent resolution will in itself possess any operative force upon the questions involved, and if the President shall ignore it altogether we may escape larger consequences than a sense of disappointment, some disturbance of business, and a little general banter at our expense. But if by experimental methods we should start a succession of dangers which finally prove uncontrollable, our responsibility will not be less because it has been unnecessarily assumed.

I do not wish to be understood as condemning concurrent resolutions in all cases, because they sometimes afford a useful means of giving expression to the opinion of Congress; but in the present embarrassed condition of the business of the country we should not deal with a critical question like this in any other than a direct and responsible way.

Mr. President, there are very few who do not sympathize with those who strike for local self-government and independent nationality in Cuba or elsewhere. Who could resist a feeling of elation if to-morrow the news that Cuba had conquered her independence should be flashed around the world? But the heart would throb to the same news if Jamaica or Ireland was engaged in a struggle for home rule against England. In either case we should be willing to use all the peaceful instrumentalities of international intercourse to aid those who labored to be free. So it was that from the beginning I for one have desired to vote for a joint resolution recognizing, in the usual diplomatic tone, the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents.

I am aware that according to the formularies of some law writers there are possible deficiencies in the Cuban claim to this recognition; but while the insurgents may have no settled capital, and no ports, the length of time during which they have conducted the war, the number of men in the field, the large amount of territory in their possession and other like conditions constitute such actual belligerency as entitles them to be put upon an equal footing with the Spaniards under our neutrality laws. That much we ought to do.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to understand distinctly what the Senator said a few moments ago. Did I understand him aright that he was willing to vote for a joint resolution recognizing belligerency?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

I have not seen the duty which I think is now imposed upon us more clearly stated than in a few words from Mr. Pomeroy in his work on International Law. I ask the Secretary to read what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

To refuse such recognition might, under some circumstances, have the direct effect to cause the country so refusing to take the part of the mother country and against the rebels. As a consequence, if another power remains strictly neutral to the contest, that very attitude must involve the recognition of the insurgents as belligerents. Unless another power desires to take active part in the hostilities, and throw the weight of its influence, and, under some circumstances, the positive aid of its executive power, in favor of the mother country, it must treat the rebels as belligerents.

The propositions, therefore, which I lay down and maintain are: First, that as in general every nation has a right to remain neutral in every such contest, every nation has a right to recognize both parties as belligerents, the contest as proper war; and the mother country would have no legal ground of complaint at such act and attitude; second, that in general it is the duty of every nation to take this position of neutrality. The only exception to these rules which appears to me admissible is the case where another nation may be bound by treaty stipulations with the mother country to give active aid in putting down the rebellion.

* * * * * * *

Without this species of recognition the insurgents could not send out armed men-of-war against the commerce of the mother country. Having no national basis, such armed vessels would be piratical and liable to be treated as such by all the nations of the world.—Pomeroy, page 275.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAFFERY. Does the Senator hold that in expressing his willingness to vote for a joint resolution recognizing the belligerency of Cuba he would do so under the sanction of international law?

Mr. CHILTON. Unquestionably.

Mr. CAFFERY. Then, quoting from Mr. Pomeroy, I draw the Senator's attention to the case that he puts and the application of his doctrine, and inquire of the Senator whether the conditions mentioned by Pomeroy exist in the case of Cuba? He puts this interrogation, and answers it:

Pomeroy on International Law, section 235:

Again it has been asked, If the Irish people should rebel would our Government immediately recognize them as belligerents and the contest between them and England as a proper war? I answer: This would depend on circumstances. To make the case parallel to ours it should appear that the Irish rebels had organized a government which they claimed and acknowledged to be supreme; that the power of this government should extend over some definite and considerable portion, at least, of Ireland; that from that portion of territory thus held the English civil authority should be expelled for the time being; that the insurgents should conduct their resistance in a military manner, and that the measures of repression should be entirely military. If all this should take place the United States might and should treat the contest as a proper war and the parties as belligerents.

Now, I propound the question whether the conditions laid down by Mr. Pomeroy in this extract for a proper recognition on the part of the United States of the Irish insurgents as belligerents applies to the case of Cuba?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir. I have no hesitation in answering the Senator that I think the conditions now existing in Cuba constitute the equivalent of the conditions which are laid down by Mr. Pomeroy and other writers upon international law.

The mere recognition of belligerency is a familiar step in international association, and if it stands alone Spain can have no plausible ground for offense. It would seem the part of prudent management, therefore, to await further developments before going beyond that point. I can not believe that the duty of our Republic in the present posture of affairs is performed by absolute nonaction.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator asserts that the same conditions apply now to Cuba as in the hypothetical case stated by Mr. Pomeroy as applying to Ireland. I ask him, where have we any proof of the fact that the Cuban insurgents or rebels hold any definite portion of the territory of Cuba, that they have expelled from that portion of the territory thus held all Spanish authority, that they have a regularly organized army and carry on their military measures and operations under the acknowledged and accepted rules of war?

Mr. CHILTON. We have the same evidence which we have that Dr. Jameson made a raid into the Transvaal or that a war was in progress a few months ago between China and Japan; we have the same evidence that proves to us any other recent historical fact. We need no other evidence.

Therefore, if a joint resolution recognizing the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents stood here alone, I would vote for it without hesitation. But, Mr. President, temperate action upon this question does not seem to be popular.

The first resolution on this subject was presented on the 29th of January from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate. I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the present deplorable war in the Island of Cuba has reached a magnitude that concerns all civilized nations to the extent that it should be conducted, if unhappily it is longer to continue, on those principles and laws of warfare that are acknowledged to be obligatory upon civilized nations when engaged in open hostilities, including the treatment of captives who are enlisted in either army; due respect to cartels for exchange of prisoners and for other military purposes; truces and flags of truce, the provision of proper hospitals ei,lhod saplp spsutau and services to the sick and wounded of either army.

Resolved further, That this representation of the views and opinions of Congress be sent to the President; and if he concurs therein that he will, in a friendly spirit, use the good offices of this Government to the end that Spain shall be requested to accord to the armies with which it is engaged in war the rights of belligerents, as the same are recognized under the laws of nations.

Mr. CHILTON. That resolution was a mere request to the President of the United States to ask Spain to accord belligerent rights. It was manifestly pacific, and, of course, could have given no offense in any quarter. Next, we find the Committee on Foreign Relations reporting a substitute for that resolution, which I will also ask the Secretary to read. That is the substitute long debated here by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and others.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the expression desired to be made was still clear and moderate and touched alone the question of belligerency. The only objection I found to it was that it was concurrent, not joint, and spoke for Congress rather than the Government. I am aware that the Senator from Alabama has argued here that Congress has the power, independently of Presidential action, to grant belligerent rights to other nations or peoples, but I have yet to hear any other Senator assert that proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I did not argue that as a proposition involved in this case at all.

Mr. CHILTON. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. That was a question asked me by the junior Senator from Maine and also by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I stated at the time that it was not at all involved in the resolutions or the action of the Senate, and therefore I was only expressing my opinion upon it at their request, but it did not enter into the case.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator expressed the opinion that a concurrent resolution would be effective to constitute the recognition of belligerency, as I understood him.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and I think so now.

Mr. CHILTON. That is the point I am getting at. I am not aware that anybody else has taken a similar position. I want to say that I am as far from giving my adhesion to the contrary theory that the power of according belligerent rights is vested exclusively in the President. We all admit that the President is the organ of this Government in speaking to other Governments. He has formal control of our foreign relations, just as he has formal control of the Army and the Navy; but, sir, I have not been able to find in our Constitution the slightest trace of an intention to vest in the President the sole determination of our relations to foreign countries. If in the exercise of some other constitutional function he should find it necessary to determine the question of belligerency, he would do it for himself; but his decision would not be final and binding on the Government; he could not recognize belligerency if Congress, by a two-thirds vote over his veto, should adopt a different policy, nor could he obstruct a recognition of belligerency if Congress in the same way should determine otherwise.

Mr. MORGAN. That is in accordance with the view and opinion that I have had the honor and at the same time the misfortune to express here; that is to say, that when the Congress of the United States, the two Houses, arrive at the point where they express a declaration of war, or a declaration recognizing the belligerency of two foreign countries by a two-thirds vote, then the President certainly has not anything more to do with it; and the power that recognizes that belligerency comes from the political department of the Government of the United States and is omnipotent.

Mr. CHILTON. It comes from the political department, just like every other power comes from it.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not care about the method.

Mr. CHILTON. Our independent action does not make the recognition effective, but we do it by virtue of that superior authority vested in Congress to overrule, by a two-thirds vote, even a veto of the President. That is the way it comes.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand, the position of the Senator from Texas is somewhat different from that of the Senator from Alabama; that is, the Senator from Texas contends, as I understand, that the passage of a joint resolution presented to the President, in case of his nonconcurrence and the adoption thereof by each House by a two-thirds vote, would make it efficacious; whereas the Senator from Alabama contends that it need not be presented to the President at all. I understand that to be the difference.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely contend that the power comes from the two Houses because they are the political department of the Government.

Mr. WHITE. That is general, of course. I was trying to get the Senator from Alabama down to a real expression.

Mr. CHILTON. The position as originally stated by the Senator from Alabama differs from mine just in the respect which has been alluded to by the Senator from California; I can not help believing that his present statement is a modification of his words as originally reported, but of course no modification of his intention.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I think not.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, we can derive very little light from the precedents in our history on account of the fact that there has never been an occasion when the President and the Congress were at variance on this question.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope there never will be again.

Mr. CHILTON. The judicial authorities do not speak in uniform tones upon the question. If you take the celebrated case of Kennett vs. Chambers, in 14 Howard, which involved a consideration of the relations of the United States to Texas at the time of the revolution of 1836, the obvious deduction to be drawn from Chief Justice Taney's words in that opinion is that the power to recognize belligerency belongs to the treaty-making department of the Government, which is the Senate and the President. It seems to me, however, that the best doctrine on the question is that stated in several opinions which I have examined, and from which I have made one or two selections. Justice Nelson, in The United States vs. Baker, 5 Blatchford, page 6, speaking of the recognition of belligerency, says:

It involves the determination of great public and political questions which belong to the departments of our Government that have charge of our foreign relations, the legislative and executive department.

Mr. Justice Field, in United States vs. Greathouse (2 Abbott, U. S., pages 364–380), says:

The court * * * can not treat any new government as having authority to issue commissions or letters of marque which will afford protection to its citizens until the legislative and executive departments have recognized its existence.

These authorities treat the question as always one for the political department of the Government, but they refer both to the legislative and executive branches as making up this political department. Such in my opinion is the proper construction of the Constitution. To hold differently would be to assert that this great subject of foreign relations is excepted out of the general plan of our Government. Nothing but the clearest language could justify such a conclusion, and no such language is found in our Constitution.

Believing, therefore, that the Senate possessed a share in the jurisdiction to accord belligerent rights to other nations, peoples, or districts, and that the facts warranted such action, I could have supported a declaration of that sort in regard to the Cubans if it had been shaped into a joint resolution, so that the voice of this great Government might be spoken in all its constitutional vigor.

But a turn of the wheel was taken, and we find the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] added to the other. It was accepted by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is very brief, but for the sake of accuracy I will read it to the Senate:

Resolved further, That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

The best interpretation of the meaning of that resolution is found in the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania himself, and I desire to quote briefly from those remarks, delivered here on Thursday, February 20. Speaking of the offer of mediation made by General Grant at the time that distinguished Senator was a member of his Cabinet, he says:

In doing so he not only recognized both parties to the conflict as on an equal plane, but he also warned Spain that if such mediation should not be accepted direct intervention would probably be deemed a necessity on the part of the United States. * * * Evidently the Government of the United States can do no less than take up the subject precisely where President Grant left it and to resume the friendly mediation which he actually began, with all the consequences which necessarily would follow its rejection.

It is very plain that the resolution offering friendly offices in the beginning contemplated something else in case Spain should not yield to our mediation, and I thought it was unfortunate that that resolution should be added to the other in regard to belligerency.

Mr. MORGAN. That was done by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. CHILTON. I understand that.

Mr. MORGAN. It was not done by the committee.

Mr. CHILTON. The committee accepted it, as I understand.

Mr. President, I believe that any combination of the question of belligerency and the question of mediation is likely to open the way to diplomatic recrimination and strain between Spain and the United States. I do not think these two things ought to be combined at all.

But even that was not enough. Another turn of the wheel was made, and we find presented to this body the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives, which are three in number. They have been often read, and I shall not read them again.

Mr. CAFFERY. Perhaps I did not distinctly understand the Senator from Texas, but I desire to know from him whether he holds, and whether the authorities he quotes sustain him in that view, that mediation would be received as an unfriendly act?

Mr. CHILTON. No, sir; not in itself.

Mr. CAFFERY. I understood the Senator to say that mediation might lead to intervention, and intervention might lead to complications which might result in unfriendliness.

Mr. CHILTON. Under diplomatic usage, mediation pure and simple is not necessarily an unfriendly act, but I was interpreting the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania by the speech of that Senator. That was the point. I was giving to that resolution his interpretation, because we must treat all these resolutions by the circumstances that surround them. But even the combination resolution does not seem to have been severe enough, and we are now asked to accept the resolutions of the House of Representatives. I shall not quote them verbatim, but they are substantially as follows:

First, that we should recognize the belligerency of the Cubans; second, that the United States should use their good offices to procure for the people of Cuba a government of their own choice; and third, that the United States should be prepared to intervene if necessary.

Thus the proposed expression of Congress has been amended, conferred about, and sharpened until it is now regarded as distinctly hostile to a friendly nation. The objection to the resolutions is not only the language in which they are clothed, but because they come here as a sort of natural preliminary to war between this country and Spain. What else are we to expect from them when the long-eminent Senators from Alabama and Ohio have said of resolutions much milder that they carried the danger of war. On Friday, February 28, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said:

I do not disguise the dangers, the possibilities of hostile movements, into which our Government may be drawn. I know that the people of Spain are a sensitive, a proud, a gallant people, and will not submit to what they consider an injustice without resentment and resistance.

Not only so, Mr. President, but the language of these resolutions is the language of war. When a nation talks about "intervention" the world understands it to be a threat of war. I ask the Secretary to read a quotation from Wheaton's International Law, contained in a note on page 120, in regard to the meaning of the words "intervention" and "interposition." The extract is very short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The Secretary will read as indicated, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Publicists have assigned the words intervention and interposition to express the interference of one state in the affairs of another by force or with force as the known ultimate sanction. * * * But the term mediation is limited to an offer of advice or of assistance in the way of arbitration, leaving the acceptance of the offer to the free will of the other party.

Mr. CHILTON. I have had that read simply to show what diplomatists understand to be the meaning of the word "intervention," which is used in the third resolution presented by the committee of conference. But I want to say that not only is the language of the resolution the language of hostile purpose, but, sadder still, Mr. President, the popularity of these resolutions in the United States is the popularity of war, and it is against this spirit of war that I protest.

What will the American people gain by war with Spain? What will the great cause of civilization and humanity gain? The first signal of armed conflict would summon Congress to remain in session. More revenue would be needed, bonds would be authorized, all existing political issues would be instantly swept to the rear in a universal roar of national excitement. The question would be to get money, and get it quickly, and trust to the future to provide a way of paying out. Our bonds or our customs duties—perhaps both—would be made payable in gold. Senators may say no, but tell me what became of the anti-tariff people; what became of the anti-bond people; what became of those who opposed national banks when the last war came on? They quickly dropped into a helpless minority, and it became high tariff, more bonds, unlimited greenbacks; anything to wage the war to success. And those expedients of war necessity are to-day the very things which perplex our councils and rest like a brake beam upon the progress of the American people.

I feel sure if the United States made armed intervention in Cuba we would finally work our will, but I do not believe we could do so without a malignant war. It would be a contest of many months—possibly years. When we had organized our fleets and mustered our armies—when we had driven the Spanish navy out of American waters and had overrun Cuba with our conquering banners, we might be sobered by the taste of carnage, but we could not then stop to count the cost. It would be represented by disordered business at home, by the stoppage of the transportation of our cotton and other products to Europe, by many millions of dollars of expenditure, by taxes rising higher and still higher, and by thousands and thousands of brave Americans sacrificed to the joint destruction of fevers and bullets in the West Indies.

But that, even, would not bring the end. When the Spanish people had lost possession of Cuba our position would hardly be improved. We would have torn away their afflicted colony, but their privateers would still swarm the sea and, like new Alabamas, would ravage American commerce throughout the world. To stop this scourge we would be forced to hunt Spain upon the mainland of Europe. Who can reckon the expenditure of agony and treasure which such a project would involve? Who can measure the desperate resolution of even a feeble people when fighting at the doors of their own homes? When war once began our pride would then be truly involved. We would then have a real reason to animate American patriotism. There would be no differences at home when the prestige of our devoted country proved to be at stake, and the last man and the last dollar would be offered if necessary to close the war in triumph. We are too strong not to prevail in the end, but when we contemplate that end, who can find charms in its outline? Helpless orphans and desolate wives, the wounded in every hamlet, the growth of military methods in our Government, the demoralization of useful men, the corruption of politics, and finally and most fearfully, because it always endures after the other evils of war have yielded to the influence of a few years of nature's quiet, the common people of this country would drag the ball and chain of an immense bonded debt for fifty years after a victorious peace. Others may justify themselves in driving this great American ship boldly upon hidden rocks, but I have seen enough as boy and man in the thirty years which have passed from 1865 to 1896 to teach me to look upon war as the chief destroyer of the natural chances of the humble and the hard working.

There is, of course, one thing more dreadful. Whenever the national character is at issue no true American can hesitate. He will make instant choice of a grievous alternative. There are times in the history of nations when a point of prestige becomes involved—a point of prestige so keen, so vital, so identified with the honor of the country that it must be defended at every hazard. Such was the right of search claimed by England and contested by our arms in 1812. Such is the Monroe doctrine. It is the jewel of the American heart. To yield it to the pretensions of a foreign adversary is to publicly confess the sinking of the national spirit and the renunciation of the national destiny.

But the question of interfering in Cuba is not such an issue. We are asked to make a distinct departure in our foreign policy. We hear a great deal of talk about barbarities practiced by Spanish authority, but I have yet to see authentic evidence of such conduct in the present war. There may have been excesses, but they are chargeable to both combatants, and are generally disavowed by those in command.

The time may come when the United States will have grown so powerful that they can lay down, as of absolute authority, rules of international action upon the American Hemisphere. With this great power will come the responsibility of interposing for humanity and liberty whenever the circumstances require it. Such a policy will be the legitimate outgrowth of the Monroe doctrine, which will be developed to guard the peace and freedom of the whole Western World.

But we have not yet reached that time. We are strong, very strong, but we are not yet so strong in comparison with possible adversaries that they will yield to our intervention without a mighty trial of arms.

Why not make war on Russia to liberate the victims of political prosecution who languish in Siberian exile? Why not make war on Turkey to protect Christian missionaries of our own kin whose safety has been violated in a country to which they have dedicated their lives? The reason is apparent. The cause of liberty, the cause of civilization, the cause of American blood and sacrifice, is dear to us, but the difficulties of applying a remedy would be so tremendous, the burden of expense so vast, that we are justified in waiting. We are pledged to settle internal problems. It is a false and mocking patriotism which calls us away until we have put those who strive at home in a more prosperous condition. We feel that under God our first duty is to the millions who follow hard lives in this country of our love, and that we can not perform that first duty well if we now engross the strength of the nation in vindicating the cause of the oppressed in other lands.

There is still another consideration which impresses me with great seriousness. It is the fear that when we undertake Cuban intervention the annexation of that island to the United States will be the result. I know that some who support these resolutions do not favor annexation. It seems to me, however, that he is but a careless student of affairs who can not see that once embarked on a project of intervention the winds and waves of human action will be too strong for opposition, and that Cuba will come under the American flag as surely as we fire a gun in her behalf. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] a few moments ago said he had not heard anybody express himself in favor of annexation. I wrote down the next day after the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] spoke this expression from him:

> I admit, but it is not necessary to discuss it here, that the ultimate and logical result of independence in Cuba would be that it would become a part of the United States.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, I will call his attention to the remark of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who expressed the conviction that Cuba ought to be annexed to Mexico.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, have we not seen enough of the problem of mixed races, which for so many years has embittered the brother's cup of true American manhood? For more than a half century the negro question formed the groundwork of difference between the North and the South, until it finally culminated in red-handed war. And when the main question was settled by the issue of that struggle the problem seemed to have lost none of its complexity. For thirty years it has divided the good people of this Union. There is not in this Chamber to-day a Senator called Democratic from all the New England States nor a Senator called Republican from all the Gulf States. In England, I believe, you find Liberal and Conservative members of Parliament interspersed throughout the country. We find similar conditions in France and other representative Governments. It is only here that we constantly witness this bane of division upon sectional lines.

And now, when it is hoped that the race problem is likely to disappear from our politics, after all the heart bleeding it has produced, let us ponder long before we set in motion a train of events which may bring another puzzle of mixed races to confound us.

It is no part of wise statesmanship to settle questions before their time. When the disorders of our financial system are corrected, when a fair plan of taxation is insured to the people, the power of unlawful combination disciplined, our population enhanced, our vast undeveloped territory well settled, it will be time enough to search out new fields for the beneficent application of American principles.

But the duty of to-day seems to me clear. We have at home "wrongs which need resistance." We have have at home "rights which lack assistance." We have at home "a good that we may do." That work now demands all our time, all our treasure, and all our capacity.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, in submitting what few remarks I intend to make on this question I propose to discuss it from a point entirely of international law. I will first take up the resolutions.

The first resolution is a declaration of an opinion that a state of public war exists in Cuba. The second is, that we believe the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba is the proper thing to do, and that the United States should use its good offices and friendly influences to that end. The third is, that on account of our nearness to Cuba and the necessary commercial relations we have with that island, we should be prepared to intervene in its affairs whenever we think it necessary.

Mr. President, if anything would convince the Senate and the country at large that this is not that branch of Government which should undertake to pass upon the question of belligerency, it is the character of the evidence adduced to establish it. There have been charges—most of them very ancient—of the most repulsive cruelty. They have been denied. Cuban sympathizers give highly colored and exaggerated statements of the power and prowess of the insurgents. Spanish officials vehemently deny the truth of these statements.

Blood-curdling and horrid cruelties, nearly a generation old, not coming as authoritative evidence, are paraded before the Senate, with all the trappings of a sensational tragedy, to show the present condition of affairs.

Mr. President, all of the matters relating to the past cruelty of General Weyler, the atrocities that characterized the war originating in that country in 1868 and lasting until 1878, are utterly extraneous and foreign to any intelligent discussion of this question.

We have highly colored pictures of the war that is being carried on in Cuba to-day. We have what upon their face would appear to be pure fancy sketches of great atrocities; of great battles, and of the seat of a great government being found in the jungles of the Island of Cuba. The description given by a newspaper correspondent of his visit to the camp of the President of the Cuban Republic, Mr. Cisneros, almost transcends in romantic power the descriptions of the Arabian Nights themselves. He describes the seat of government as being located in the midst of a dense forest, almost unapproachable, the capital buildings built of poles with a roof of leaves or straw, or something of that sort, over them.

Mr. President, the question of belligerency is cognate and closely allied to the question of independence. They are both facts, and in our international dealings with these questions we must consider them as facts to be sustained by that sort of evidence and testimony which will establish the truth of any other fact.

I ask the Senate and I ask Senators whether we have any proof to establish belligerency in the sense of international law? We have common rumor to show that a state of hostilities exists in Cuba. That is a current fact. Have we any proof whatever to show the character, the size, or the strength and the operations of the insurgent and Spanish armies except loose newspaper reports, upon which no man would found a judgment or a conclusion? I challenge the Senators who undertake to say that there is a state of belligerency in Cuba to point to the competent and sufficient evidence upon which they make that statement.

Mr. President, what are the vehicles of communication between the United States and foreign States? How do we know what transpires in a foreign State with any degree of certainty or accuracy? Are we to rely upon highly colored newspaper statements? Are we to rely upon statements of partisans and superheated zealots? Sir, we are to rely upon the information carefully gathered in a foreign country by our accredited agents, our ministers and consuls resident in that country. If there is any other means of establishing with that degree of certainty which the status of belligerence requires, I am unaware of it.

The adherents of one side make statements which, upon their face, are subject to suspicion. The adherents of the other side make counter statements equally suspicious.

When we deal with facts we must perforce deal with them according to the recognized method of sustaining or overthrowing them. We must have competent witnesses. They must be in a matter of this sort at least credible witnesses. They must be in a position to know whereof they speak. I want to know whether the Senate of the United States will deliberately undertake to make a solemn declaration of belligerence between the contending factions in an insurgent country upon such statements and upon such evidence as we have been treated with in the Senate. Not one single scintilla of proof accompanies the original report of the Foreign Relations Committee, of which I am aware, establishing the fact of belligerence; and since that period we have been treated with extracts from the Encyclopedia Americana, showing the enormous extent of the atrocities in Cuba twenty-five years ago. We have been treated with extracts from a book by a Mr. Donderio or Donderis, the authenticity or truthfulness of which has been flatly contradicted or denied. And outside of those statements and others germane to them we have nothing here to show such an important, such a momentous, fact as that of belligerence between two contending forces in the Island of Cuba. All this has been done on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I believe that the question of recognizing belligerence must reside exclusively with the executive branch of the Government. It is admitted and conceded that the power to recognize independence, a cognate power, belongs to the Executive. There may be cases where a treaty can be made with a de facto government between the President of the United States and the representatives of that Government, and ratified by the Senate, as the Constitution requires; but preliminary to any such treaty is the recognition of the ambassadors or ministers of the de facto government with whom we treat; and that is primarily and exclusively an Executive function. The Constitution of the United States, in the second part of section 2, provides that the President shall appoint all ambassadors; he shall make treaties. He nominates and appoints ambassadors and the Senate ratifies or confirms the appointment. So with treaties. Now, if you can imagine a case where the recognition of a de facto government can be made through the form of a treaty, then you have the coordinate jurisdiction and coordinate power of the executive branch and a part of the legislative branch in recognizing a de facto government.

Mr. President, to follow out this idea, and I will quote some authorities afterwards, if the recognition of a de facto government is a pure matter of fact (we have nothing to do with the de jure character of the government), and if the Executive has the initial power to recognize a de facto government even by way of a treaty, and as a state of belligerence is another question of fact, it appears to follow, by a chain of reasoning which I think to be irresistible, that the President of the United States, the executive branch of the Government, is the sole power with whom is lodged the power to recognize belligerence.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question:

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. This touches upon a very vital constitutional question. The Senator from Louisiana asserts a very dangerous doctrine, in my judgment, one that can not be sustained by any process of reasoning, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] asserted the same thing in substance to-day, when he says that the power to recognize the belligerency of another nation or people is exclusively an executive power. I should like to ask the Senator to be kind enough to cite the authority, if he has it, upon which he bases that conclusion.

Mr. CAFFERY. I stated to the Senate that the power to recognize a de facto government, in my opinion, and it is also supported by abundant authority, is lodged exclusively with the executive branch of the Government; that it being conceded that he could exercise the greater power, and the less power being one of a cognate character closely allied to that of independence, I deduced the conclusion that the power to recognize belligerency belongs exclusively to the executive department.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Louisiana, as I said, is talking upon a very important question. Let it be conceded that authority may be found in international law applicable to the case of a kingdom or an empire, where the power of the executive is undoubted; but has the Senator any authority applicable to a government like ours, where the governing power rests in three coordinate departments, which would lead him to believe that this high power is exclusively in the executive department?

Mr. CAFFERY. I know of no instance of a government like ours with three or less coordinate branches of the government that has a specific provision in that regard. But I contend that the Executive is the organ by and through which we have our international and foreign intercourse and dealings. He appoints ambassadors, and by an implication irresistible, he receives them, although there is no definite provision in the Constitution allowing him to receive ambassadors. He appoints and receives ambassadors. He can receive an ambassador from a de facto government, and thereby recognize it, and that recognition is full and ample. If recognition is made by and through the instrumentality of a treaty, the only way I know of where the concurrence of another branch of the Government could intervene, the primary step, the initial proceeding for that treaty, is an Executive act recognizing the embassy from a foreign country. I reason thus: That in all civilized governments of which I have any knowledge the executive branch of the government is that branch which controls and directs and has the administration of foreign affairs; further, that the Constitution, by granting power to the Executive to make treaties and appoint ambassadors, ministers, and consuls, necessarily clothes him with the control and administration of foreign affairs; that the usual and ordinary exercise of foreign jurisdiction is the reception and recognition of foreign ambassadors and other representatives; that the usual mode of recognizing the independence of a state is by recognition of its representatives, which is solely an Executive power and function.

I argue that if the question of belligerence, which is a pure question of fact, depends for its solution on facts, and as the Executive is the sole respository of those facts which are sufficient and competent for governmental action, I conclude, therefore, that the President of the United States is the sole power indicated by the Constitution to recognize belligerence.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me again?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose as a matter of fact that this nation were engaged in open war with another nation and that the President by any means should come to the conclusion that he would receive an ambassador or a minister from the nation with which we were engaged in war, would that fact result in the conclusion of peace ipso facto, or would it not rather be a usurpation by the Chief Executive of the constitutional power of Congress to declare war and conclude peace?

Mr. CAFFERY. The constitutional power of the President to entertain ministers and make treaties is also conceded. Now, if the ambassador were permitted by the President of the United States to enter his official circle to hold official intercourse with him for other than a declaration of peace, I think he could entertain him.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana in this connection if the President as Commander in Chief of the Army would not have a perfect right to conclude an armistice or truce with a country with which we were at war and to suspend hostilities and to receive any kind of diplomatic or other agent from the enemy?

Mr. CAFFERY. Clearly so.

Mr. HOAR. Leaving the ultimate declaration of peace to Congress?

Mr. CAFFERY. Clearly so.

Mr. ALLEN. Could the President conclude peace with a country with which we were at war?

Mr. CAFFERY. The power to conclude peace is a specific power granted to Congress. The President can not solely make peace.

Mr. ALLEN. Would not that embrace——

Mr. CAFFERY. The power to declare war and conclude peace is a Congressional power.

Mr. ALLEN. Would not that embrace the lesser power to make an armistice?

Mr. CAFFERY. I think not. I think the President as Commander in Chief of our forces could entertain an embassy or a proposition for an armistice submitted by envoys from a power with which we were at war. An armistice is recognized among civilized nations as a proper appendage of war. It grows out of war; it is an incident of war; and therefore the power of the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army would extend to all incidents of war. The case put by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is one of those incidents, and therefore comes within his power as Commander in Chief of the Army.

Mr. WHITE. I ask the Senator from Louisiana, with his permission, in view of the question addressed to him a moment ago by the Senator from Nebraska, who asked whether there was any authority for the recognition of belligerency by the President alone, whether the numerous instances cited by Mr. Wharton in section 71 of his Digest, with which I know the Senator is familar, do not contain such declarations?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes. sir.

Mr. WHITE. And whether it is not also true that in the Prize Cases the Supreme Court of the United States held that Mr. Lincoln recognized the belligerency of the Southern Confederacy even without intending it?

Mr. CAFFERY. By proclamation of blockade?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. CAFFERY. That is true. Of course that fortifies the reasoning. Judge Grier in the Prize Cases decided that the President of the United States unwittingly recognized the belligerence of the Southern Confederacy by a proclamation of blockade, thereby stating that he could do it not only directly but indirectly.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator from Louisiana will allow me to make one remark?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to say that Mr. Lincoln did not do it unwittingly. He did it deliberately.

Mr. CAFFERY. I am glad to be corrected. This shows that Mr. Lincoln understood he had the exclusive power to recognize domestic belligerence.

Judge Story was a very accomplished international lawyer. He was one of the most accomplished and profound judges whom we ever had upon the Supreme Bench. He says, in regard to the question of the recognition of the independence of a country:

The Constitution has expressly invested the Executive with power to receive ambassadors and other ministers. It has not expressly invested Congress with the power either to repudiate or acknowledge them. At all events, in the case of a revolution or dismemberment of a nation, the judiciary can not take notice of any new government or sovereignty until it has been duly recognized by some other department of the Government to whom the power is constitutionally confided.

SEC. 1567. That a power so extensive in its reach over our foreign relations could not be properly conferred on any other than the executive department will admit of little doubt. That it should be exclusively confided to that department without any participation of the Senate in the functions (that body being conjointly intrusted with the treaty-making power) is not so obvious.

From the international law digest of Mr. Wharton, volume 1, section 71, I quote Mr. Seward:

The question of recognition of foreign revolutionary or reactionary government is one exclusively for the Executive, and can not be determined internationally by Congressional action.

Mr. President, there are some resolutions which have been at different times introduced into the two Houses of Congress in regard to the question of the recognition of independence, and they are very carefully drawn. They all seem to acknowledge that the power of ultimate recognition rests exclusively with the Executive. I will read the resolution introduced in the House of Representatives at the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, July, 1836, page 1218 of the Journal. It reads thus:

By Mr. Mason, for the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power.

The second resolution, which I will not read, simply states that the House views with satisfaction the efforts of the President to get that information.

Here is a resolution introduced by Mr. Clay in the House:

[Second session, Sixteenth Congress, Annals, page 1082, February 10, 1821. By Mr. Clay.]

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence, and that it will give its constitutional support to the President of the United States whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of said provinces.

Here is another one in regard to the independence of the United States of Colombia:

[First session, Seventeenth Congress, January 31, 1822, page 854, Annals. By Mr. Trimble, in the House.]

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to acknowledge the independence of the Republic of Colombia, and by an interchange of accredited ministers place the political relations of that Government with the United States on an equal footing with those of all other independent nations.

And be it further resolved, That such of the Spanish provinces in South America as have established and are maintaining their independence of Spain ought in like manner to be acknowledged by the United States as free, sovereign, and independent Governments.

There was a decision referred to which I have before me. I think it was slightly inaccurately quoted by the present incumbent of the chair, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON]. It is the case of Kennett vs. Chambers. I think the language of that case is somewhat different from that quoted by the distinguished Senator from Texas. Chief Justice Taney in rendering the decision in this case said:

It is not necessary, in the case before us, to decide how far the judicial tribunals of the United States would enforce a contract like this when two States, acknowledged to be independent, were at war and this country neutral. It is a sufficient answer to the argument to say that the question whether Texas had or had not at that time become an independent State was a question for that department of our Government exclusively which is charged with our foreign relations.

That department which is charged with our foreign relations exclusively is the executive department. The only participation whatever of any other branch of the Government in the exercise of any power relating to our intercourse with foreign countries is the power of the Senate to ratify treaties and to confirm the appointment of ambassadors and other ministers. In so far as the recognition of the independence or belligerency is concerned, it occurs to me to be quite clear that if it is once established that the power to recognize independence resides exclusively in the executive branch of the Government it must perforce, a fortiori, reside in that department to recognize belligerency.

It would seem to follow from a chain of reasoning that is irresistible. Mr. President, is not the spectacle presented in this debate sufficient to convince us that that power must reside with the Executive? Is not the spectacle presented in this debate of evidence thirty years old brought to bear upon this question of the present, and having no sort of reference to the question before us, our judgment deliberately sought to be concluded by evidence that would establish nothing, sufficient to convince us that that department of Government exclusively, outside of any influence of the passions or excitement of the moment, is the branch to recognize belligerency?

I have been led somewhat in my former remarks and in answer to questions that have been propounded to me to discuss the character of testimony to establish belligerency and to the law under which we act. It matters not what may be our sympathy for any people struggling for liberty as long as we are bound by this code of international law, consecrated by the wisdom of ages; that law which softens the asperities of war and mitigates its horrors. There is no other law—not even the sublime law, the elevated law of humanity—that can be invoked as having the potency of guiding our official judgment as to a matter of fact.

I listened with great pleasure to the eloquent speech of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] on this subject. He is moved in common with the vast mass of the population of this country to sympathize with the Cubans. But are we to determine this question upon mere matters of sympathy or are we to determine it upon the language and the spirit of the international code? If we are to run a propaganda of humanity and Christianity all well and good; let us discard these laws; let us put aside such writers as Vattel, Grotius, Wharton, Wheaton, Pomeroy, Hare, Woolsey, and Dana; let us put aside the common practice of civilized nations, and let us go out upon an expedition to relieve the oppressed of all nations upon the high grounds of humanity, or religion, or some other sublimated ground. But we must cling to this law or we shall be outlawed from the circle of civilized nations.

In the argument of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] I submitted to him the application of the doctrine of belligerency, or the doctrine of the recognition of belligerency as taken from Mr. Pomeroy. Mr. Pomeroy limits and qualifies to a great extent the definition of belligerency as laid down by Mr. Dana, as laid down by Mr. Hall, as laid down by other international writers. Mr. Dana's definition of belligerency would embrace the whole of the insurgent territory as occupied and held by the successful insurrectionary forces. Mr. Pomeroy limits the occupation to certain well-defined territory, to a most considerable portion of the territory where the insurgent forces are warring, and he says it is indispensable that the power of the mother country shall be expelled from the country in insurrection and the country be held by the insurrectionary troops. There must be an organized government, capable of fulfilling all the functions of government, and the war must be carried on according to the rules of civilized warfare.

Apply these tests to the case of Cuba. Can any Senator say, first, that there is an organized government capable of fulfilling all the functions of government? Can he say, second, that there is any definite, well-defined portion of the territory of Cuba held positively, held exclusively, by the insurgent troops? If any Senator can say so, I do not know where the evidence is upon which he predicates that statement. It is not before us. There are loose statements in regard to the power of the insurrectionary forces. One day we hear of a terrific engagement at one point. They fight for five hours in an open field; they start off with a regiment of a thousand men, and before the contest is over in the flanks and on the rear there are two or three other regiments, and there are two or three men killed. But we do know from the reports of our consular agents that war is not carried on in the island of Cuba according to the rules of civilized warfare on the part of the insurgents. There is indiscriminate destruction of the property of that island. Rapine, fire, and sword appear to be sweeping that island with the besom of destruction, not by the Spaniards, but by the insurgents.

Mr. DANIEL. Why do not the Spaniards stop it?

Mr. CAFFERY. That question was successfully answered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] when he asked why we did not put down the Seminole Indians in the Everglades of Florida. The Island of Cuba, according even to these consular reports, is the ideal country of guerrilla warfare. It is a long island with but slight width. I believe it is stated, though I am not certain about it, that the broadest portion of it is only about 50 miles wide. Upon one end of it, at Pinar del Rio, I think the width is about 25 miles. The island is 750 miles long. The settlements, the plantations, are along the seaboard, on either coast of the island. In the middle of it is a ridge of mountains, and those mountains are filled with inaccessible jungles and swamps. Therefore, a man, even with as little military knowledge as I have, which is but a trifle, knows that a country possessing such peculiar physical aspects and conformation is the ideal country in which to wage a guerrilla warfare.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Necessarily I was absent in the early part of this debate, so I have not had the advantage the Senator has had; but has anybody mentioned in the debate the name of a single town held by the insurgents?

Mr. CAFFERY. Not one. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that that is one of the conditions that Mr. Dana in his note to Wharton lays down as essential to the acknowledgment of belligerency, and so have all the international law writers whom I have consulted. They make the statement that where war is isolated in the interior, and where the conflicting interests are not dangerous to the commerce of a country, there is very little place for the recognition of belligerency. It is only when the insurgents have their cruisers and steamers upon the ocean where questions arise that might make it necessary for the state having commerce with the insurgents to recognize their belligerency.

I have here a statement that I have gathered from the consular reports as to the commencement of this insurrection. Here is a letter from Mr. Hyatt to Mr. Uhl. Mr. Hyatt appears to be in sympathy with the insurgents, as every patriotic man will be, if they are really trying to effect their independence and are really deserving of it:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Santiago de Cuba, March 1, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that last evening I cabled you "Province under martial law," which I now confirm.

On the 27th ultimo the governor-general of the island issued a decree, copy inclosed being extract from official bulletin, declaring this province in a state of war, giving the military authorities control of all matters appertaining to public order, and giving insurgents eight days to present themselves and be exempt from punishment.

I will skip part of it and go on to his statements. He says:

There have been a number of scrimmages with troops in the province, and several on both sides killed and wounded. The insurgent element so far is confined mostly to the negro population, which predominates. The whites and property owners hope that the reforms promised by the Government will be put into effect and that the movement will be suppressed before much property is destroyed and lives lost.

So, early in March, 1895, this insurrection occurring in the month previous, there is a statement that the property owners and the whites of that island had not up to that date joined in this movement, and that it is confined mostly to negroes, which predominate in that island.

Mr. PLATT. What is the date of the letter from which the Senator is reading?

Mr. CAFFERY. March 1, 1895.

Mr. GIBSON. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. CAFFERY. I am reading from the consular reports obtained from the Department of State by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I will read the letter of Mr. Barker to Mr. Uhl, of April 4, 1895, just a month and four days after the letter I have just read:

COMMERCIAL AGENCY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Sagua la Grande, Cuba, April 4, 1895.

SIR: In view of the sensational and contradictory reports sent out from this island regarding the uprising here, it may not be improper that I give the Department my impressions of the true status of affairs, based on a close intimacy with those whose opinions should be considered of value.

An important and significant fact in the present disturbance is that the movement has not received the countenance or sympathy of any political party in Cuba, which, if continued, must render the effort being made a failure. That an uprising was intended there is not a shadow of doubt, as is shown by the large number of arms found concealed at various points on the island. But it is also evident that the movement was precipitated, the more rational and sober-thinking men of the party recognizing the fact that the time for striking the decisive blow had not yet arrived; but the hot-headed element, seeing in the promised reforms to the island a comparative prosperity and consequently a death blow to their aspirations for independence, precipitated the movement, trusting that continuous successes before the finishing of the crop would bring to their aid those who were lukewarm.

Mr. President, this first letter states that this uprising was comparatively insignificant; that it had not been acceded to or joined in by any portion of the white population; that it was being urged on and participated in by the negroes. I make no reflection on that; I state merely the fact as stated by this consular agent.

As a matter of course these gentlemen are selected to represent the United States in these colonial provinces with reference to their ability and competency, and the presumption is that they are fully informed of the facts which they tell us, and are competent to form a complete judgment. Mr. Barker states that this uprising had not, up to the 4th of April, 1895, received the support of any political party in Cuba, and that for fear the promised reforms, the promises made by the Spanish Government in pursuance, I suppose, of the treaty of capitulation between Martinez Campos and the insurgents in 1878—a dread that the Spanish Government would yield these reforms—the hot-headed undertook to precipitate a revolution, thinking that if these reforms were given there would be no revolution.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator from Louisiana will permit me to interrupt him, he does not read all of the letter of Mr. Barker.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will read any part of the letter which the Senator thinks may be of use to him, for I want to be perfectly fair. I do not wish to suppress any part of the testimony.

Mr. DANIEL. I know that. The consular agent is speaking of a condition which existed nearly a year ago. He also says:

It is safe to say that there are at present large bodies of insurgents, under arms, in the jurisdiction of Santiago de Cuba. Spain must have to meet these twice their number, as the country is an ideal one in which to harass regular troops, who are not familiar with the country.

The communication then goes on to describe the then existing condition of affairs.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir; I did not mean to suppress that.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no idea that the Senator wishes to suppress anything.

Mr. CAFFERY. That escaped me. The commercial agent says:

It is safe to say that there are at present large bodies of insurgents, under arms, in the jurisdiction of Santiago de Cuba—

If the Senator will read these reports carefully, he will see that the uprising started in the Province of Santiago de Cuba—

Spain must have to meet these twice their number, as the country is an ideal one in which to harass regular troops, who are not familiar with the country.

Another important factor to be considered is the ravages that will be made among the Spanish soldiers during the summer months by yellow fever, which will far exceed their losses in action.

Mr. President, I have looked over these reports, and I have read what I think is the most important portion of them so far as relates to this discussion. Subsequently, however, to this date—some of them run up as far as December, 1895—there are reports of larger bodies of insurgents. There is one report which states the supposed number of men enlisted in the insurgent army to be 40,000. There are constant statements in these letters of accessions to the Spanish troops from Spain by new arrivals; but nowhere in these reports is it stated that the Spanish army is composed of exactly so many men. So we are left in some doubt, or, in fact, we are left without any evidence whatever to show the exact number or the approximate number of the Spanish forces in that country.

Mr. President, I can not, even if this body had the power, which I deny, to recognize belligerence, conscientiously, in the discharge of this important and most delicate function, vote that there is a condition of public war in Cuba. It matters not to me, Mr. President, whether this concurrent resolution has no force or not—that it has no force goes without saying—if this belligerence is a matter of fact, and I am called on to decide the fact to exist, I halt immediately at the threshold and say that your testimony does not justify the conclusion you have reached. What have we to do in this very great and dignified body in regard to issuing pronunciamentoes? Are we concerned with expressions of opinion which bind nobody, which have no weight, except for mischief? Everybody knows that the popular mind is excited; everybody who is at all conversant with the ease with which popular enthusiasm may be molded into thunderbolts of war knows the danger of the two Houses of Congress deliberately expressing an opinion that a state of public war exists in Cuba.

I do not undertake to say that this resolution will be a mere brutum fulmen as respects its moral effect, but I do undertake to say that it will be a mere brutum fulmen as respects its legal effect, and I am not willing, charged with the responsibility of voting upon all questions under our own Constitution and under that code of international law which controls the action and binds the conscience in foreign matters, to say that a certain state of affairs exists which does not exist.

Mr. PALMER. As the Senator from Louisiana will not conclude before the hour of adjournment, will he yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CAFFERY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PALMER. I merely wish to announce that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana I desire to address the Senate on the pending conference report.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 377) for the relief of George W. Harbaugh;

A bill (H. R. 1743) for the relief of the widow of Thomas L. Young;

A bill (H. R. 2451) to correct the records of the War Department in the case of Capt. Henry S. Pratt;

A bill (H. R. 2735) for the relief of Enoch Davis;

A bill (H. R. 3582) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Henry H. Bailey; and

A bill (H. R. 5914) to amend an act to authorize the Interoceanic Railway Company to construct and operate railway, telegraph, and telephone lines through the Indian Territory.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 1816) for the relief of Michael Ryan; and

A bill (H. R. 5229) for the relief of George H. Lott.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HARRIS. This morning the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, presented a resolution which changed the name of two or three committees, and formed standing committees of some select committees; after which, in conference with the financial clerk, the fact appeared that the clerks of those committees are not provided for, and under the resolution of this morning their salaries will cease from to-day. The Senator from Rhode Island being compelled to leave the city, requested me to present the resolution which I send to the desk to cure that defect. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee to Establish the University of the United States, the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, and the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, be, and they hereby are, authorized to employ each a clerk.

Mr. HARRIS. Each one of those committees as a select committee had a clerk, and under the resolution of this morning the clerks can not be paid, nor are they authorized to hold their positions, without the passage of this additional resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 377) for the relief of George W. Harbaugh;

A bill (H. R. 1743) for the relief of the widow of Thomas L. Young;

A bill (H. R. 2451) to correct the records of the War Department in the case of Capt. Henry S. Pratt;

A bill (H. R. 2735) for the relief of Enoch Davis; and

A bill (H. R. 3582) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Henry H. Bailey.

The bill (H. R. 5914) to amend an act to authorize the Interoceanic Railway Company to construct and operate railway, telegraph, and telephone lines through the Indian Territory was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 20, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 19, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JAMES DUKE.

Mr. OTJEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 572) for the relief of James Duke.

The bill was read.

Mr. PITNEY. I should like to hear the report.

The report was read in part, when

Mr. PITNEY said: I waive the further reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUD. I should like to hear some explanation. It seems plain that this man deserted and afterwards reenlisted. How much bounty did he get when he reenlisted?

Mr. OTJEN. He did not get any. This man obtained leave of absence for twenty-four hours to visit the Seventeenth Wisconsin Regiment. Before the expiration of his twenty-four hours' leave the steamer to which he belonged went away down the Mississippi. As soon as he found that the steamer was gone he reported to Major McCauly, of the Seventeenth Wisconsin. Major McCauly took him to General McPherson, who advised him to wait until the steamer should return. But the steamer was soon afterwards blown up. As soon as Admiral Porter came there with his vessel this man went aboard and reenlisted. He told his story to the Admiral, who told him he was all right. The man served two years after that.

Mr. LOUD. That seems to be a very good story, but while it may appear to be very plausible at the present time, it can not be a true story, because I do not think any officer of the United States Navy would have allowed a man to reenlist when he was known to be a deserter. I shall object.

PATRICK RAINEY.

Mr. CROWTHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2328) for the relief of Patrick Rainey.

The bill and report were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to ask whether this bill has received consideration at any Friday night meeting?

Mr. CROWTHER. It has not.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then I object.

WITHDRAWAL OF A REPORT.

Mr. HANLY. A report which I filed (Report No. 288) contains, as I have since discovered, some inaccuracies of fact. I should like permission to withdraw the report for correction.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 2176) granting a pension to Thomas Pollock—to the Committee on Pensions.

AMBASSADOR BAYARD.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the resolutions from the Committee on Foreign Affairs which were under consideration yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] asks unanimous consent that the House resume the unfinished business of yesterday. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITT. Gentlemen opposing these resolutions have consumed thus far the greater part of the time. The arrangement is that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], a member of the committee, shall now address the House.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. Speaker, no one, I believe, disputes the fact that the President of the United States is the only authority having jurisdiction over Ambassador Bayard. But this fact does not carry with it the proposition advocated by our Democratic friends, that the House has no power and no right under the Constitution to express its sentiments in regard to the conduct of a diplomatic official. We are challenged to produce a precedent for the resolution pending before the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of congratulation that never before in the diplomatic history of the country has a similar instance occurred where a representative violated his duty and the Executive failed to reprimand. This is a part of our history, of which Republicans and Democrats alike should feel proud. It is a source of deep regret on this side of the House that we are compelled to take cognizance of a flagrant breach of diplomatic duty, and are forced now to make a precedent for all time to come.

Democrats say that they would not vote to censure a Republican ambassador were the conditions of this case reversed. They are perfectly safe, Mr. Speaker, in making that statement. They feel morally certain that no Republican diplomatic representative would ever so far forget himself and his duty as to indulge in indiscreet public utterances on home politics. A Republican diplomat drops his politics the moment he crosses the boundary line. He represents his entire country.

The complaint against Mr. Bayard is not that he is a free trader in home politics, but that, as an ambassador of the whole American people, he took his home politics with him to a foreign country and exploited them before a foreign audience. Under the unwritten law of the land Mr. Bayard, as the American representative, was invited to deliver an address before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution. He accepted the invitation; and this privilege, a privilege secured solely by his official position, he abused by attacking a great political party in his own country. I say a political party because protection is the foundation principle of the Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

To criticise an American ambassador is a most ungracious duty. The American people prefer to relieve their foreign representatives of all criticisms whatsoever, especially of a partisan character, to the end that those representatives may feel secure in the undivided support of their own countrymen. When an ambassador, however, abandons his nonpartisan character, he not only embarrasses the Executive, but also invites the widest range of criticism upon all of his personal acts. If Mr. Bayard fails to see anything reprehensible in those acts, which are almost universally recognized by his countrymen as manifest violations of diplomatic etiquette, diplomatic duty, and diplomatic honor, it must be because old age is mellowing those mental faculties which several years ago dictated stringent rules for the government of the diplomatic service, and which were so keen to dispose of Lord Sackville-West for a comparatively trivial offense.

In censuring Mr. Bayard, the Republican party do not seek to weaken the strong natural bonds existing between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race, but rather to repudiate the idea that those bonds can be strengthened by casting the slightest taint on the "kin beyond sea."

But, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bayard, and his friends desire that all parts of his address shall be construed in their relations to each other. How can this be done when he himself neglects to do so? Following the extract from the Edinburgh speech quoted in the preamble of the resolution, Mr. Bayard says:

Under its dictation—

He is speaking now of the principle of protection—individual enterprise and independence have been oppressed and the energy of discovery and invention debilitated and discouraged.

What more damaging statement than this could be made, Mr. Speaker, in a country where the young man looks to our Republic as a refuge which will afford him the best opportunities for the development of his individual powers and for the success of his individual enterprise? Mr. Bayard himself virtually contradicts this in another part of his address, which I will read, in which he says:

You will, I believe, agree with me in holding the rapid growth and development of the United States to be the most remarkable page in the history of civilized mankind. * * *

This marvelous progress can only be adequately accounted for by the freedom permitted to the units of that population, to each individual citizen, without surrender of conscience, to enjoy the admitted right to accomplish his own manhood, to be fully himself; to select the suitable occupation for which instinctively he felt himself to be competent, and upon which he embarked with the energy born of hope and confidence.

As this rapid growth and development of the United States especially took place between the years 1865 and 1892, it is difficult to see what excuse Mr. Bayard has for saying in one part of his address that protection had oppressed individual independence, and in another part that the unlimited enjoyment of individual freedom had caused the rapid growth and development of the United States during a period when protection was our national economic policy. Mr. Bayard ought to edit his address more carefully and make all parts harmonious.

It is further urged, by way of extenuation and defense, that this address is especially admirable on account of its literary merits. Standards of literary merit vary greatly, but I venture to assert that a vast majority of those who have read this address, and of those who have attempted to read it, will join issue at once upon that point. It was an unfortunate custom which forced Mr. Bayard upon a literary platform in quasi competition with Mr. Lowell and Mr. Phelps.

Mr. Lowell's address on Democracy was a masterpiece of literary workmanship; Mr. Phelps's speech on the Law of the Land was a splendid specimen of clear and cogent reasoning; Mr. Bayard's essay on Individual Freedom will be remembered chiefly for its stilted pedantry and pompous verbosity. The Magna Charta, the Declaration of Independence, and the Federalist are all papers of mighty import to the human race; but they serve sometimes as prolific sources of ostentatious, philosophical observation when a pedantic essayist strives for profundity of thought on constitutional questions. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

We have been taught to believe that the individual in this country has a larger range of freedom than in any other country on the habitable globe. Our self-esteem as a nation is slightly shocked when our ambassador in effect insists that Anglo-Saxon civilization nurtures and develops individual freedom equally well everywhere, without particular reference to the form of government. Undoubtedly the proprieties of the occasion required our ambassador to maintain that the individual freedom of the Englishman was as great as that of the American, but in maintaining this what right had he, in singling out his own people, to say:

In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled protection?

And then follow allegations and statements which ought to cause a blush of shame to any American foreign representative publicly uttering them in a foreign country.

In view of the fact that this House of the Fifty-fourth Congress, with its remarkable Republican majority, succeeded to the House of the Fifty-third Congress, with its remarkable Democratic majority, Mr. Bayard condescends to divide the membership of this House into two classes, the "jobbers and chafferers," who are protectionists and Republicans, and the "statesmen," who are free traders and Democrats. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Every dollar of the salary which Mr. Bayard will draw during the coming year ought to sink deep into his tender conscience because the dominant party of "jobbers and chafferers" controlling the legislation in this House passed that amount to his credit in the diplomatic appropriation bill.

He closes this part of his address by making the astonishing allegation that in this country, under the influence of protection, "personal liberty ceases to be the great end of the Government." What a monstrous libel upon his own Republic! And yet this is said to be a mere discussion of an economic theory upon an academic platform.

It was the arraignment of his own country before the assembled culture of Scotland. It was a proclamation to Great Britain that in the United States, where protection prevailed, personal liberty had ceased to be the great end of the Government. To be the more effective, and therefore the more censurable, such an arraignment must be upon an academic platform.

If Mr. Bayard, in yielding to the gentle and subtle influences of old age, had circulated his ideas in the drawing rooms of aristocratic London, little or no attention would have been paid to him; but our ambassador proclaimed them upon the platform of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, a society composed of learned men, who give tone to public sentiment. For that reason he should be held to a strict accountability for his statements.

Contrast, if you please, the undiplomatic and derogatory criticism of his own country with the high encomium of Scotland with which he closes his address. The conviction is forced upon one that he is willing to secure a little personal popularity by violating the most obvious rules governing the conduct of diplomats the world over.

When an ambassador of the United States has reached the point where he is willing to secure personal approbation at the expense of the dignity of his own country, and when his self-importance has become so expanded as not to permit him to recognize that his own position, strength, and influence in a foreign land depend upon the support of a united, dignified, and proud nation, it is high time that this House, in reflecting public sentiment, should, by resolution of censure, command him to maintain the dignity of his own country and to subordinate his personality to the interests and the good name of the entire American people. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House and, in so far as it takes an interest in a matter of this sort, the country to some references made yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] from which, in my judgment, an unfair inference is likely to be drawn against the memory of a man whose great public service to the country in time of war and in time of peace, as well as his distinguished American character, deserve better treatment at the hands of the Congress of the United States.

I refer to the attack, which was only inferential, and therefore the more insidious and the more damaging, made upon the character and career of General Schenck while the minister of this country at the Court of St. James. What the particular purpose of the gentleman was I do not know. The matter was not germane to any question pending before this House. It was wholly extraneous—brought in here from the outside and placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for some purpose, I assume; for I do not suppose that the gentleman from Kentucky uses idle words and performs idle feats of posturing here upon a question of this character. Assuming now, in the first instance, that there was something in the career and conduct and life of General Schenck while a member of the diplomatic corps of the United States that does not conform to the high standard of morality taught and practiced by the gentleman from Kentucky, assuming that it was outside his official conduct, what has that to do with the question under consideration? We are not investigating the career of Mr. Bayard in social life in the city of London.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Do you deny anything I said about Mr. Schenck, the former minister to Great Britain?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I propose to deny that unfair inference apparently sought to be made by you.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. What was that inference?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me make my speech and you will then see.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Do you deny anything I said with reference to Mr. Schenck?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The inference was of two kinds, that there were two matters of history and two matters of record in which there was a ground of censure against him as minister abroad in some way reflecting upon the duty of Congress in the matter on this question under consideration.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The gentleman does not represent me correctly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then if he was——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. There was no inference about it. I charged that a committee of members of the House of Representatives investigated the conduct of Mr. Schenck, and on their report a resolution was adopted condemning him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I decline to yield. I decline any further interference. If the gentleman did not mean to assail the character of a dead man, if he did not intend to be a ghoul that digs about the grave of a dead man and drag him up here for some purpose, that is a matter——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I candidly stated facts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is not in order.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to know if I can be attacked without having an opportunity to defend myself?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait. He can not interrupt the gentleman without his consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no attack here. I am attacking no one. The gentleman's language is before me, and I am making this point—if he would not interrupt me—that either there was a purpose or inference to assail the memory of General Schenck or else it was idle words, nothing but words. Now, then, if I am right about that, how can the gentleman escape that proposition?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Are you willing to yield to me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want a speech.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. You spoke of me——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I decline to yield. It is not necessary; but to please the gentleman I will say that he either meant something or nothing, and he can take either horn of the dilemma.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am willing to tell you what I meant.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky knows as well as anybody in the House that he is not in order.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to respond to a question asked by the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will not persist, of course.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am not going to take time unless he gives it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have only a very brief time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not. It is not necessary. It would only be a repetition of what we heard yesterday. It could not be anything else. Now, what was it? Did he mean to assail the character of General Schenck? If so, I am here to defend him. Did he mean nothing? If so, I am here to protect the memory of General Schenck against the inference that somebody else may draw from the meaningless utterances of the gentleman from Kentucky. What is the result? In regard, first, to the Emma mine. I am aware that a report was brought in here with 800 pages in it, and I am aware of a great deal more than that. I stand here and say that the conduct of General Schenck in his relation to the Emma mine, as illustrated and made perfectly plain by the subsequent history of that transaction, leaves that distinguished American without a blot upon his record, either public or private, and time will vindicate what I say by vindicating him.

What is the highest proof of it? He became the owner of a large number of shares in that enterprise. There never was the slightest evidence that he was guilty of willful or knowing fraud, and the best evidence of his good faith was that he invested a large sum of money in that property. Now, let me tell the gentleman from Kentucky what he doubtless did not know. General Schenck was reduced to comparative poverty in the long years of his sickness after his return from Europe and his retirement from public life, and yet so strong was his faith, so conscious was he of his good faith in that matter, that until the day of his death he paid every assessment upon that stock, and it stands to-day on the books of the company in London, his property, with every dollar of assessment paid up to the hour of his death. When others sold out he stood fast and held on. And that is not all. He left behind him a very small and limited estate and three helpless daughters, proud of the record of the man whom I am vindicating, and so imbued were they with the spirit which animated their father, and so full was their knowledge of the integrity and purity of his life and purposes, that they, out of the mere bare means of support left them, have, up to this current year, paid the assessments upon that stock, and have carried it along with the hope which they inherited from their father that it would ultimately become valuable, relying always upon his declaration that it was valuable, and with the higher and better and purer hope that they would vindicate the memory and honor and integrity of their father by paying these assessments and holding on to that stock until it might become valuable. So much for the Emma mine.

I come now to the reference, the cruel reference, made by the gentleman from Kentucky to the publication of the rules of the game of poker. There is not an intelligent American on this continent who has attained the age of responsibility and can read and write but has read over and over again the full explanation made by General Schenck, the full explanation made by the lady who was concerned in the matter, and to whom I shall refer, and the full and complete vindication against any imputation of impropriety on his part, if impropriety there was, in the publication of that little pamphlet. Let me repeat briefly what there was of that affair, which is brought in here for some purpose or for no purpose. General Schenck, I believe, had some knowledge of the game of draw poker. I am abusing no confidence when I say that he told a friend of his once that he knew just enough about it to always lose his money in the game. [Laughter.]

I do not wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Kentucky is shocked that an American plays poker. [Laughter.]

The gentleman seems to stand here to rebuke the people of America who indulge in that great Western game. But there are grades and differences and degrees, and one thing I may add about General Schenck, which I have from a gentlemen who knew a great deal more about him than I ever did—that is, that he died without leaving any unpaid poker debts. [Laughter.] That is at least something. In a company at the house of a distinguished Englishman, where the game of poker had been introduced, General Schenck had talked about the rules of the game—I think he knew more about the rules than he did about the practice—and a lady, a distinguished lady, asked him to make, for her benefit, a written memorandum of the rules of the great American game.

General Schenck, in compliance with the lady's request, and for no other purpose, wrote out a few leading rules of the game of draw poker, and that lady, without his knowledge or consent, printed the little pamphlet which the gentleman from Kentucky paraded here yesterday. When General Schenck heard of it he was very much mortified—not that he was a hypocrite, for General Schenck never tried to pose before the people of the country in a rôle that he was not fitted for. [Laughter.] But he was mortified that a publication of that character should be made and his name placed upon it, because he feared the inference might be drawn that he was selling it for private gain, and he at once explained to the American people in a publication which nobody has ever contradicted, and which was confirmed by the lady concerned, the circumstances under which he had written the rules and the circumstances under which they had been published, and nobody ever in my hearing until yesterday tried to make any capital out of that matter.

General Schenck was one of the great men of the United States. He was elected to Congress as early as 1843 or 1844 from the State of Ohio. He became one of the leaders on this floor. When the war began he was at the very head of the Republican minority on the floor of this House. He was a distinguished leader and champion of Republicanism, a man who very early discovered what was the real purpose of the war of the rebellion, and he promptly entered the service. He was in the first battle of Bull Run. At the head of the First and Second Ohio Volunteers he stood there like a wall of adamant when terror and disorganization swept away, practically, the Union forces. He was at once recognized by Mr. Lincoln as a man of commanding power and influence, and he was retained in the service during the whole war. He fell almost mortally wounded at the second battle of Bull Run. He was a soldier in the Army, a soldier in battle. General Schenck was in the Eastern army, standing like a wall between this capital and the onslaught of Early's command. He won the distinction that he deserved; he became a major-general. He earned it on the battlefield, and he earned it in the councils of Lincoln, who sent for him over and over again to consult with him about important matters. So much for General Schenck so far as his military career is concerned. I will put into my speech in the RECORD a few comments of the National Cyclopedia of American Biography, which speaks very briefly of his career as a soldier.

At the outbreak of the civil war in 1861 Mr. Schenck tendered his services to the Government and was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. On June 17 he was ordered to take possession of the Loudoun and Hampshire Railroad in Virginia as far as Vienna. The general commanding, wishing to secure the road, ordered General Schenck, with one regiment, to establish guards at certain points designated along the road. The instructions were in writing and were obeyed implicitly, General Schenck accompanying the expedition. When approaching Vienna, however, with two companies of the regiment, the train was fired on by a Confederate force, 3 cars were disabled, 10 men killed, and 2 wounded. The frightened engineer on the locomotive at once uncoupled the engine, it being in the rear of the train, and returned to Alexandria. General Schenck immediately rallied his few men and recharged with such courage that the Confederates, 800 in number, withdrew under the impression that a superior force of Federals must be near. This occurrence was the occasion of very severe attacks upon the General in the Northern press, but Lieut. Gen. Winfield Scott, then the head of the United States Army, afterwards declared that he was not to be blamed, but rather to be praised for his conduct.

At the battle of Bull Run (July 21, 1861) General Schenck commanded a brigade in General Tyler's division, and it was against his orders—indeed in face of his declaration that if the officers persisted in their determination to retreat from the position which had been assigned to them, he would bring them before a court-martial—that the brigade did join in the disgraceful and needless flight to Washington on the part of the Federal forces, which became a marked feature of that day's military operations. He was next assigned to the command of a brigade in West Virginia, under General Rosecrans, and was actively and creditably engaged in the several campaigns on the Kanawha and New rivers. Ordered thence to the Shenandoah Valley for his march to the relief of General Milroy, his part in the battle, and the subsequent retreat, he had the satisfaction of knowing that his departmental commander, General McDowell, pronounced these achievements the most brilliant which had thus far marked the campaigns in that region. At the battle of Cross Keys (June 7, 1862) the fighting by Schenck's brigade was sharp, protracted, and effective, the enemy falling back in confusion. When the left wing of the Federal forces gave way, however, that brigade, with the troops commanded by Generals Milroy and Cluseret, were ordered to fall back to the strong position which they had occupied before the battle, and did so in good order. When General Fremont (commanding the department) was relieved of his command, he turned it over to General Schenck, who during the necessary absence of General Sigel, had command of the First Corps of the Army of Virginia.

At the second battle of Bull Run (August 28, 29, 30, 1862) he was severely wounded in the wrist, and was carried from the field, but not until his insistence that the sword which had been knocked from his hand should be found and taken with him to the hospital was complied with. It was not until December 11 of that year that he was able to again take service, and he was then assigned to the command of the Middle Department, Eighth Army Corps, with headquarters at Baltimore, Md. Here his administration was marked by his well-known executive ability, firmness, and determination. But at this juncture it was felt that his personality and powers and experience could be used by his country to greater advantage in her civil councils than in her military activities, and therefore, on December 5, 1863, he resigned his commission in the Army to take again his place in the lower House of Congress, to which he had been elected from the Third Ohio Congressional district. Upon resuming the seat which had been his a dozen years before, he was appointed by the Speaker chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

It has been well said by Mr. Whitelaw Reid, that "a history of his career in the Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, and Fortieth Congresses, for he was renominated and chosen by his party without opposition at each election, would be a complete history of the military history of the country through the most eventful years of the war, and after its close, and a comprehensive account of the whole cause of public affairs in Congress during that period. He resumed his position as one of the leaders of his party, and no man in Congress seemed so much actuated, not merely by the general ideas of radical Republicanism, but especially and conspicuously by a fervid hatred of Confederates and of the Confederacy." His ferocious party onslaught upon Fernando Wood, of New York City, a member of the House generally credited with secession sympathies, exhibits the man in his marked characteristics. Mr. Wood had closed a defense of Mr. Long of Ohio, whom it was proposed to expel from the House for peculiarly obnoxious conduct. General Schenck rose to reply, and said: "A student on natural history would have much to learn on this floor. Some specimens of the snake family are so slippery that it seems impossible to classify them or to hold them to any position. I find myself at a great loss to understand what grounds are occupied by the member from New York who has just taken his seat. * * *

"Being neither against the war nor for the war, he would send commissioners to Richmond to treat with those arrayed in arms against the country, to offer them terms of peace. How many others on his side of the House may agree with him I know not. But I do know this: Whenever any such propositions of Northern Democrats have appeared in print, their offers or suggestions of peace have invariably been received by the rebels at Richmond with scoffing, and repelled with scorn. The member and his friends, then, are willing and propose to crawl on their bellies to the feet of rebels and insurgents in arms, and looking up piteously to say, 'Oh, our masters, notwithstanding all your scoffing and scorn, though you may spurn us from your presence, we implore you to say whether you will not graciously agree to make some terms with us.' I can not comprehend this abasement in any other way. Thank God! I belong to no such party as that. For the sake of manhood and humanity I would not trust too far those who do. * * * He (Wood) would propose terms of peace, and that peace he would offer to those who scorn him. But still he would press upon them his good offices. He sings the siren's song of peace for the effect that it may have at home. For that he is willing to crawl prostrate to the feet of insurgents in arms, and say to them, 'Do with us as you will; tear from the flag of our glorious Union half its gleaming stripes; blot out as many of those stars as you can reach and extinguish; only join us again that you may help us to save the Democratic party, so that we may hereafter, as heretofore, enjoy power and the offices together. For these we will so humble ourselves as none of God's creatures ever humbled themselves before.'"

And if the gentleman from Kentucky desires it, I can put in a few extracts from another page of the same volume showing that after the war is all over a soldier upon the one side has seen fit to drag in here the personality and the public career of another soldier, now dead, who happened to be on the other side:

He served in the war from 1862 until its close as major and lieutenant-colonel of cavalry under Morgan and Breckinridge.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is all I have to say about the matter. I have no feeling on the subject. General Schenck was one of the distinguished men of my State. To-day he is the idol in memory of the old Republicans of Ohio—men who belonged to the Whig party and afterwards to the Republican party. They are not willing that any inference shall be drawn from any public declaration that General Schenck was less than a magnificent American, a true patriot, a splendid citizen, and a devoted friend of the American Union and the liberties of the American people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PEARSON and Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] desire to occupy?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Only a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in referring yesterday to the record of General Schenck I did not seek to attack him; I did not seek to say anything except what the record shows. And I am surprised, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] should wince so much and rant so much simply because I stated facts.

In order to substantiate what I said yesterday, which was called out because resolutions were pending here which sought to censure and condemn our present ambassador to Great Britain, I thought it was appropriate that we should give to this House, in a fair discussion of the question, any instance where a minister or ambassador had been condemned or censured. In looking over the history of the past, I found but one minister to Great Britain who had been condemned, and that was Gen. Robert C. Schenck. I did not attack General Schenck; I simply sought to give to the House information, and I based what I said upon the report of a committee of the House of Representatives, which showed that on the 28th day of February, 1876, the House of Representatives adopted a resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized and instructed to inquire further into the connection of the United States minister at the Court of St. James with the Emma mine, so called; that it have power to send for persons and papers; and leave is given to said committee to sit during the sessions of the House.

That committee performed its work, and gave us a volume, which I hold in my hands, of 800 pages; and the committee in concluding their report say:

The committee therefore submit the following resolution and unanimously recommend its passage by the House:

"Resolved, That this House condemns the action of Gen. Robert C. Schenck, United States minister at the Court of St. James, in becoming a director of the Emma Silver Mine Company of London, and his operations in connection with the shares of the said company and the vendors thereof, as ill advised, unfortunate, and incompatible with the duties of his official position."

I simply stated facts such as are shown by the reports made in the House of Representatives. That resolution, which was reported to this House by Mr. Hewitt, of New York, was afterwards adopted. I referred to this case simply to show that there had been a resolution heretofore adopted condemning the acts—not the words, the acts—of a gentleman who had been minister to Great Britain. Now, that is all I have to say on that point.

I had heard that while General Schenck was minister to England he wrote a book on "draw poker." I felt, in investigating this matter at a time when another minister was being so severely arraigned, that we should look into the history of other ministers to Great Britain. I sent to the Congressional Library to ascertain if that book was in the Library, and the Librarian, Mr. Spofford, sent me the book of Robert C. Schenck on "draw poker." I simply referred to it as a fact. And I now substantiate all I say by showing to this House the report and the book.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me a word?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. General Schenck is dead and gone; and will the gentleman from Kentucky inform the House how in any way the correctness or incorrectness of any action of General Schenck, while he was minister at the Court of St. James, excuses, justifies, or palliates the action of the present minister to the Court of St. James?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will answer the question. Mr. Speaker, it was a legitimate subject for me to refer to. There were members of this House who had charged that a minister to England had been condemned, and that therefore it was proper and right now to condemn Mr. Bayard. I drew the line between the acts committed by General Schenck, when he was investigated and a report presented to the House of Representatives containing 800 pages, and this case of Mr. Bayard, in which there is a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs seven lines in length. I made a comparison between the two cases, and I said that this was the first time in the history of the United States when an effort was made to censure and condemn a minister for words spoken in a speech.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, this discussion is taking such a wide range that the real issue may be obscured. But I desire to serve notice upon the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] that they can not play the game of the cuttlefish in this discussion and obscure the issue and leave out of sight the real defendant. I have promised my friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], my colleague on this committee, for whom I have the highest respect, that he will not say anything more complimentary to Mr. Bayard in this debate than I myself shall say, and say sincerely.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that the good name of our public servants constitutes a large part of the national wealth, a form of wealth that I would not barter for all that lies above or beneath our soil. And I desire to say in justice to my own feelings that I take no pleasure in joining in the humiliation of a lofty spirit or in the degradation of an illustrious name. And I wish to say in candor to my Republican friends that I have been an admirer and a supporter of Thomas F. Bayard, and I say here to-day that among the many eminent men whose names have illustrated the pages of American history "scarcely one bears a more splendid and none a more stainless name." The Lees and the Randolphs of Virginia, the Pinckneys and the Rutledges of South Carolina, the Livingstons and Jays of New York, the Adamses and Washburns of New England, the Carrolls of Maryland, and side by side with these names you must rank the Bayards of Delaware, a name that goes back spotless and shining into the mists of the Middle Ages.

I am, Mr. Speaker, perhaps one of the few members here present who have visited that old castle in the Ardennes Mountains, just above the little town of Dinant, on the Meuse River, known as La Roche à Bayard. This is the spot referred to by the eloquent gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] in his address on yesterday, when he spoke of the lineage of the Bayard family being traced back to that ideal of chivalry, the Seigneur Pierre du Terrail de Bayard, the "chevalier sans peur et sans reproche"—an impregnable fortress, bounded on three sides by the river and a natural rock wall several hundred feet in height, where he could be attacked but from one quarter, and where he was never known to turn his back on either enemy or friend. I have stood there on that rock and reflected with pleasure—that was some years ago—that this is indeed a splendid name, and one that is still worthily borne in my own country by a man who unites all of the qualities that make the model gentleman, just as his ancestors united the qualities that made the ideal knight.

Mr. Speaker, I say this in all sincerity, and pay this tribute to the name of Mr. Bayard as a matter of justice and right. But I desire to say, in justice to myself, to this House, and to my country, that I regret exceedingly that the Executive of this nation, by timely action, or that our ambassador, by reasonable explanation, or that the Democrats of this House, by reasonable concession in this matter and by a nonpartisan treatment of the question, had not relieved us of the necessity of demanding the censure of such a man.

Now, sir, there are only two questions involved in this case. The first is the question of power. Has the House of Representatives the power to pass the resolutions of censure? And second, Is the offense such as to justify this proceeding? Now, as to the question of power, that has been settled. The resolution of the minority in this case declares that the action of the majority, as proposed in the resolution of censure, is unwarranted and unprecedented. With great respect to the other side of the House, I desire to call their attention to the fact that two years ago a resolution was adopted, introduced by the then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], which in words and in terms censured the conduct of our minister to the Hawaiian Islands. And what is the difference between that case and this? There are just two points of difference: There the facts were denied and disputed; the allegations of facts were distinctly denied by the minister. Here the facts are admitted. And yet in that case the Democratic party on the floor of the House exercised the right to censure a man for raising the American flag, while we are here to-day to censure an ambassador of the United States for lowering the national honor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I know the respect that the gentleman from Kentucky has for authorities, and but for that fact I would not trouble the House by reading a passage from one of the great lights of his party, to wit, Thomas H. Benton, with reference to the powers and duties of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Benton made this statement in reference to the powers of the House at a time when he was a Senator and was defending the power that we have and should exercise. In his Thirty Years' View he says (volume 1, page 208):

The high functions of the House were given it for wise purposes, for paramount national objects. It is the immediate representation of the people, and should command their confidence and their hopes. As the sole originator of tax bills it is the sole dispenser of burthens on the people and of supplies to the Government.

Listen to this, my friends, if you kindly will:

As sole author of impeachments it is the grand inquest of the nation, and has supervision over all official delinquencies. Duty to itself, to its high functions, to the people, to the Constitution, and to the character of democratic government require that it resume and maintain its controlling place in the machinery and working of our Federal Government, and in preventing an increase of the evils of our diplomatic representation abroad.

The gentleman surely will not contend any longer upon the question of power. It is simply now a question of propriety. Shall we exercise this undisputed right? Of course we do not expect our Democratic friends to argue from a point of consistency. That is not in their creed.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PEARSON. I will yield to the gentleman from New York after I shall have finished these remarks, which will be brief, and he can bottle up his question for the present. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, we come to the question of propriety. If Mr. Bayard had been some obscure official, at some insignificant post, we might have passed by this incident; but standing as he does in the highest position in our foreign service, at the proudest Court in Christendom, we can not afford to ignore or to condone his conduct and his words.

A large part of the debate of yesterday was devoted to a discussion of the merits of protection. The merits of protection are not here involved. I am here to say to my Democratic friends that even if we admit the truth of all the unjust and intemperate assertions of Mr. Bayard, we do not and can not defend his words. I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky, if a man denounces his mother as a woman of vicious habits, and proclaims this among strangers—I ask the gentleman from Kentucky if that man is justified because he can prove the truth of his charge? Was it right for a man representing the entire body of the American people, standing in the old capital of Scotland, close by the Holy Rood, in sight of that old castle whose foundation goes back beyond the memory of man—was it right, was it proper, was it decent, for our ambassador to stand there in such a place, with such surroundings and before a critical and cultured audience, and to brand the believers in this country in the doctrine of protection as jobbers and chafferers?

And by the way, Mr. Speaker, as the facts are conceded, let it also be conceded in candor that when a man denounces the believers in protection he denounces the Republican party of the United States. That is the bed-rock principle of that party, and you can not get away from that proposition. I trust my friend will not dispute it. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] yesterday in his remarks said it was the "base stone" of the Republican party. Therefore when Mr. Bayard stood there and used these words that have been quoted and that are recited in the report, when he charged the whole of the American people who believe in this doctrine with believing in—

A form of "state socialism" which has done more to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon state aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause—

I ask my Democratic friends if they can justify such words as those, and if they can complain of Lord Salisbury, supposing they do justify those words—can they complain of Lord Salisbury, if he believed that the American people were such creatures as are here described, for declining to answer our demands in regard to Venezuela or otherwise treating us with respect?

I ask them further, if these words of Thomas F. Bayard are true, how can a proud and sensitive man represent such creatures as he here depicts? If he had the chivalry of that old ancestor of his, whom the kings of the earth deemed it an honor to have come before them and make them knights—kings as they were, they esteemed it an honor to be knighted by the imposition of his glorious sword—if this were a worthy descendant of that great man, he would not represent such creatures as he describes us to be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a very curious thing in this discussion that this tirade of Mr. Bayard was delivered exactly three days after the greatest victory in American history had ever been achieved for the doctrine of protection. There was a little dispute yesterday between the gentleman from Kentucky—a little confusion of mind as to the dates in this case. I desire to say that there were two great victories for protection preceding this deliverance of Mr. Baryard, the first in November, 1894, and the next in November, 1895. The first victory was, as the gentleman said, in the matter of the election of Congressmen. But here were two lights that were shed upon the gentleman from Kentucky and the minister to Great Britain, and it seems to have the effect that increased light has upon the owl, the more light the more dazed the creature seems to be, and less capable of perceiving the natural objects of vision. [Applause.]

I desire to——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me to interrupt him, as he referred to me?

Mr. PEARSON. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. When you referred to the elections of 1894 and 1895, which you say were so strongly for protection, why did you not refer to the election of 1892, when 5,567,000 Democrats elected Grover Cleveland and voted down the McKinley proposition?

Mr. PEARSON. I will say that the election of 1892 is a "back number," and the men who were elected in that contest have now been condemned to private life, and will be in the next election. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Now, let me call my friend's attention to the existing situation that was presented to Mr. Bayard at the time when he made this speech. It was this: Three days after the friends of protection had swept these United States, the whole Northern part of it, from Cape Cod to Salt Lake—it was just three days after they had carried not only the North, but after they had crossed down to the State of Maryland and removed the despot's heel from off her shore; and let me say, furthermore, if I can get the attention of my friend from Kentucky, for the first time in a generation the Republican cohorts, holding up the banner of protection, had invaded the State of Kentucky and carried their banner to victory. [Loud applause.] More than that, in the very native home of Bourbonism and the original habitat of blue grass and of the venerable gentleman who now antagonizes these resolutions [applause], and at the very moment when Mr. Bayard was speaking and holding up the cause of free trade, the dilapidated hulk of the Democratic ship, battered and beaten, was sailing up Salt River under the tattered and dishonored flag of free trade. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. Speaker, from the day that George Washington put his illustrious signature to the protective-tariff bill in 1789, on the 16th day of May of that year—from that day until the 4th of November last there never had been such a victory for the cause of protection, even in the time of war, even in the year when Abraham Lincoln ran for President the second time, and even when this House had only a portion of the States of the Union represented. The Democrats had 36 votes here; and now how many have they from the Northern States? Exactly a baker's dozen. [Laughter.] The unlucky number of 13. And if you will leave out of account the cities of New York, Boston, and San Francisco, where the foreign population have not yet learned American ideas, and consequently invariably return Democrats here—leave out of account these great cities, and your entire membership from the Northern States can be counted on the fingers of this hand. [Applause.] Was that a time, when you find this House in such a shape, for you to denounce the doctrine of protection. It needs no defense at my hands. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House with the discussion of its merits, but I desire to go on record, inasmuch as that doctrine has been so furiously assailed, as expressing this deliberate belief: That the policy of protection has done more to raise the standard of wages in these United States, to bring happiness and comfort to the homes of our working classes, to stimulate inventive ingenuity, to develop our varied resources, to convert potential into actual wealth, and pour revenue into the Treasury, to make the nation independent, proud, and strong—aye, more than that, to save the nation's life in time of war—than any other single cause. [Applause.]

Now, the House must have been very much interested yesterday in watching the maneuver of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE]. Finding that the law and the facts in this case were against him, he proceeded to bring in an issue which, I think, Mr. Speaker, ought not to be discussed in this House, and which I know the Republicans of this House will not allow the Democrats of this House to decide; and that is, who is to be the Presidential candidate in the coming contest? I shall only say this, and I shall say it deliberately, that the cause of protection has triumphed in the last two elections, and it will triumph in the election for which we are now preparing; and more than that, the American people have a settled conviction in their minds that there will be no genuine return to prosperity in this country until there is a genuine American protective tariff on our statute books. [Applause.] And while I know that the Republican party's great embarrassment in this emergency is the superabundant wealth of Presidential candidates, or rather of Presidential timber, the Democratic party will not be permitted to decide who that candidate shall be; but I will tell them, and I will tell the country, and I will tell any person who chooses to ask of the matter, that the man who will carry our banner to victory in the coming contest will be that man who measures up most nearly to the ideal standard, to the living impersonation, of the beneficent doctrine of protection. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] Let me tell my friends on the other side that they make a mistake when they spring this question here. We are more likely to go contrary to what we think you want, gentlemen, than to agree with you. It has been considered good policy among Republicans when they see what the Democratic party wants to do exactly the reverse.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PEARSON. Not right now. I will hear the gentleman later. I want to add this, Mr. Speaker. The first applause which greeted the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Arkansas yesterday came from his friends when they heard him take that tack. Many of them had been leaving this Hall, but when he entered upon that theme they rushed back to hear and applaud what he might say in disparagement of the man whom the Democrats most do fear. By that applause they "gave themselves away," and they did not injure the man against whom the gentleman from Arkansas read here an irresponsible interview. The question in this matter is not the character of General Schenck; it is not the character of Mr. Lowell; it is not the character and prospects of any man who is to be our candidate for the Presidency. The question is simply this: Shall we permit our minister to Great Britain to use such language as he has used and let it go unrebuked? I speak here as a Southern man; I speak here as a protectionist. I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that it was my misfortune, or my good fortune, to be only 8 years of age when the war broke out, but if I had been eight or ten years older I should, of course, have cast my lot with my people in the South, and I should then perhaps have commanded his attention more closely than I am commanding it now. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to assure the gentleman from North Carolina that I have heard every word of his eloquent speech. It is a bad habit of mine, which a lifetime has built up, to be engaged in reading or writing while listening, but the most instructive——

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I decline to be interrupted except by applause. [Laughter.] But let me say here seriously on this question of protection that I propose to speak as a loyal Southern man who believes in the doctrine and who is glad to come here to add to the number of its friends, and when any man assaults that doctrine he assaults not only me but he assaults the 16,869 believers in that doctrine who sent me here to uphold it. [Applause.] My friend from Ohio speaks as a man who has been on the battlefield, and I take it for granted that he has been; but I want to call his attention and the attention of the gentleman from Iowa and of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to one fact. Will you not admit, gentlemen, that the men who opposed you in that conflict were as brave as yourselves? Will you not concede that that means as brave as any that ever lived in the tide of time? [Applause.]

How did you defeat them? When did you first mark the wavering of their columns? When did you first observe the weakening of their serried ranks? It was after every Southern port had been blockaded, after the munitions of war and the means of getting them had been cut off. It was then for the first time that you noticed the failing strength of your brave adversaries. Why was it? It was because we of the South had been an agricultural community, while you of the North had been a manufacturing community. The South had for a long time opposed the doctrine of protection and had not felt its benefits. The North had realized its benefits and gone largely into manufacturing enterprises and had thus become independent. Those poor men of the South, after they were cut off by the blockade from the outside world, had no means at home of repairing their losses in the way of military stores or other supplies. They could not make cannon, as you could. They could not make powder, except in a very few places. They could not make shot, nor shell, nor blankets, nor any of the various necessaries for carrying on war. You could make everything that your men needed, and I venture to say here, and I hope I shall not be misunderstood, that you must have been victorious in the end in that conflict even if the depleted ranks of Southern heroes had been recruited again and again. The result would have been the same, because you could make what you needed, while they were cut off from what they must have in order to maintain the contest.

Now that that war is all over and that we can accept its results, can we not all admit that protection helped to save this Union? Can we not admit that protection helped to give us one flag, over one splendid and harmonious Republic, instead of two flags waving over an uncertain number of discordant States; to give us one Constitution under which we can march on to one common, glorious destiny? And I can say further, Mr. Speaker, reverently, truthfully, and loyally, knowing the splendid courage of the Southern men, knowing their devoted loyalty, knowing their matchless, voiceless, fruitless sufferings, that if they could speak from the sunken trenches to which your bullets and your bayonets consigned them, they would echo the voice and the sentiment of the living: "It is better as it is—one flag, one country, one universal freedom." [Prolonged applause.] I feel that I have not gone out of my way in saying thus much for the cause of protection.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we pass this resolution we declare to the world that we intend to maintain and to defend the policy which has made us prosperous in peace and invincible in war. Pass it, and if it carries a sting to a lofty spirit it will carry a warning to all meaner ones. Pass it, and hereafter when our ministers and other representatives go to the Department of State for instructions it will not be necessary to admonish them that the man who carries the nation's commission abroad ought not to denounce his countrymen among strangers. Pass this resolution, and if our representatives abroad can not boast of our institutions they will at least pay us the poor tribute of their silent contempt. Pass it, and let it never be expunged until the day of doom, until that day of gloom and shame when the representatives of the American people will no longer dare to defend the fair name of their country against all enemies, foreign and domestic, against the assaults of the open foe, and against the insolence of the public servant who would exalt his party by debasing his country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if I can recover sufficiently from the spell of the eloquence of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] and of my friend from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS], I desire to submit some observations on the pending resolution. I did not have the good fortune to attend the Chicago Exposition; but since hearing the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS] on yesterday I rather congratulate myself that I was saved the trouble, because we have had it so beautifully portrayed by him that a visit would have been unnecessary.

My friend has brought to the protection side of his argument some allies that are new to me. I was aware that pretty much everything in heaven above, in the earth beneath, and in the waters under the earth was claimed for the protection side; but until yesterday, when claimed by the gentleman, I think the country has remained in ignorance of the fact that even the owls and the bats and the croaking ravens which he discovered at the Exposition were to be considered loyal allies of the protectionists.

Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising to me, on second thought, that the owl or the bat should be a protectionist, for they are blind in the face of light—fit companions to my honorable friends on the other side. [Laughter and applause.] And the croaking raven has been summoned as another ally to our friend's protection party. From the time that the first tariff bill was passed that my friend refers to, in 1789, down to the present day the class of men that got the first taste of protection have been croaking for more and were never satisfied until the McKinley bill passed into law—the consummation of their fondest hopes!

And my honorable friend has described, with humorous touches, the visit of the raven, that bird of evil, as he sat crouched above his chamber door after the election of 1892. Its direful prophecies as heard by the gentleman were not caught by the people of the United States, but if I may enter the domain of imagination into which we are invited by the gentleman I can the more easily discern the raven on that night when the people of the United States had spoken with an emphasis not to be misunderstood, not seated above his chamber door, but upon the Goddess of Liberty on this capital, and its hoarse voice muttering in sepulchral tones:

The McKinley bill, nevermore!

[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I desire to return my personal thanks at the outset to my friend who spoke on yesterday so beautifully about the Chicago Exposition. I went through it in imagination, pictured by his imagery, his art, his skill. But, sir, as I heard him depict the glories of the Republic as seen at Chicago, all brought about as he claimed by this power of protection—when I heard him tell how, leaving that Exposition, he traveled eastward, carrying with him the impressions of that great scene, on to the city of Washington, and how on reaching Harpers Ferry, on the Potomac, the gateway to the most beautiful valley in our land, his imagination spontaneously ran riot with his thoughts in painting that beautiful picture of liberty and freedom—liberty of thought and freedom of action—the thought occurred to me, Why is it that my friend who had been visiting Chicago, the home of the sainted Lincoln (to use his words), the home of Grant, the friends of protection—why was it as he sped his way across the continent through the prairies of Indiana, the home of Benjamin Harrison, the friend of protection, and across the broad area of Virginia's proudest daughter, Ohio, the home of your Garfields, your Grosvenors, your Wades, your Hayes, all friends of the protective doctrine—why was it that that beautiful apostrophe to liberty and freedom came to my friend's mind, not when he was dwelling among the heroes of protection and bound by the intellectual slavery which it teaches, but only when he had inhaled the pure air of old Virginia, in sight of the home of that doughty champion of the people's rights, beneath the shadow of those hills that guard the home of William L. Wilson, the glorious champion of commercial freedom? [Applause.]

His mind, once fettered, burst its bands in an atmosphere where commercial bondage had received its death blow.

I want to remind my friend that there is yet hope for him. No bird freed from its cage ever sang a sweeter song to liberty than he. So when his mind was once disenthralled and freed from the slavery of the protection idea, and only then, did it evoke a sentiment, the inspiration of the moment, natural to his heart and worthy of all commendation. If my friend will only give us the pleasure of his presence just a little more in old Virginia, along the murmuring waters of the Potomac and the Shenandoah, I think I can safely guarantee to the country some future effusions on liberty and commercial freedom that will be creditable alike to him and his people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can not, without seeming to be fulsome in flattery, say what I would like to say about my friend's speech. But really I think he got a good way from the point under discussion. Indeed I think I am not stating it too strongly when I say he soon landed in Chicago, and stayed there most of the time during its delivery. I want the House to look at this question frankly, fairly, and honestly, and let us see what is the charge made in the resolutions. The resolutions recite the fact that Mr. Bayard used these words:

He, the President of the United States, stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—

Do you object to that? No; you say we do not object to the word "strong." We do not object to the word "self-confident," but just think of speaking of the American people as "oftentimes violent."

But let me read further:

Men who seek to have their own way—

Are you that sort of men? How did you get here? By allowing your opponents to have their way and yielding to them without a struggle?—

Men who seek to have their own way; and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States.

Now, suppose Mr. Bayard had used this language instead of the above:

The President of the United States stands in the midst of a weak, distrustful, and amiable people, men who never seek to have their own way; and I tell you plainly that any man, however pusillanimous and weak he may be, can govern the people of the United States.

[Laughter.]

Would you have condemned that language?

Mr. LACEY. Would not that have been about as near the truth as the other? [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. Well, if the cap fits you, my friend, you may wear it. It does not fit me. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, if that had been said of the American people you would have heard a howl from Dan to Beersheba. But these resolutions are sought to be justified because Mr. Bayard used the word "violent." What does "violent" mean? It means "vehement," "impetuous," in the above connection, and for my part, looking at the history of the Anglo-Saxon people and their splendid achievements in civil liberty and human progress, I am proud to claim descent from such a race, "strong," "self-confident," and even sometimes "violent." Magna Charta could never have been wrested from an unwilling king by a weak and vacillating people. This continent that my distinguished friend described in his address on yesterday could never have been redeemed from the wilderness by any other than such a people. But you object to the term "violent." Are you trying to deceive yourselves, gentlemen, about that? Are you afraid to say openly that you believe the American people are "sometimes violent"?

Mr. GROSVENOR. All the people, you say? [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER (continuing). Have we had no violence at Homestead, at Chicago, at New Orleans, in Oregon—aye, more, my friend referred to the condition of things in Kentucky a few moments ago; have we had no violence there? No; but we have had the military called out by a Republican governor. I suppose it was thought proper to use it as an escort of honor to the legislature. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, gentlemen appeal to us to be honest. Be honest with yourselves first. Gentlemen will not deny the fact that the American people are sometimes violent.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TUCKER. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. It is true that men sometimes steal down in Virginia, but would the gentleman like to have the people of Virginia characterized as "sometimes thieves"? [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. I am very much obliged to my friend. I have no objection to any man in Virginia who deserves the appellation being called a thief, but I prefer my friend to take another example; for instance, Texas. [Laughter.] I have no objection to its being said the records of the courts of Virginia show that some men have been convicted of stealing. But, Mr. Speaker, such a question is trifling with the subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question just there?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You understand that Mr. Bayard's remark included the American people as a whole.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How could you say, then, that the fact that one man steals in a given place, or commits violence in a particular place, or that there is mob law somewhere would justify a characterization of the entire people?

Mr. MEREDITH. Why, they stole the Presidency once, in 1876. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. And that is just why you are feeling bad all the time.

Mr. TUCKER. My friend has come to me with all the sweetness and amiability of old Santa Claus [langhter], whose prototype he is; and my friend never comes to us in debate without bearing "good things," just as Santa Claus does when he comes. My friend asks me now, with a sweetness of tone that would charm a bird out of a tree, whether this is not a general charge. Does it not comprehend all the people? Why, as soft and sweet and amiable as is my friend's manner now, would it shock this House if I say that I have seen even so amiable a gentleman as he violent in this House? [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Were you violent at the same time?

Mr. TUCKER. Well, you generally make me violent. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Speaker, you are trying to fool yourselves. Violent? Let me refer the gentleman from Iowa to an authority on this subject, one perhaps he has never seen, and one I feel sure that very few of my Republican brethren have seen—I want to refer you to the Book of Books. There it is written by the pen of inspiration, by Almighty God himself:

The Kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.

Not a sweet, amiable man like my friend from Ohio. [Laughter.] John Randolph on one occasion said that he had read that passage a hundred times and had never understood it. I am very much afraid my friends on the other side have never read it once, and therefore it is not to be expected that they should understand it.

The violent take it by force.

Not the weak, hesitating, indifferent man. So that the ultimate hope of every rational being, that peace which we hope for as the end of all things in the life beyond the grave, here we are told, by the pen of inspiration itself, can only be attained by a violent struggle. And yet gentlemen come in here and are seeking to criticise a man like Mr. Bayard for speaking the truth, when you know it is the truth.

Now, let us see, Mr. Speaker.

Oftentimes violent people, men who seek to have their own way—

Do you object to that? Do you know anything about the American people? Of all the people on the face of God's earth I honor them because they do try to have their own way, and no other people's way; and the only way you gentlemen ever got here was by having in you that principle which you are trying to condemn in these resolutions—men who seek to have their own way, and I tell you plainly now—

I believe my honorable friend from Ohio criticised this passage yesterday—and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States.

Great exception is taken to the word "govern." Is my friend not governed? The idea is that our people are self-governing. Why, Mr. Bayard, in this very pamphlet, on page 13, in his Edinburgh speech, illustrating his meaning, speaks of our people and the flag that waves over them from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast as "seventy millions of self-governing, vigorous, and intelligent people."

But gentlemen object to being governed. Have you not a governor in Ohio? Have you not a governor in M—I was going to say in Massachusetts; but, Mr. Speaker, the hand of Providence has recently taken from that old Commonwealth its governor, whom we all honored and respected in this House years ago. But has not every State in this Union a governor? What do you mean by it? Do you mean that the people are not self-governing? Oh, you are sticking in the bark, and you know it. What do you mean by saying that the man who is President is governing the United States? You mean that he is executing the laws of the United States. And do you object to saying that he must be a real man? Ah, my Republican brethren, do you object to that? In this day of President making—in this House, elected for one purpose and devoted to another, that of President making—do you shrink from that standard of manhood which has been erected for you by Mr. Bayard?

Are the friends of that statesman from the far-off home of the gentleman of Iowa afraid to trot him up to be measured by this standard, that it requires a real man to be President? Is my friend from Ohio afraid to put up his candidate, the Napoleonic gentleman from Ohio, and have his measure taken by that standard? Or are the friends of that masterful man who has stood in this House as the leader of his party for years afraid to measure him by the standard of real manhood? It looks to me, Mr. Speaker, as if gentlemen were oversensitive, afraid that this test of real manhood might exclude some favorite son from entry in this go-as-you-please Presidential hurdle. I want a real man for President. Do not be afraid of your candidate on that line.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think if there ever was a bald pretense, if there ever was a piece of buncombe gotten together in the House of Representatives upon which to base a censure, the first part of this resolution contains it from beginning to end.

But now we come to the next resolution. Mr. Bayard has stirred up a hornet's nest. He has assailed protection, which, like the sacred animal of Egypt, can be touched by no impious hand. He has offended the national honor and the national dignity, it is said. Why, Mr. Speaker, our Republican brethren are as sensitive about this matter of protection as a man whose father was hanged, who never could see a rope without fainting. [Laughter.] What are you afraid of? I will tell you before I close what you are afraid of. You came to this House from the last campaign proclaiming from every stump that if you got power you would write upon the statute books of the country a high-tariff law, and you have been afraid to do it. You have been afraid even to try it; and you have passed a little bantling, a 15 per cent increase, a horizontal Morrison bill. Truly, Mr. Speaker, the stone which the builders rejected, the same has become the head of the corner. That horizontal principle which used to be the embodiment of laziness, as Governor McKinley called it, is now the principle upon which you stand in this House. But, Mr. Speaker, this is remarkable.

In my own country—

Says Mr. Bayard—

I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled protection—

Is it not insatiable? Did it not start in 1789 with an 8 per cent tariff duty, and did it not land in the McKinley bill with a 50 per cent duty, or thereabouts? The more it got the more it wanted. In 1789 they had it for the protection of the infant. After a hundred years the infant was still in its swaddlings, but it required more food—which I believe has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune—

Is not that true?—

Go, Mr. Speaker, to the agricultural States of this Union, and then to the manufacturing States, and see if this is not true; and mark the disproportionate increase of wealth in each. Thirty years ago, if you went to the city of New York and walked down the street, a millionaire was pointed out to you as a very remarkable man, something worth seeing. Go there now, and you can not keep out of the way of them. I can, but you can not. [Laughter.] Where did it come from? You boast that since the war—my friend from North Carolina has just boasted—that the protective system has been stronger and higher than ever before, and the higher you have gotten it the more inequality you have had. A hundred millionaires to-day where one existed thirty years ago! You have had a high protective system since the war, and it has brought with it the inequality of fortune which Mr. Bayard so aptly describes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend allow me to ask him one question there?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that great fortunes in this country, like that of Jay Gould and those engaged in the oil trust, have been made from avocations that have not been protected?

Mr. TUCKER. Well, I think that may be true in those cases. My friend has excepted two.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I could except a great many more, but I did not want to take up the time of my friend.

Mr. POWERS. What about "Boss" Croker?

Mr. TUCKER. I believe he is in the horse business. That is an agricultural product; and if he is a millionaire, I am sure he did not make it out of horses or any other agricultural product. To continue, Mr. Bayard says:

Has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils—

Why, Mr. Speaker, where is William L. Wilson? A Cabinet officer in this Government; but if the reports are to be believed, it can not be doubted that he was defeated for Congress by money supplied from the protected industries of this country. Where is that great tribune of the people, William R. Morrison, of the State of Illinois? Years ago you remember that memorable fight, when by the use of money gathered from these same gentlemen he was required to retire to private life, only, as some of us believe, to return again in triumph to a House whiter than this and more commensurate with his ability and rugged character. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

To corrupt public life. To lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind * * * divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause.

Mr. Wilson, in a speech delivered in this House on April 7, 1892, declared openly that the protected industries of this country assembled here through their agents had left their final demands upon the table of the Ways and Means Committee—a member of that committee I see sitting before me to-day—and their demands were written into the law of the land as they, and not as the taxpayers, asked. I quote from his speech:

HOW TARIFFS ARE MADE.

Mr. Speaker, we have had in this debate a series of extravagant eulogies on the tariff law of 1890. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] pronounces it to be "consistent, comprehensive, and complete, with all the different parts properly and justly related." The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] eulogizes it as "complete, comprehensive, and logical." Other gentlemen have used stronger words of praise.

Now, sir, I want to call the attention of the House to the manner in which a "consistent, logical, and complete" protective tariff is built up.

The gentleman from Maine doubtless thinks he is one of the chief architects of the present law. My friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] each for himself indulge the same pleasant illusion. They were all members of the committee which reported the law to this House.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there is abundant and unimpeachable evidence to destroy all their claims.

I turn to the very schedule of the law now under consideration and I find that Mr. McKinley, in presenting to this House the conference report, September 27, 1890, said of it: "This schedule has the hearty approval of the National Wool Growers' Association, and of the several State associations throughout the country."

In the next sentence he says, "And, Mr. Speaker, that is entirely true also of the tobacco schedule," although he omits to say who had approved this latter. As to the great and comprehensive metal schedule, constituting so large a part of the tariff and contributing so much of its political and pecuniary strength, I read in the report made by Mr. James M. Swank, secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association, made to the president of that association, that "during the long period in which this measure (the McKinley bill) received the consideration of Congress the views of this association concerning the proper framing of the metal schedule of the new tariff were frequently solicited and were promptly given"; and as he adds that "the schedule as adopted is the most harmonious and completely protective of all the metal schedules" in our tariff legislation, we are not left in doubt that the views so "promptly" given were "promptly" accepted.

So much for the origin of three important schedules. Let us pursue this investigation a little further Turning to page 290 of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means of the last Congress, I find that Mr. William Whitman, president of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, said he "had framed two clauses" prescribing the taxes on women's and children's dress goods, and these clauses turn up as Mr. Whitman framed them as sections 374 and 375 of the McKinley Act, with a blank in the provisos, filled doubtless according to the same gentleman's suggestion. [Laughter.]

At page 281 of the hearings, Mr. Isaac N. Heidelberger, in behalf of the Wholesale Clothing Manufacturers, submitted a memorandum of their demands, and that memorandum, so far as it related to woolen clothing, is substantially embodied in paragraph 396 of the act. [Laughter.]

The makers of firearms appeared (at page 1255) with the sections they wished "incorporated and made a part of the tariff schedule of duties," and those sections appear in their own words as paragraphs 169 and 170 of the act, with a single trifling change. [Laughter.]

Again, at page 92 of the hearings may be found the demands of the tin-plate makers—that were going to be—proffered by the trusted counselor of my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], and although thousands and tens of thousands of consumers and laborers protested against these demands, Mr. Cronemeyer's wishes are exactly embodied in paragraph 143 of the McKinley bill. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Miller rose. [Cries of "Sit down!" "Sit down!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I hope the gentleman will not break up this recital. In a few minutes I will yield to him. At page 79 of these hearings, Mr. Charles S. Landers, representing the makers of table cutlery, presented the corrections and amendments which they wished to the Senate clause, and at paragraph 167 of the act his memorandum appears in the very words in which he wrote it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

On page 65 of the hearings Mr. W. F. Rockwell makes known the demands of the makers of pocket cutlery, and these demands literally reappear in paragraph 165 of the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now I understand for the first time in my life how a "consistent, logical, complete" protective tariff is framed, "with the different parts properly and justly related." [Renewed applause.] Our friends upon the other side merely leave the blanks on the committee table and look at the ceiling or stroll around the Capitol while the parties who desire to tax the people come and fill in the blanks according to the suggestions or their own greed of selfishness. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend allow me to ask him one more question, and I will not interrupt him further?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to ask him if he believes that the elections in the Southern States and in the great cities of the North, whose corruption have been as notorious as the existence of the elections themselves, were inspired under a protective tariff?

Mr. TUCKER. Well, I hope my friend will not invite me into a field that is so foreign to this discussion. I should be very glad on another occasion to join battle with him on that subject; but it is so entirely foreign to this, I trust he will pardon me if I decline to go into it.

I believe that Mr. Bayard believed what he said about the protective system was true, and so believing I think he had the right to say it, for he was speaking as a private citizen, expressing his own individual views, and in nowise was he speaking in his representative capacity. I want to call your attention first to a speech of Mr. Russell Lowell, and I beg the attention of my friends who are so much concerned on this subject. Here is Mr. Lowell, an honored gentleman from the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a distinguished Republican, in a speech on "Democracy," delivered at Edinburgh while he was minister to Great Britain. He uses this remarkable language:

If universal suffrage has worked ill in our larger cities, as it certainly has, it has been mainly because the hands that wielded it were untrained to its use. There the election of the majority of the trustees of the public moneys is controlled—by the most vicious and ignorant of the population, those coming to us from abroad, wholly unpracticed in self-government and incapable of assimilation by American habits and methods.

How do you like that?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I will say, in reply to my friend, that some of these men who led these ignorant foreigners were too much versed in politics and understood how to manipulate the ignorant too well.

Mr. TUCKER. Oh, my friend is dodging there.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not dodge.

Mr. TUCKER. My friend does not dodge when he gets in a fair, open field; but he is seeking shelter behind the bushes now.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I supposed that I was always in a fair field in a discussion with my friend from Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. The point is whether Mr. Lowell, as minister of this country to Great Britain, was justified in declaring in a public speech abroad, not in his official capacity, but as an individual citizen, that the men who held the purse strings in our great cities were elected by an ignorant and vicious population. But that is not all. I have a sweet morsel here for some of you brethren:

The English race—

Says Mr. Lowell in that same address—

if they did not invent government by discussion, have at least carried it nearest to perfection in practice. It seems a very safe and reasonable contrivance for occupying the attention of the country and is certainly a better way of settling questions than by push of pike. Yet if one should ask it why it should not rather be called government by gabble—

I hope gentlemen understand—government by gabble, it would have to fumble in its pocket a good while before it found the change for a convincing reply.

Mr. Speaker, the censors of public servants of that day could not have been as watchful as they are at this time, or certainly they would have called attention to this disparagement of their eloquence. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Does not the distinguished gentleman from Virginia know that a Republican Administration displaced Mr. Russell Lowell, distinguished as he was, from the diplomatic service of this country because he had uttered sentiments like that?

Mr. TUCKER. I do not know that. I will be perfectly frank with the gentleman. Let me understand him. Does he state that Mr. Lowell was dismissed from the public service because of these utterances?

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. TUCKER. Very well. We are trying him now, not upon what was the occasion of his dismissal, but because he uttered what I have read, and a Republican Administration practically declared him not guilty of any offense, for at least, by the gentleman's own admission, he was retained in the public service after these utterances. If you say that they dismissed him afterwards because he had done something worse, possibly that may be true; but why was he not dismissed for this, if Mr. Bayard is to be censured for his utterances? For my part, I never knew that Mr. Lowell had been dismissed.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. I did not say that he was dismissed. I said that he was displaced, discontinued from the service, and another appointed who more fully and correctly represented American sentiment.

Mr. TUCKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to another proposition. I say that if Mr. Bayard believed in the truth of these statements he had a right to utter them.

Mr. MILLIKEN. My friend has been quoting from the Bible. Does he not know there is excellent authority for saying that the truth is not to be told at all times; and may it not be possible that, even if these things were true, our minister ought not to have uttered them on that occasion?

Mr. MAGUIRE. That is the part of the Bible that the Republican party have taken for their guide. [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, in these days of hypercritical criticism let us not inaugurate a new doctrine by declaring that a man is to be criticised for telling the truth. Let us take hold of the man who is telling a falsehood and, in our new rôle of setting everything to rights, for the sake of all that is good and pure and holy, let us begin with the lie and the falsehood and not criticise a man for telling the truth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have ample authority for asserting the right of Mr. Bayard, if he believed these statements to be true, to utter them. In 1852, when the great Webster was Secretary of State, there came to this country a noble patriot who enlisted the sympathies of our people in the cause of freedom. Kossuth, the Hungarian patriot, visited this city, and in his honor a banquet was given which Mr. Webster attended as one of the honored guests. He was called on for a speech on that occasion. Remember, he was Secretary of State of the United States, and this country was on peaceable terms with Austria. In response to that call Mr. Webster made a speech in which he expressed the hope that Hungary might become independent of all foreign powers, expressed his aspirations for "Hungarian independence," "Hungarian self-government," "Hungarian control of Hungarian destinies."

All through the land Mr. Webster was criticised and assailed. He was attacked because as Secretary of State he had undertaken to take part in that struggle between a country that was at peace with us and certain patriots who sought to be free from foreign control. What was his defense? Mr. Webster boldly defended himself upon the ground that he had spoken at that banquet in his private capacity, not as Secretary of State, but as a citizen of the United States, and that as such he had a right to appear and express his sentiments and his sympathies. So Mr. Bayard appeared on these occasions abroad as a citizen. Every step in this indictment which you have drawn against him shows it. He exercised a right secured to him by the first amendment to the Constitution, which guarantees to every man free speech. Yet now you seek to censure him, because, forsooth, he has uttered an expression that cuts deep into the hearts of the protected industries. You have resolved, first, that protection is a good thing, and second, that no man shall open his mouth against it, and I serve notice on you now that you can not stifle the conscience of a free people by such attempts.

The proceeding against Mr. Bayard on account of his remarks on protection amounts in its last analysis to the proposition that whenever the Congress of the United States may see fit to assume in its legislation that a certain principle is beneficent, an American minister can not, even in his individual capacity, by philosophical reasoning and appeals to experience, question the beneficence of such principle before any foreign audience. To this conclusion we must necessarily come, for if it once be admitted that he can enter into such a discussion he may and indeed must be permitted to invoke the evidences of experience wherever he may find them. It would be absurd to compel him to exclude the grounds of an intelligent judgment upon a general principle because those grounds happened to exist in his country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia be permitted to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TUCKER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Texas and to the House. I shall seek not to impose upon your indulgence, gentlemen.

Mr. Bayard further said:

> It (the said policy of protection) has unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes whose support is thereby attracted.

Can any man doubt the truth of every word of this. Is commerce, which is trade, increased or enlarged by others dealing with us? Does any man doubt that the system referred to dangerously depletes the Treasury? The McKinley bill, the ideal protective bill, went into operation October, 1890. The Wilson bill, which repealed it, went into operation August 28, 1894. The revenues of the Government from customs for the fiscal year of 1889 were two hundred and twenty-three millions, for 1890, two hundred and twenty-nine millions. These were years prior to the adoption of the McKinley bill, or rather prior to its operation, for the fiscal year ended June 30. In 1891 we find, under the operation of the McKinley bill, the revenues dropped to $219,000,000; in 1892, to $177,000,000; in 1893, $203,000,000, and in 1894, to $131,000,000. Now, Mr. Bayard states that this system dangerously depletes the Treasury. The public record shows that from 1890 to 1894, under the operation of the McKinley bill, the revenues had fallen from $229,000,000 to $131,000,000, whereas, under the Wilson bill, the revenues have increased from $131,000,000 in 1894, to $152,000,000 in 1895, and if the increase continues through this fiscal year at the rate it has during the past eight months the revenues for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, from tariff duties, will go as high as $165,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, there was something said yesterday in reference to the Presidential question; and there has been a defense of himself published this morning in one of the papers from one Mark Hanna, of Ohio, in reference to the part which he is alleged to have taken in this Presidential canvass for one of the candidates. I understood the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] yesterday to deny in toto all charges which were brought against Hanna of frying the fat out of the manufacturers in the interest of his candidate. But I find that his defense is drawn by a special pleader. It is artful; but it does not go to the root of this matter. I want to call the attention of the House to one expression in the indictment which was drawn by Senator CHANDLER the other day in these words:

> I expect to hear from Mr. McKinley—
> Says Senator CHANDLER—
> without delay in a public utterance. If he does not speak directly or authoritatively through some reliable representative, the belief will gain ground that he has placed himself in the hands of managers who are seeking to nominate him by the lavish use of money, and who will own him, and make merchandise of him if he is elected.

Mr. Hanna this morning says in his denial that he has not furnished any money for this corrupt purpose. That is not an answer to Senator CHANDLER'S charge—the charge is that money is being used by men, among whom is Hanna, who propose to make merchandise of the great office of President. And when men high in the councils of the Republican party, indorsed by gentlemen on the other side from the Presidential steal of 1876 down to the present time, come and declare through the public prints that there is danger of any man being elected to the Presidency who is to be owned and used as merchandise, Mr. Speaker, do not the words of Mr. Bayard fall as lightly on the public ear as rain upon the roof in times of drought? "Corrupting public morals!" "debauching the people!" when here is a witness of unquestioned authority, not brought here by subpœna, not summoned, but freely testifying to his belief that the time has come when there is danger of that being done. See exactly what this witness states in an interview in the Washington Post, March 17, 1896:

> Senator CHANDLER'S interview was read far and wide and led to very general comment. Amid all the talk, however, and with the knowledge that General GROSVENOR had come out in a long interview, Senator CHANDLER did not retract anything that he had said. On the contrary, he repeated with even more emphasis the statements he had made in the Post.
> "I was very cautious in speaking about McKinley," said he, "but it certainly does seem to me that he is in the hands of unscrupulous managers. They say that this year the Republicans can elect a yellow dog if we nominate one. At the same time, look at the situation. If McKinley is nominated, we shall have to meet the charge that we fried the fat out of the manufacturers in the last campaign, that he fried the fat out of them again to secure his nomination, that he is continuing to fry the fat to buy his election, and that as a result, he will pay his political debts with a high-tariff bill framed solely in the interests of the manufacturers. With such charges as these to meet on the stump, the campaign on the part of the Republicans will be defensive instead of offensive."

And now, Mr. Speaker, I want to bear witness to the impropriety, in my judgment, of one of the declarations of this witness. Senator CHANDLER, in his indictment, seeks to bring up the condition of Governor McKinley in his private financial troubles; and see what he says on that subject:

All Republicans sympathize with McKinley in his business misfortunes, and all over the country contributions were freely made to pay the honorable debts he had incurred and to keep such a distinguished and honored leader of the party from insolvency. But it is now, by reason of recent disclosures, a pertinent inquiry: Who raised and handled those contributions, how large were they, and what is Mr. McKinley's present financial condition? Are the men who raised these personal contributions now going over the same ground they have before traveled, gathering moneys for corrupting State and district conventions; and is our next President, if Mr. McKinley is the nominee, to be controlled and dictated to by Mr. Hanna and a set of associates who have established their domination over a President by the money they have furnished for him and his uses?

Ah, Mr. Speaker, when I read the words of Mr. Bayard condemning protection, and the defense of Mark Hanna, the successor to Foster in the fat-frying business, by Mr. GROSVENOR, and the stinging arraignment of Mark Hanna by Senator WILLIAM E. CHANDLER for boldly attempting to debauch the country and mortgage the Presidency before it is attained, I am prepared, realizing their force, their strength, their applicability to the present condition of affairs, to exclaim, "That's what is the matter with Hanna!" [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Suppose that all that Senator CHANDLER has said were true, which I deny, would the gentleman from Virginia regard it as legitimate for Ambassador Bayard to deliver that kind of "gush" before an English audience in denouncing his own countrymen?

Mr. TUCKER. My friend has misunderstood my point. I am merely examining your witnesses to prove my case. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. You do not call that proof?

Mr. TUCKER. No proof! I do not know anybody that knows better about the inside workings of the Republican party than WILLIAM E. CHANDLER. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know no gentleman better qualified by education and by association to know exactly what is going on in the Republican party.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I understand the gentleman to accept him as a witness on the principle that he has turned state's evidence.

Mr. TUCKER. Well, yes; I have to take him that way. I suppose the gentleman had in his mind the familiar story of the old man who was convicted on the evidence of a man who had turned state's evidence, when he said that he was always sure that the biggest rascal was the first always to turn state's evidence.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And you are going on the principle that you have no other evidence to bolster your case. Is not that it?

Mr. TUCKER. No, my friend; there is ample evidence. It is written in the records of this Government. I have just quoted from Mr. Wilson's speech to show it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. What is the "ample evidence"?

Mr. TUCKER. There is ample evidence of the fact that the protected industries of this country have the "fat fried" out of them annually or semiannually to carry the "grand old party" once more to victory.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Let me ask this question: Suppose such a statement were true, would it be right for one of our ambassadors to say so before a foreign audience? Suppose that our ambassador privately believed that the republican form of government was bad, that we should have some other form, that officers, for instance, should be appointed for life, would the gentleman deem it proper for him to go before a foreign audience and denounce republicanism, the very form of government that had sent him to that country?

Mr. TUCKER. I will answer my friend in this way. He is putting a supposititious case that can not arise. Suppose Mr. Bayard had been delivering a temperance speech on the occasion in question, would my friend think it a subject of criticism if he, in the course of it, had referred to the fact that even in America intemperance had grown to be an enormous evil and vice? I see no reason why he should not have mentioned the fact.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But suppose he was undertaking to demonstrate that our form of government was wicked and our people bad, and referred to the style of election held in the State of Virginia as an illustration, would you regard that as a proper reference on his part? [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. No; because I would know that he was perfectly ignorant then of what he was talking about. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Let me ask the gentleman this: If the Democratic Administration in the last three years has not effectually fried the fat out of all our industries? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Not in the way the gentleman from Virginia is talking about.

Mr. TUCKER. If tribute were levied upon them by both sides it would indeed be cruel and unusual punishment.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must hasten on. I wish to say in conclusion that these resolutions, proposed to be adopted by the House, do not mean anything——

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then why do you oppose them?

Mr. TUCKER. I oppose the resolutions presented by the majority of the committee because they mean nothing. I always like my vote to indicate something when I cast it.

But I want, in all seriousness, to call the attention of the House to the fact that seven years ago we were taught by the present occupant of the chair how "to do business." It was a difficult lesson for some of us to learn, as it was then taught. We did not take to it very kindly, but we were forced to accept it. We learned it—we learned how to do business. The House met here in December last, and the same oracle which had taught us how to do business years ago said "now do nothing." [Laughter.] "I taught you how to do business; the country has sent you here because they were disgusted with these Democrats who could do nothing. But I think the Republican party will be benefited in the Presidential election this fall if the present status is preserved; so do nothing; I repeat it, do nothing"—and this House has done it, with conspicuous diligence. [Laughter.]

The people sent you here to do what? They sent you to do what we had failed to do; and the first declaration of policy, Mr. Speaker, declared to your pupils, whom you had taught how to do business, was, "Do nothing;" and assiduously have they done nothing. And, sir, no principle is better established than that "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." [Laughter and applause.]

You are bound to have something to do; you have started on a "jingo" raid; you have tried to involve us in war with Spain; you have brought in bills to appropriate condemned cannon by the armful and passed them. The people were demanding such measures of relief, no doubt. I want to do you justice. You passed also with commendable zeal a bill to prevent prize fighting and bull fighting. Picture, if you can, the thrill of joy that awakened the despondent hearts of the toiling millions that such relief had at last come to them through the courage and benefaction of a Republican Congress. You have passed bills by the dozen allowing telephone companies to operate in the Indian Territory, that the proceedings of your "do-nothing Congress" may be the more readily vouchsafed to the strolling Indians of the plains.

But what have you done in response to the calls of the people of the country that put you here for a purpose? I ask gentlemen to consider, what have you done in response to the demands of the people of this country except to pass your jingo resolutions, your bills to give away condemned cannon, etc., and that little fippenny bit of a tariff bill, when you promised them the McKinley bill? But while I am no prophet, nor the son of a prophet, I venture to assert that the time will never come when the Republican party will ask in this country again for a McKinley bill. You promised it in the last campaign, but you dare not walk up to the captain's desk and settle according to your contract.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolutions proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs for another reason. I honor Thomas F. Bayard as a citizen of America. I have from my youth up watched his course with pride, as a man that the youth of the country could follow and honor without question. He needs no eulogy at my hands, for under the fierce light of public and private criticism "he has ever worn the white flower of a blameless life." Nor can I forget that in those dark days that followed the late civil war, when reason was dethroned in these halls and passion was holding high carnival, when my people in the South lay prostrate, bleeding at every pore, with anxious hearts and eager eyes straining to catch the sound of one sympathetic voice amid the roar of unbridled passion, Thomas F. Bayard stepped into the arena almost single-handed and alone and cheerfully accepted the gage of battle in behalf of a brave but friendless people. Heaven forgive me, Mr. Speaker, if ever I forget such heroism as his in defense of our suffering people! To him we looked; to that—

Good gray head which all men knew!
That iron nerve to true occasion true!
That tower of strength! That tower of strength!
Which stood four-square to all the winds that blew.

I can not forget when in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol in those days of our calamity there was no voice raised in our defense and no arm uplifted to save us, when the demon of passion with uplifted arm was seeking to drive the last weapon of destruction through the heart of my people, Thomas F. Bayard, with no armor save that of truth and justice, with a chivalry and courage worthy of a knight of the days of King Arthur, met his antagonists in open field and received upon his breast the blow which was intended for others. I can never forget it, sir. No Southern man will ever forget it. No man that loves liberty, courage, honor, and justice can forget his matchless fight for this brave people.

You may pass these resolutions. They will have no effect on Mr. Bayard. They will return to plague the inventor. You can no more hammer down that granitic figure that represents this country abroad to-day, at the Court of St. James, by these resolutions than you could hope to break down Gibraltar with a toy pistol. You may go on and pass your acts of censure, and prove yourselves faithless to the people by violating every pledge you have made them; but believe me, you are not fooling them by this process. The eyes of the country are upon you, and Mr. Bayard will still live in the hearts of the people of this country as long as the fires of liberty burn upon our altars and patriotism has its votaries, as a pure and undefiled statesman, who loved honor and justice, and he will ever stand in the history of our country—

> Like some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
> Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,—
> Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
> Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

[Applause.]

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, after three days of debate upon a subject which is not complicated there is not very much left to be said, and I understand that it is a good deal like tearing a passion into tatters for anyone at this point to manifest any great amount of emotion over the speeches set forth in the resolution.

My friend from Virginia who has just addressed the House [Mr. TUCKER] made an effort to convince us that he really liked to have an ambassador abroad call this nation a "violent" nation. I observed, however, that when he was stating his proposition in various forms he showed that it was difficult for him to get himself quite to that point by saying not "oftentimes violent," as Mr. Bayard said, but by saying "sometimes violent."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that Mr. Bayard, although he showed every desire to eulogize Mr. Cleveland, might have accorded him praise which a great statesman would have more highly relished. Instead of saying that the American people are confronted with great problems, the solution of which requires the brain of a statesman, he attributed to us those qualities of disorder which made out of Mr. Cleveland, in order to govern us, not a great statesman, but a great high sheriff, a great policeman, one whose strong hand could keep down this violent and unruly people.

The gentleman has alluded to the address made by Mr. Lowell. If anyone desires to see how far Mr. Bayard has erred, if anyone desires to see a model of a philosophical address upon the one hand and a model of partisan harangue on the other, for the first let him take Mr. Lowell's address upon "Democracy" and for the second Mr. Bayard's address at Edinburgh.

Mr. Bayard was good enough to inform us that he delivered this address before a philosophical society. It was very kind of him to give us that information. Otherwise we might have inferred that it was delivered before a Democratic convention.

I do not question the proposition that it was the duty of the President of the United States in the first instance to take some action in this matter, but I am utterly unable to respect the proposition advanced by the Democratic members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the House of Representatives does not have the power to investigate the conduct of any officer in the Government and to express its opinion upon the facts found. That power is inherent in this House. Under the Constitution we are the immediate representatives of the people, and their only direct representatives. The President himself is chosen by electors who are chosen by the different States. He is elected for four years. The Senators are elected by the States, without regard to their population, and for the long term of six years. This House springs directly from the people, from districts substantially equal in population, and it receives an added popularity from the frequency of its election. There is no detail of this Government so trivial and no officer so high as to be outside of the sphere of its scrutiny and care.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary to go far to find an exact precedent for the resolutions now before the House. In the last Congress the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky], who on this occasion heads the minority, claiming that the House has no jurisdiction, presented a resolution to this House:

> That it is the sense of this House that the action of the United States minister to the Hawaiian Islands in connection with the revolution that occurred there should be, and is hereby, condemned.

Mr. Speaker, that was upon an international question, it was with regard to the action of a foreign minister, and it was a resolution passed in the House of Representatives. What is the present case? There is even no international question. It is no concern of Great Britain how high a standard we hold up for our public officers. We can enforce, either at home or abroad, a high degree of respect on the part of our public servants, and there is no international question about it. Then, again, Mr. Bayard delivered this speech before a nation that was so closely connected with us by kinship and other ties as to make the affront upon one nation almost an affront on both. If the House of Representatives could censure that old hero, John L. Stevens, for, perhaps, being too zealous an American, for going in the line of the ideas of the Administration that then prevailed, for running up the American flag over that little band of our countrymen who had carried out across the Pacific the institutions of New England and the institutions of the Anglo-Saxon race, then, I say, with far greater propriety and with just as much constitutionality can we censure Mr. Bayard for hauling that flag down. The flag is nothing but an emblem. It simply typifies the dignity and honor of the country, and Mr. Bayard's speeches were reflections on both.

While, therefore, the House has the right to act, I regret that the President did not discharge an obvious duty and administer the reproof that the case required. He apparently regarded it from a purely personal standpoint, because if the American people were set forth as a "violent" people and a people difficult to govern, that did not at all detract from the strength of the hand which kept them from anarchy and held them down. And if Mr. Bayard declared in Edinburgh that the American protectionists were corrupt and American protection was wicked, no one had used words more numerous and certainly more large to establish that proposition than Mr. Cleveland himself. Mr. Cleveland apparently eliminated the American people from the transaction and complacently absorbed the praise that was given him at their expense.

If the Boston speech were the only one concerned here, it would hardly be necessary to give it any attention, although he showed in that speech an underlying contempt for republican institutions. It was delivered upon what he terms a "humorous and postprandial occasion," and a great deal is to be pardoned in a speech made under such circumstances. It is to be noticed, however, that not even under the postprandial influence that prevailed did he use one word that could by any possibility be construed to reflect upon Grover Cleveland; but he did use language concerning the American people which could be construed as reflecting upon them, and which indeed was susceptible of no other construction.

In regard to the Edinburgh speech, that has been so often read during this debate that I will not weary you by making more than an allusion to it. But it is entirely apparent that he was referring to protection, as it is a campaign issue in this country. He said:

> In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled "protection," which I believe has done more to foster class legislation and to create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils * * * than any other single cause.

And—

> Thus it has done so much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen.

This was nothing more in effect than personal abuse; not merely denunciation of the principles of the party to which he was opposed, but an abuse of every member of that party.

One of the "jobbers and chafferers" who established the principle of protection in this country was George Washington. Another one who aided him in establishing that principle was Alexander Hamilton; and if you take out of our history the achievements of those men who have advocated the doctrine of protection you have taken out much indeed that is glorious.

Mr. Speaker, the principal purpose I have in speaking to-day is to say that while I shall vote for these resolutions I regret that the Committee on Foreign Affairs did not report them in a somewhat different form. I think that as this is a legislative act it should have been general in its form, with its motive clearly the statements in these two speeches of Mr. Bayard. That would have had all the effect of censure, and at the same time would not have followed precedents, which I do not regard as the very best, of aiming legislation, as was done by the last House of Representatives, directly against an individual. The effect would have been no different. It still would have been a censure upon Mr. Bayard, but would at the same time have indirectly accomplished that by laying down a salutary general rule.

Such a censure as that he deserves. When we think of the great men who have represented this country at the Court of St. James—John Quincy Adams, and his son, Charles Francis Adams, who was there during the storms of war, and by his diplomacy, patriotism, and great discretion enhanced the good opinion that was entertained of this country there, and of the wit and learning of Lowell and Motley—and then when we contemplate our present ambassador to that court, making statements that Mr. Bayard admits he made, we are filled with shame and humiliation. The shame and humiliation, Mr. Speaker, came upon this country when Ambassador Bayard uttered those speeches, and we can, perhaps, remove them to some degree, in view of the fact that the President has taken no action, by expressing our consideration of them as the representatives of the people. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest poets of England, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, has characterized in his own language the situation which we are confronted with to-day.

These are his words, and I desire to call them to the especial attention of the gentleman from Virginia who has just taken his seat. He says:

When a party man talks as if he hated his country, saddens at her prosperous events, exults in her disasters, and yet all the while is merely hating the opposite party and would himself feel and talk as a patriot were he in a foreign land, he is a party man. The true monster is he (and such, alas, there are in these monstrous days, "vollendeter Sundhaftigkeit") who abuses his country when out of his country.

Mr. Speaker, that is the text upon which I propose to base my advocacy of these resolutions. I do not intend in the few remarks that I shall make to be led into any extraneous discussion as to whether any personal friend has contributed out of his own pocket to the necessary campaign expenses of a Presidential candidate, or to be diverted to a discussion of whether or not protection has been the national policy of this country. The attempt to befog the offense of Ambassador Bayard with other issues is too clear.

I wish to confine myself to Thomas F. Bayard, who now misrepresents the United States of America at the Court of St. James, and to prove by the record that any censure passed upon him by this House will be less than he deserves. I will not long discuss the Boston speech.

As has been said by my colleague who has just concluded [Mr. MCCALL], it was a speech made as part of the proceedings of a long and varied day. He presented diplomas; he was, in turn, presented with a book which cost at least 67 cents at some London bookstore. He was taken to a banquet where he toasted the Queen of England, where the President of the United States was toasted, where Mr. Bayard himself was toasted and presented with an illuminated address. I think that under such circumstances, after so many bumpers, anything that he may have said is hardly worthy of serious criticism.

I do object, however, to the statements which he made at Edinburgh, uttered in sober calmness, written out with deliberation, made not only to reflect upon the people of his own country and the fiscal policy of England's greatest colonies, but also to inject his personal opinions into an active campaign that was then being carried on in England, a speech at variance with his own public record, a declaration to which his own votes cast in the Congress of the United States give a distinct and absolute rebuttal. Without reading any extract from the Edinburgh speech, which has been fully set forth here, I desire to call the attention of our Democratic friends who maintain that Mr. Bayard's utterances were perfectly proper to the comments which have been made upon them in the English press; all American newspaper criticisms, almost as a unit condemnatory, I omit. Naming the English press, I take as the most radical representative of it that former American, George W. Smalley, who can be counted upon at any time to voice the most conservative anti-American sentiment of the British public. Said Mr. Smalley in the London Times of December 26, 1895, speaking of Mr. Bayard's speech:

Most of his friends at home regret the indiscretion of his Edinburgh address and the lesser indiscretion of the Boston speech. On that point there is much difference of opinion between London and New York or Washington. It is thought very generally and very strongly that an ambassador ought never to have let loose his invective abroad against a great party of his own countrymen or to have denounced a policy which is the policy probably of a majority—certainly of at least a very large minority—of the American people. The attack was direct, vehement, personal, and altogether indefensible.

I find in the Melbourne Age, an English paper of noted ability, published at the very antipodes of the world, this comment upon Mr. Bayard's taste in making this Edinburgh address:

As a matter of taste alone, Mr. Bayard's conduct was execrable. To criticise in an adverse spirit the fiscal policy of his own country in the foreign State to which he was accredited is a departure in international politics which is almost without a parallel. At home he was quite entitled to advocate his sectional views, but as a representative of the nation at large he was obviously not justified in vilifying the majority of the people by whom his salary is paid. His conduct amounts to a virtual impeachment of his own country at the bar of British opinion. Nothing could be grosser or more untrue than Mr. Bayard's denunciation of his political opponents as the authors of corruption in the political life of the United States. Every community represented in any way in Great Britain is interested in putting a stop to such proceedings as those of Mr. Bayard.

Again, in order to show the effect of this language of Mr. Bayard in affording arguments to those who desire to make light of our institutions and of our country, I quote from a paper called The Rockhampton Bulletin, published in the city of Rockhampton, on the eastern coast of Australia. What does this paper say and what inference does it draw from Mr. Bayard's remarks? In its issue of November 15, 1895, this paper, speaking of the charges made by Mr. Bayard, says:

If such open corruption were practiced in these colonies the men guilty of it would be visited with stern punishment at the first election. But that is not the case in the United States. The national tone has been so lowered by a long course of this corruption that little notice is taken of such practices. Politics are reduced to the level of racing, where every kind of swindling is indulged in, and only once in a while is any culprit punished.

Mr. Speaker, these extracts will indicate to the House something of the impression made upon the British public and upon people throughout the world by the speech of our ambassador to England in derogation of the good name and the policy of the United States. And yet members on the other side of this Chamber have seen fit to rise here and claim that, as he told the truth, as they claim, in a party way, to see it, he was justified in making such statements. Not only has the attempt been made to defend Mr. Bayard, but it has also been sought to impeach the motives of those who have called him before this bar. I find in the New York Herald an article in defense of Mr. Bayard written by this same George W. Smalley, which illustrates this attempt to impeach the motives of those who have asked that Mr. Bayard be censured for these libels upon his own people. Here is what Mr. Smalley says in the New York Herald about those who support this action:

He would not violate his duty. He would not disobey the instructions of his Government in order to obey the inner circle of the Federation and the murderers of Cronin. Mr. BARRETT comes from a State which was once the foremost American Commonwealth, and which to-day may boast that 40 per cent of its population is Irish. He is doing, in his own way, the work which Sullivan and Finerty and Rossa and the rest tried to do in theirs and failed. He ought to be proud of his success and of his position on the left flank of a party which identifies itself with assassins and dynamiters.

There you get an idea of the attempt which has been made to have it known in England and in this country that the men and the Republican party who are seeking to hold Mr. Bayard to some decent sense of accountability are linked hand in hand with "assassins and dynamiters"! Now I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about it, that my ancestors have lived on this American soil for many more years than the ancestors of Mr. Bayard. If I, as a member on this side of the House, am to be accused of being hand in hand with "assassins and dynamiters," this at least can be said that we never struck hands with Mr. Thomas F. Bayard in a dishonest and cowardly attempt to strike down the flag of the United States and to disrupt the Republic. [Applause.] How many of these "assassins and dynamiters," as Mr. Bayard's apologists term them, ever voted with or supported any other party than that which made him our representative in Great Britain?

At this point I want to do justice to a gentleman who has written me a letter in regard to a misrepresentation made by Mr. Bayard. Mr. Bayard, in his Edinburgh attempt to discredit the national policy of his country by contrasting it unfavorably with that of England, made a reference to our shipping laws. In doing so he endeavored to justify himself by pretending to quote from an address delivered at a congress of farmers at Atlanta by a former commissioner of navigation.

This former commissioner of navigation, Mr. W. W. Bates, writes to me from Chicago. This is what he says:

927 MONADNOCK BLOCK,
Chicago, Ill., January 8, 1896.

DEAR SIR: I have been ill or would sooner have sent you the inclosed clipping from the Inter Ocean of this city, showing that in his quotation from my address at Atlanta (which find inclosed) Mr. Bayard garbled its words and meaning. If you do anything further with the case I hope you will show what manner of man he is to make quotations.

Very respectfully, yours,
WM. W. BATES,
Ex-Commissioner of Navigation.

Hon. W. E. BARRETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I have examined Mr. Bates's address; I have compared it with Mr. Bayard's quotations; and I affirm that Mr. Bates tells the literal truth when he says that in order to substantiate a partisan, political speech intended to tickle British ears at our expense our ambassador deliberately, intentionally, and maliciously misquoted and misrepresented the utterances made by Mr. Bates. Is that becoming in the "academic" utterances of our chief foreign ambassador?

It has been claimed here, Mr. Speaker, by inference, if not by direct assertion, that Mr. Bayard was justified in making this speech, or at least that there is no excuse for criticising him on account of it, because he has not directly violated any of the instructions of the Department. Yet, when the gentleman from Kentucky read those instructions it appeared as a matter of fact that this ambassador was ordered by the Department never to interfere in, by word or act, the political issues of the country to which he was accredited.

You on the Democratic side may be aware that there is a very large protectionist sentiment growing up in Great Britain. You may be aware that a very few days after this speech was delivered by Mr. Bayard there was a notable gathering of members of Parliament and men prominent in public life in Great Britain to inaugurate a movement to establish protection in that country. You may have noticed that within a few days the Government of Great Britain, although nominally for free trade, has adopted an order that no cattle shall be imported into Great Britain under any circumstances whatever, and that the Canadian high commissioner has entered his solemn protest against that order.

Wishing to ascertain from a responsible source whether such a sentiment existed in Great Britain, I wrote a letter to one of the most conspicuous members of the House of Commons, whose name had come to me through newspaper channels as interested in this protectionist discussion. His reply goes to show that Mr. Bayard, in a public speech in the country to which he was accredited, in endeavoring to prejudice the principle of protection and to furnish arguments against its adoption, was directly violating the orders of the Department, in which it directed that he should not interfere in any political issue at stake in that country. Says this member of Parliament:

You will probably by this time have seen the London Times newspaper of December 14, in which there appears a report of the meeting to which you allude as having been held the previous day, and you will therein find an answer to part of your inquiries.

I may add, however, that it is beyond all question that there has been of late an immense change in English public feeling upon the question of protection. The former prejudice in favor of so-called "free trade" has yielded to a very general desire to consider fiscal subjects upon their intrinsic merits, as applicable to particular cases and industries, apart altogether from their relation to abstract theories one way or the other. Among owners and occupiers of land it is difficult to meet with a free trader, though the laborers in rural districts are only beginning to realize that the reduction in arable cultivation and the wholesale throwing of land out of any cultivation whatever means ruin to them also.

The fact is that, owing to their wages having been kept up artificially for some years past, they did not feel the pinch, which, however, has at last come and is rapidly bringing all the agricultural classes into line upon this question. The manufacturing interests are likewise more and more coming round to the necessity of protecting themselves against foreign competition, and protection has strong support in many of the largest towns of Lancashire and Yorkshire, while the shopkeepers in the mother country towns, who depend for customers upon the agricultural interest, are all over the country largely protectionist. How far our public men have advanced in this direction it is difficult to judge definitely until the newly elected members come to deal with the question in the House of Commons, but you may be sure that no Parliament for fifty years has contained so many supporters of protectionist principles, though I ought to add that until the country has given out its views more clearly than has as yet been the case I do not anticipate any immediate change of our fiscal policy. I was very glad to see the action you took with reference to the extraordinary course adopted by your ambassador in his speech at Edinburgh.

Yours faithfully, JAMES LOWTHER.

Hon. W. E. BARRETT.

I claim, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Bayard, in injecting himself into a public discussion which was being carried on by the public men of Great Britain concerning their own fiscal policy, has directly violated the instructions which our friends on the other side have claimed do not apply to his case.

In addition, Mr. Bayard's speech contains studied reflections upon that part of our system of laws which in so many States of the Union regulate the hours of labor of mechanics and artisans. Among the noblest sections of our statute books, in which respect it is a source of pride to say that Massachusetts leads the van, are those which seek to elevate labor by protecting it against the unhealthful and unendurable hours of employment. They mark the height of civilization and form one of the bright, redeeming features in the social outlook. And yet, in this tirade of his, Mr. Bayard has directed his spleen against a system well established both in England and America. Is this "academic"? Or is it rather another exhibition of Mr. Bayard's constant evident lack of appreciation of the masses of the people and the legislation which seeks to improve their condition?

But they say he did nothing in the way of action; that all he did was in the way of words; and that you can not criticise a man for free speech. The gentlemen who make this defense must realize that sometimes a man occupying a high public place may by traitorous or indecent language do a graver injury to his country than would some humble man who in momentary rage might try by force of arms to destroy his government.

But, to show that we can take cognizance of words, I wish to call attention to a very peculiar coincidence. In 1797 the first articles of impeachment known to the history of this Government were presented; and the man who presented those articles on the part of this House was James A. Bayard, of Delaware, a progenitor of the man now under discussion. He presented those articles against Senator William Blount, of Tennessee. One of the charges was—

That he had conspired and contrived to diminish and impair the confidence of the Cherokee Nation in the Government of the United States.

I say that whereas the elder Bayard, in the later days of the last century, with a quick sense of loyalty, brought in an impeachment against a man who had tried to impair the confidence of the Cherokee Nation in this Government, we find here a man of the same name, holding a great position at a court where our interests are most at stake, deliberately going about in that country and raising up a cry of denunciation and attack upon the people whom he represents, which, if it had been true, would have justified this country being held in contempt by the very people with whom he was bound to maintain our credit.

Senator William Blount resigned his seat in the Senate. In the elder Bayard's day it was an offense to "diminish and impair confidence in the Government of the United States."

It is alleged also that we have no right to criticise an officer of the executive department. I think it was the gentleman from Kentucky who raised that issue here yesterday. Has he forgotten that in 1862 this House of Representatives passed a resolution seriously censuring the then Secretary of War, Mr. Simon Cameron? And has he forgotten that Abraham Lincoln, then President of the United States, in sending to the House of Representatives a remonstrance against that resolution, did not undertake to argue for a moment that the House had not the right to pass that censure, but simply said that he indorsed all that Mr. Cameron had done, and if the censure was proper at all it should have been equally applied to himself and to the other members of his Cabinet?

In this case the censure of the House, if these resolutions are adopted, must be partly borne by the President for retaining in so important a post a man with such ideas of official propriety.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gravity of Mr. Bayard's offense is demonstrated beyond question. I think that the propriety of the action proposed by the House of Representatives must be apparent, politics aside, to all the members.

But we are confronted with the statement that a man who is the representative of such an illustrious lineage, a man who has been such a cynosure, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] said Mr. Bayard had been, in the eyes of the young men of his State and of the country, a man who has held such high public places, a man who has been honored by his people, and who has been consistent in a long public career, ought not to be held up for public criticism because of one lapse in the course of a lifetime.

While I have not any personal feeling against this representative at the Court of Great Britain, I think it is but fair to him as well as to the members of this House that something of his relations toward the Government of the United States in the past should be made known.

Not so many years ago a considerable section of this country found itself forcibly attempting to disrupt the Union. Concerning the action of men whose States went into the rebellion I have no criticism in this connection to make. Especially for those who bravely risked their lives upon the field of battle on the issues then made up I have nothing but admiration. Bravery and devotion, even to a wrong cause, may command honest regard.

On the 9th day of July, 1861, when Fort Sumter had been fired upon, when the issue of war had been framed, when the forces were massing for the great battle of Bull Run, Thomas F. Bayard made a speech in the little town of Dover, Del., which I have been at some pains to secure, and which I shall ask to have printed in full in the RECORD with my remarks.

Coming from a Northern man in a Northern State, where no attempt at secession was made; coming from a man who at the time bore a commission under which he had sworn to maintain the Union, it is a speech which amply foreshadows the Edinburgh condemnation. In that speech he pleaded that the country might be divided. He urged that the Administration of President Lincoln was acting in an unconstitutional way; that the efforts to coerce the seceding States were unwarranted; that they could not and should not be coerced. He then, as now, showed that his sympathies were in any line that would be pleasant upon the ears of those who disagreed with us.

BAYARD FOR PEACE IN 1861—THE FULL TEXT OF HIS FAMOUS DOVER SPEECH EARLY IN THE WAR—REMARKS ON WHICH THE CHARGE OF DISLOYALTY TO THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT HAS BEEN FOUNDED—MR. BAYARD REGARDED PEACE, NOT CIVIL WAR, AS THE TRUE ROAD TO REUNION.

[From the Delaware Gazette of July 9, 1861.]

MY FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN: By no narrow party name, in no narrow partisan spirit, do I address you, but as an assemblage of American freemen do I congratulate you upon our meeting of this day. Important as are the issues we are here met to consider, one result is accomplished most gratifying to all fair-minded men which I can not pass by without notice. I mean the right of meeting unrestrained and of free, unrestrained discussion by freemen of this Government and the policy and measures of those into whose hands it has temporarily been intrusted. It is well known to us all that a reign of terror was sought to be inaugurated in this State, as it has been throughout the North, and for this purpose troops, not of our State, were encamped upon our peaceful soil at the instance of these politicians among us, whose insolence and oppression are limited only by their fear and their ability to do mischief.

To-day we stand here in the spirit of freemen to vindicate our privilege and perform our duty as citizens despite the reiterated threats of a profligate and lawless press in neighboring cities upon the north, echoed by papers in this State equally shameless and corrupt.

It is known to us all that personal intimidation has been applied to each man present to deter him from coming here to-day. That many worthy but timid men have been affected by such miserable means is not to be denied, but the best answer to these hounds of the mob who sought to prevent a lawful meeting called in the sacred name of our country's peace is the assemblage now before me. Never in this State has it been exceeded in numbers and respectability. We have, it is true, no high judicial officer to leave the bench and take part in the excited scenes of politics; we have no delegation of persons from the city of Philadelphia, but we have the substantial citizens of Delaware, with as great a stake in her fair name and prosperity as any others in her borders.

In times of danger and distress like the present the country needs most the intelligent aid of her best citizens, and now, if ever, should they give her the best efforts of their hands and hearts, undeterred by the wild passions and frenzied violence which have swept over the Northern States like a whirlwind.

The question for every good man now to ask is: "My country, what can I do to restore your peace and happiness?" The past and its lessons should not be lost upon us, but to inquire now into the original cause or causes of our troubles would not be within the scope of these remarks nor useful at present. The practical question before us forbids mere speculation; it stares us in the face—a hard, stern fact.

Eleven States have withdrawn from the Federal Union with solemn and deliberate action, and have united under a new government. They have made their declaration of independence of the Government under which we live and express their determination to maintain it at every cost. With this secession, or revolution, or rebellion, or by whatever name it may be called, the State of Delaware has had naught to do. To our constitutional duties toward each and every member of the Union we have been faithful in all times. Never, never has a thought, a word, an act of ours been unfaithful to the Union of our fathers. In letter and in spirit it has been faithfully kept by us. But the stern fact is still before us, and but two alternatives present themselves. Shall we make war upon and subjugate this new Confederacy or shall we peacefully treat with them and consent to their self-government, trusting to time, which is the greater healer of all wrongs and passions, to bring them again voluntarily into a common government with us?

Take the proposition of war, of horrid civil war, my countrymen; grant to the Northern arms complete success. Suppose that every Southern city be reduced to ghastly ruin, every peaceful Southern home desolated, and every Southern man slain or made captive. This is the evident completest realization of that dream of conquest so horribly satisfactory to those minds in control of the Northern press. But what then? Will a union with slaves and the possession of a desert satisfy you? You do not and can not expect love and aid in times of your necessity from those States you have so cruelly subdued. It is too plain, therefore, that your success in such a war would be the most fatal injury to yourselves.

And is such a war necessary for the peace and happiness of the United States? For half a century we have lived at peace with Great Britain, with her Canadian Possessions upon our northern border. Upon the south Mexico holds her Government with no threats of trouble to us or our citizens. Why, then, may not two American confederacies exist side by side without conflict, each emulating the other in the progress of civilization? The coterminous kingdoms of Europe offer many examples of similar peace and prosperity. With such a sickening alternative as civil war, why should not the experiment at least be made? It is this question we are to pass upon to-day. I believe with the late Senator Douglas, who has before been quoted to-day, that "A war is a disunion, certain, final, inevitable," and so believing, I oppose it. I believe solemnly that the war inaugurated by Abraham Lincoln and his Cabinet is worse than fruitless; that it will prove more disastrous to the North than to the South, and never will accomplish its professed objects.

Already it has driven out of our Union four States, while others stand in doubt. When I take up the public papers and see the markets of the world disordered and depressed by the mere apprehension of this war; when I turn to our own business circles and see men of wealth reduced to poverty, our merchants bankrupted, our mechanics and laboring men threatened with absolute starvation, I would fain hide my face in grief. But confronting this wide scene of human distress I sadly seek to find relief from it. If war, or the mere prospect of it, has in three short months worked all this distress, what an increase of trouble are we to anticipate should it proceed in all its detail of oppressive taxation, destruction, demoralization, and sorrow. Human governments were ordained for the happiness and protection of society. If peace will restore and secure these blessings to the people of the United States, even though a number of their former associates have gone off under a new and independent organization, in the name of Heaven let us raise our voice for it.

Shall this earnest cry for peace be stifled at the bidding of a host of fanatical and cowardly editors, aided by an army of greedy contractors and public leeches, stimulating an ignorant mob to denounce and attack us as traitors and secessionists? We know it shall not, and this day do we proclaim our duty to our country and our intention to perform it.

The Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln have affected to treat all the seceded States as still members of the Union. If so, surely they are entitled to all those privileges which the Constitution gives them, while they are also subject to its penalties. Yet war in all its forms, by land and sea, with all its severities, has been levied against these States, and the forms and most positive limits of the Constitution, which is the supreme law of this land, to the President and Cabinet as to the humblest private citizen, have been steadily and contemptuously disregarded in its prosecution. The act of war is a solemn act at any time; in a war against our brethren of the South it is surely tenfold so. By the express terms of the Constitution, the right to declare war is delegated to Congress. The President has no such power. But he has, without even the forms of submission to Congress, in palpable violation of the charter of Government, which is his guide as it is ours, summoned a gigantic army, and that, too, for an extended time, exceeding the term limited by the Constitution for the appropriation to support armed forces. The question of peace or war, I say, was never reposed in any President or Cabinet. Congress alone possesses the power to declare war, and in the present case I protest that our people have never been allowed any opportunity to vote and express their wishes on this momentous and terrible issue. Had it been given them last winter, I believe our beloved Union would this day have been firmly knit by the bonds of good will and good faith which originally formed it and alone can preserve it.

But the infractions of the Constitution by those officials into whose hands the reins of government have passed have not ended here. The invasions of personal liberty in our sister State of Maryland have been such as to justly alarm and almost dishearten those who believed our free institutions were not mere forms, to be blotted out at the caprice or tyranny of our temporary rulers.

The seizure of telegraphic messages, the invasion of the privacy of the mails, the arrest and imprisonment without judicial process of citizens, have followed each other in startling succession. These acts are simply usurpations, not without color of law, but against express rights.

You and I are citizens of Delaware. To her laws and government we owe allegiance. Through our State we owe allegiance to the Federal Government, of which she is a member. But as State officials can command us to no duty unknown to State laws, neither can a Federal officer claim any authority over us in matters not within his constitutional and legal control. A palpable infraction of our written charter of government by our rulers justifies disobedience upon the part of a citizen as much as lawful orders are entitled to loyal compliance.

And, fellow citizens, never in our nation's history were her citizens called upon more strictly to call her agents to account than now. The so-called "military necessities" are beguiling and dangerous in the extreme. The conquest of the South will be a poor recompense to the North if our system of Government be the price we are to pay for it. Obedience and good faith toward a Government which protects him is the primary duty of a good citizen; but where that Government is one of limited power, and those limitations created for the preservation of individual liberty against the aggression of rulers or majorities, let us take heed lest in seeking to place a yoke upon others we awake to find one upon our own necks. Who can say, with the present war measures of the Administration and the spectacle of Maryland before us, how long a trace of constitutional liberty will remain for the other States in the Union, and how soon a stern military despotism may usurp the place of the Constitution and the laws? Let us as freemen stand prepared in all lawful ways to resist the inauguration of such a degrading condition of affairs, no matter how plausible or specious may be the plea under which it is urged.

Let no man believe that he may ever safely violate a great principle. The poisoned chalice will some day be commended to his own lips. And if we to-day pass lightly over the outrage upon the rights of John Merryman, we may to-morrow mourn in our own persons of similar wrongs to his. If he has transgressed the laws, let them be fully vindicated. But it has been our boast that the humblest person, nay, the meanest felon, has civil rights preceding his punishment which no ruler can justly deny him of. Let us stand by the laws.

The matter, in conclusion, I ask you to hear and consider carefully.

A gentleman from Newcastle County, who has been your United States Senator for more than ten years past, I have the honor to call my father. If there be one thing he has tried fully and fairly to do, it has been to represent the people of this State. And you will do him the justice to say he never deceived you nor ever will. His worst foe will agree to that. The present issues that distract our country were not in existence when he was chosen as your representative, and of late, as you are aware, having taken decided ground upon them, he has been called upon by voices many and loud to resign his seat in the Senate.

The motives of those who have been the most prominent in such requests are of little moment, although their disguise is in many cases but flimsy. To a just man, however, a sense of good faith and self-respect would prevent his remaining at any time in a false position. If, therefore, he professes to represent a people, it must be in fact, not in name only. The legislature now in existence were not elected with reference to present issues, nor can they claim to represent public sentiment in regard to them. The proposition of Mr. Bayard, then, is that the legislature shall resign their seats, and he will then resign his seat in the Senate. The governor, under the provisions of the constitution, can call a special election to fill the vacancies in the legislature, and at an extra session in the next month the public sense can be fairly taken, and the will of the majority expressed. If it be then found that the people of Delaware are in favor of carrying on this war against the Confederate States, they will elect such a legislature as will send a proper man to the Senate to carry out such a policy and sustain the present Administration. If not, they may elect whom they see fit, to lend his power to restore peace to our land.

Let us, fellow-men, follow peace as our bright North Star, whose radiance may be mild but never delusive or uncertain, while in the calamities of war, and in that worst of wars, a civil war, we shall only reach by sheer exhaustion the peace we can now command in ten days by treaty.

At this very time Mr. Bayard was an officer in the military service, bound by oath to defend the Union.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1861, about the time the rebellion of the States was got under way, there existed in Delaware a little regiment of militia, which had had no organization of a palpable form. In that winter an attempt was made to secure arms from the Federal Government for the use of the regiment. Arms were issued. During the spring of 1861 that regiment was drilled and put in a considerable state of efficiency under a commission from the State of Delaware, and bearing arms furnished by the Government of the United States.

When Sumter was fired upon and the militia of the South were rallying for the support of their cause, and loyal men were responding with no less ardor and valor in maintenance of their side from all over the country, when the patriotic men from Delaware by twos and threes, and by scores, without organization, were wending their way to seek service in behalf of the Federal Government, not a word was said nor a suggestion made on the part of this well-disciplined militia that they desired to enter the service to defend the Union. As the spring and summer wore away, the Government at Washington became more strongly established. It was time to act! An officer of the Union Army was sent to Delaware, because it was believed that these troops were not loyal to the nation. He was sent to take from them the arms which they had secured from the Federal Government. That order was carried into effect, and you will find in the report of the officer who seized these arms that he took from the company commanded by "Capt." Thomas F. Bayard 60 stand of arms! The Chevalier Bayard of whom we have heard in this debate died in the battle line defending his flag. This one, who wanted his country peacefully divided, was disarmed by the order of his Government.

Mr. Blaine, who after a long and heated political career, in which his best friends were often found on either political side, who had never been known, except under the stress of provocation, to say an unkind thing or to utter an unpleasant thought of any man, wrote a book which is now read by thousands of people of this country as a standard authority on the political history of the last generation. In that book he spoke of all the great Democratic leaders, all the men whose praises have been treasured on the other side, in words of high admiration and of praise. In those two great volumes there is not an unkind remark about any contemporary, with two exceptions. One of them was Mr. Thomas F. Bayard. This is what Mr. Blaine said of Mr. Bayard at the time when the life of the nation was at stake:

It was evidently not deemed prudent by Mr. Bayard to repeat his disunion views. After Fort Lafayette, at Mr. Seward's command, had opened its doors to men who publicly expressed disloyal sentiments in the North, Mr. Bayard gave to the rebellion the benefit of his silence. The great struggle went on; myriads of patriots stepped to the ranks of the Union Army; the people were fired with love of country; from every loyal platform and every loyal pulpit rang out words of faith and hope for the cause and for its defenders. But Mr. Bayard's silence was unbroken even by the thunders of Gettysburg, almost within sound of his home, or by the closing and complete triumph of the national arms. He has spoken words of sympathy and encouragement to the enemies of the Union. He never uttered a word of cheer for its friends.

Is it strange, Mr. Speaker, that in the atmosphere of the British court, where men who had theretofore been most loyal and devoted to the principles and institutions of their country, have sometimes seemed to falter and weaken; is it strange that a man who, in the extreme moment of national peril, when others were doing what they could by voice and action to maintain the integrity of the Government, had it said of him, in a calm, dispassionate way, that not one word or sign of encouragement for the defenders of the Union ever emanated from his lips—is it strange that such a man, in the atmosphere of the British court, forgets what is due from him to his country as its accredited representative?

An attempt has been made to quote the words of the late James Russell Lowell in his English speech on "Democracy" as an excuse for Mr. Bayard's utterances in an attack upon this country. Let me say of Mr. James Russell Lowell that while he was not a politician and was not used to public life, but a man of letters, the address on "Democracy," which has been quoted here is, throughout its length and breadth, a deliberate and sincere defense of American institutions and American principles. It is true that he brought out, by admission, some of the faults, by everyone admitted, connected with the government of large cities, but he showed that this Government of the rule of democracy had builded more deeply and constructed more loftily than anyone had ever dreamed, and had laid the foundations for a national happiness unequaled in the history of the world.

It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Bayard in making these utterances against protection and in favor of free trade was animated by principles which he could not lay aside and which he could not suppress. The inference has been that Mr. Bayard as a free trader was so devoted to those academic theories that no matter under what circumstances he might be situated he felt bound to give utterance to them.

Mr. Bayard in his speech at Edinburgh denounced monopolies and trusts. He denounced the system of protection under which they had been built up. Mr. Bayard an enemy of monopoly! Mr. Bayard opposed to protection! Perhaps so, when the interests of other States were concerned. Certainly not when Delaware monopolies and tariffs hung in the scale. The great Diamond Match Trust found in the Senate of the United States when its cause was on trial no other advocate than Thomas F. Bayard. Even when its monopoly was shown and when its suppression of free competition had been fully made clear, Mr. Bayard still stood in the Senate of the United States and endeavored to put on a tariff bill legislation which should protect it in its monopoly.

In the summer of 1882 a tariff bill was under discussion in the Senate of the United States. One of the things which the Republicans, then in control, joined by a great many Democrats, attempted to accomplish was to strike off the internal-revenue tax on matches. Matches at that time were manufactured in this country by the great Diamond Match Trust, which had its headquarters in Wilmington, Del., and its manufactories scattered over eight or ten States of the Union. It had passed regulations in regard to the sale and consumption of its product and would not sell to anyone who would not agree to those restrictions.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HITT. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how much more time he requires?

Mr. BARRETT. I think I can get through in fifteen minutes.

Mr. HITT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARRETT. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, an attempt was made to take off the internal-revenue tax on matches, which was a monopoly managed by a trust whose headquarters was Wilmington, Del., and which had then not one single advocate in the other branch of Congress except Mr. Bayard. That it was a trust is shown by the declaration of Senator MORRILL, who said of it:

> The only parties in this country who desire assistance of this tax are monopolies.

Mr. VEST of Missouri, then as now one of the leading Democrats in the United States Congress, made this statement concerning it:

> It is one of the most monstrous and odious monopolies known to the people of the United States.

When the matter came to a vote, be it said to the credit of the Democrats of that body that, although Mr. Bayard—this sincere free trader and hater of monopolies and trusts—devoted all his personal interest and influence as the Democratic leader to secure the retention of that tax, yet besides himself only seven Democratic Senators could be found to join with him, and the tax was stricken off by a vote of 44 to 8. In the succeeding winter the tariff bill was considered again. He endeavored to have a high protective duty put upon matches to protect this "most monstrous and odious monopoly" from competition.

Mr. VEST again objected, and when Mr. Bayard attacked him, Mr. VEST declared in language which is worthy of consideration by the Democrats in this House, saying:

> As a Democrat I announce that I believe in a tariff for revenue, with discriminations in favor of American industries and American protection, reiterating simply the declaration of all the leaders of the Democratic party since 1836, reiterating simply the declarations in the platform of the Democratic party.

Later Mr. Bayard advocated a high protective duty on gunpowder, which was also a product peculiar to his town of Wilmington. I call out these facts, Mr. Speaker, in order to show that in the attacks made by Mr. Bayard upon protection he could not set up any claim of personal consistency. His own record as a Senator shows that when the "trust and monopoly" was in his own town, when the "protection" was for a Wilmington product, he could appear as the advocate of the "monopoly" and of high protective duties. [Applause.]

My friend the ex-governor of Kentucky, in his able presentation here yesterday afternoon, alluded to the fact that one minister had been recalled with his hearty approval, because he had failed to maintain the honor and dignity of the American flag. He alludes to an incident of recent history—the Barrundia case—with which his name is connected inseparably. In this matter, where a man was shot to death on an American ship by a posse of one of the small Central American Republics, while the American minister and the commander of an American man-of-war with guns shotted refused to interfere to prevent that outrage, my friend from Kentucky approved the recall of Minister Mizner. I agree with him that it was a case which should bring a blush. Yet he can not forget that Minister Mizner based his defense—and the only defense he had to make—upon a letter of instructions issued to him and to the other ministers of the United States abroad, by Mr. Thomas F. Bayard when he was Secretary of State. I say to my friend from Kentucky that if he disapproves and condemns that cowardly murder of an unarmed man under the flag of the United States for political reasons, that he will find that the only justification ever given for its being permitted was a letter of instructions issued by Thomas F. Bayard when he was Secretary of State of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said here by the Democrats about partisanship and the failure of the Republican party to maintain its pledges since it came into power in this House. The party has left undone many things which it would have done if it had been in full possession and control of the legislation of this Government. I undertake to say that the history of this House has been that the Republican majority has given up any attempt at partisan advantage; has given up any effort to enforce its peculiar views upon the country in the field of legislation in order to remedy national needs upon lines which could receive the signature of the President of the United States. And "this miserable 15 per cent horizontal tariff bill," to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has referred, was simply an effort made by the Republicans of this House—abandoning for the moment, under the pressure of circumstances, the principles to which they are devoted—to give to the Government money enough to maintain it and its credit at home and abroad.

We passed a bond bill to prevent further scandals in the issue of bonds and the Secretary of the Treasury publicly assailed it.

We are going to pass an immigration bill. We are going to pass a bankruptcy bill, to care for the flood of bankruptcy which Democratic rule brought upon us.

When the time comes, when the next Congress shall meet in this Capitol with a tremendous Republican majority in this branch and an ample Republican majority on the other side, and a true and tried Republican President in the White House, we propose to pass a tariff bill of which no man will be able to say that it is a monument of "party perfidy and dishonor." [Applause.]

We will put our currency on a sound and permanent basis. We will take from American industry the bonds which now embarrass us. Accuse us of partisanship, Mr. Speaker. Was it partisanship when we tried to uphold the President's hands in the Venezuelan matter? If there ever was an opportunity where a hostile majority could have taken issue on the method in which the proper thing was done, it could have been found in the President's unexpected and wicked arrangement of messages to this Congress on the financial and Venezuelan matters, calculated to drive the great commercial centers into a panic.

But under the guidance of the Speaker and of the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Republicans of this House, without any attempt to make party advantage out of it, adopted the suggestion of the President of the United States and put into his hands such ample authority as has enabled him, for the moment at least, to rescue out of complete popular condemnation an Administration of which up to the time of the Venezuelan incident not one favorable word had been uttered for months, and which had deservedly lost the confidence of the country. [Applause.]

We have sunk partisanship in the desire to bind up and not open the nation's wounds, confident that with the record already made no further demonstration of Democratic incompetency is necessary in order to insure Republican victories in the autumn.

In presenting these resolutions in regard to the conduct of our foreign ministers, it is not solely with Mr. Bayard's case that we have had to do. We wish to establish the precedent for all our ambassadors and representatives abroad that they are to maintain and uphold the dignity and prestige of the United States of America under all circumstances. We propose, beginning with the 4th day of March, 1897, to have for ambassadors abroad men who will represent the noblest patriotic instincts of our people. We propose to have such respect felt for us abroad that when the Congress of the United States sends to Lord Salisbury, as we did in the Venezuelan matter, a demand that he should submit a case to arbitration, he will not bow our minister out of his antechamber as he bowed Mr. Bayard, and keep him for five months waiting for an answer. Who could blame him, when Mr. Bayard allowed five months to elapse before he presented to the British minister the resolutions of the American Congress? When we come into control on the 4th day of March, 1897, we propose to do a great many things which we can not do now. But this thing we can do to-day; this thing we propose to do—to have it understood throughout the length and breadth of all the world that no man who, bearing the commission of the United States, shall attempt to drag down her name and fair fame among the nations, shall pass unrebuked by the representatives of the people.

Mr. Speaker, this incident is soon to close. I wish, as has been stated by several gentlemen on this floor, that these resolutions might have been supported by every member of this House. I understand (and I trust I am not violating any confidence in the statement) that every effort was made by the Republican members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—that they were willing to go to any length and to give up any particular phraseology or the naming of individuals—in order to have the minority agree with them upon some resolution of censure upon such conduct as that of Mr. Bayard. But as the Democratic minority in the committee did not respond to such efforts, and as it appears to be quite certain that the majority of their number on this floor do not propose to act in that spirit, we will pass the resolutions as they are before us.

We accept their challenge as to which party will stand best before the American people—the one which resented and rebuked such utterances as those made by Mr. Bayard, or the party which seeks to condone and defend them. By our votes we indicate our views as to the propriety of the American ambassador to Great Britain when he publicly attacks the political policy of his own country and acts there, as has been done in the present instance, the part of a man who is trying, though bearing our proud commission, to do all that he can to encourage that haughty disregard of our interests which has been the uniform course of the British Government from the days of the Stamp Act to the present time!

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, this debate has now extended very far. About the same amount of time has been consumed in favor of the resolutions as has been occupied against them. I propose, if it should meet the concurrence of the House, to ask that the debate close at half past 4 o'clock to-day, and that we then proceed to a vote.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this debate has consumed nearly two days; but there are three or four gentlemen on this side who wish and expect to speak, so that it will be impossible, if we are to do justice to them, to close the debate this afternoon. I suggest to my friend from Illinois (because I would myself like to close this debate as soon as we can consistently) that we fix 2 o'clock to-morrow for taking the vote. I remind my friend from Illinois of the fact that a number of gentlemen, not believing that a vote would be taken this afternoon, have left the Hall. If we fix the vote for 2 o'clock to-morrow all members will have an opportunity to be present.

Mr. HITT. Would it not accommodate all who want to speak if the vote should be taken at 1 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I think 2 o'clock would be best. A part of the morning will perhaps be consumed in other matters.

Mr. HITT. Very well. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this debate be closed at 2 o'clock to-morrow, and that a vote upon the resolutions be then taken.

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. I presume it will be understood that the time occupied in debate (including that already consumed) shall be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman to say that the two sides have used about the same time.

Mr. HITT. Nearly the same.

The SPEAKER. Exactly the same.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Very well; then let the time be equally divided from now until 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker. it is said that when the great New York merchant, A. T. Stewart, was asked the secret of his success in life he said that he had made one-half of his great fortune in attending to his own business and the other half in leaving other people's business alone.

Mr. Speaker, there is no maxim that could be quoted here more appropriately and be more properly given serious consideration by this House than that under which he conducted his great business affairs. We have undertaken to meddle with and to manage the affairs of every nation, and of every department; and have done everything except those things that the people of the United States sent us here to do.

For the form of these resolutions I care nothing; for the criticisms that have been made and for the pretenses under which they are introduced I care nothing. I go behind the form and the pretense to the spirit and substance of the resolutions, and find that this is merely an incident in a crusade in the interest of that exorbitant, insatiate plundering form of protection which the people of the United States repudiated so overwhelmingly at the polls under the designation of "McKinleyism." It is the lesson of all history that the greater the abuse the more intolerant it is of criticism, and we have a striking illustration of that truth presented here to-day. This proposed censure is not because Mr. Bayard, in an elevated, scholarly, and creditable address, used certain words that more or less concerned the status of things in America, but it is because he told the truth and called to the attention of the country those evils toward which, unless the progress of the Republican party be speedily checked, we are rapidly hastening.

Mr. Speaker, the banquet from the substance of the people is being spread, and the harpies, the vultures, the unclean birds who are to feast on it, are hastening on their way. All the skies above our heads are darkening with their approach and we can hear the flapping of their wings.

That species of high protection of which Mr. Bayard spoke, called McKinleyism, is a false pretense and a fraud wherever you touch it. I have sat here upon this floor and heard statements made which I would have supposed arose from a total want of consideration or knowledge of the subject if it had not been that gentlemen who were deemed to be sufficiently conversant with public affairs to hold a seat on this floor were uttering them.

Now, in the few minutes at my command I shall undertake to expose and refute some of these statements and pretensions. We have been told that the remedy for the condition of the Treasury, the proper provision for replenishing the gold reserve and for checking gold exports, is to raise the tariff schedules and tax the people higher. What are the facts in this connection? During the year ending June 30, 1891, the first year under the McKinley Act, the net loss of gold to this country by exportation was $68,130,087, while the net loss by gold exports during the last fiscal year was $30,117,376, and if we deduct the gold that was brought into the country by bond sales, yet the net gold exports in the first year of the McKinley Act exceeded the net gold exports in the first year of the Wilson Act, notwithstanding the many difficulties under which we have labored during the latter time irrespective of tariff.

During Mr. Cleveland's first Administration, before McKinleyism, we imported $54,772,000 more gold than we exported. Under Harrison, McKinleyism, and Republican rule we exported $122,624,000 more gold than we imported.

At the close of Mr. Cleveland's first Administration he left in the Treasury $97,874,422 of free gold in excess of the gold reserve, while at the close of Mr. Harrison's Administration he left in the Treasury only $987,000 above the gold reserve, and that would have been swept away if held-up bills had been paid.

A deficit in the Treasury under Mr. Harrison's Administration was only avoided by the use of a trust fund of nearly $60,000,000, which had been deposited in the Treasury by the national banks. Before Mr. Harrison went out of the Presidential office orders had been given in the Treasury Department by the Republican Secretary of the Treasury for the engraving of plates for the printing of bonds for issue, and the Republican Administration of Mr. Harrison barely managed to put off the issue of bonds long enough to leave it to fall upon Mr. Cleveland's Administration. All these and all our subsequent financial troubles, as far as the Treasury is concerned, have been the products of the McKinley Act, the Sherman Act, unwise and injurious laws concerning the currency, and other vicious Republican legislation. In truth, Republican financial and currency legislation has had two principal culminations since the war in two great crises and panics which it caused, or at least greatly aggravated—the great panics of 1873 and of 1893; and for all the losses, prostration of business, hardships and sufferings during and in the years following each Republican legislation is largely responsible.

We are told that the gold depletion is due to the Wilson Act, and that the restoration of McKinleyism will cure the existing evil, when the fact is that the depletion began in the first year after the McKinley Act was passed; and experience has demonstrated the fact that the high tariff then inaugurated did not afford any remedy, for the comparison of the figures I have given will show that under the Wilson Act the depletion of the country of gold was less during the first year of its operation than it was under the McKinley Act during a corresponding period.

The fact is, that the banks supplied the drain of gold for export during the earlier part of Mr. Harrison's Administration until they were unable in prudence or became afraid to do so longer. Then the drain of gold from the Treasury began, which had taken out of the Treasury many millions of gold and had reduced the free gold in the Treasury to almost nothing before the end of Mr. Harrison's term, and so was left by the Republican Administration to invade the gold reserve as soon as the Democratic Administration came in under Mr. Cleveland.

We are further told that the farmers have been injured by the Wilson Act because it encourages the importation of agricultural products from other countries. And yet in 1891, under the McKinley Act, the imports of agricultural products were larger than under the first year of the operation of the Wilson Act. The foreign farm products imported under the McKinley Act in 1891 amounted in value to $67,757,438, while such imports under the Wilson Act in 1895 amounted to only $59,012,028.

So, Mr. Speaker, we are told that all the industries of the country, and especially the woolen industry, to which attention is called, flourished under the McKinley Act, and that the same industry has been seriously injured under the operation of the Wilson bill. Do not gentlemen know that there has been, under the first year's operation of the Wilson Act, more woolen machinery put into operation, more mills built, more men employed, more wages raised than in any equal time in the whole operation of the McKinley Act?

The American Wool and Cotton Reporter some time since published a statement contrasting the condition of the woolen industry in May, 1892, under the McKinley Act, under a Republican Administration, before the election of Mr. Cleveland and a Democratic House, with the condition of that industry on the 1st of June, 1895, under the Wilson Act and under a Democratic Administration. It states that in May, 1892, there were in operation in the United States 7,784 sets of cards of woolen and worsted, 71,000 looms of woolen and worsted, and 43,601 knitting machines, while about June 1, 1895, there were in operation 8,456 sets of cards, 77,100 looms, and 64,250 knitting machines. The Reporter adds that these must have increased since in every particular, as there is a most imposing list of enlargements of woolen mills and installations of new machinery since January 1, 1895, exclusive of 38 brand-new woolen mills and a large number of new knitting plants, as shown in the Reporter of July 4, 1895. It is also further stated that between March, 1895, and the date of the article in the Reporter wages had been increased in about 50 woolen factories.

We are told that the American tin-plate industry is being destroyed under the Wilson Act, and gentlemen upon that side of the House, when that assertion is made, applaud with all the enthusiasm of ignorance. Do they not know that under one year of the Wilson Act the tin-plate industry has developed more than under three years of McKinleyism? Yet such is the fact, and they can find it in any reputable trade journal of this country. Do they not know that the output of iron under the Wilson Act in the last year was the greatest ever known in the history of this country? Do they not know that the cotton industry is prospering? Do they not know that the revenues are increasing from customs dues and otherwise?

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I had time to go into the details of each of these assertions I could demonstrate to the House, item by item, the truth of what I have said. Are the gentlemen ignorant of the fact that the wages of more than a million of laborers have been raised under the Wilson Act? Some of them say these are only partial restorations from decreases made after the election of 1892, when Democratic government was foreshadowed. The facts are all against you, gentlemen.

The Reform Club of New York printed before the elections of 1892 a detailed statement showing the reduction of wages and the discharge of employees in more than a thousand protected establishments under the McKinley Act, before there was any Democratic election, and the fact is that these increases of wages within the last year under the Wilson Act, varying from 10 to 20 per cent, are made in numerous instances in industries where the cuts had previously been made under the McKinley bill, not after any Democratic election, but prior to the election of 1892, and the rates of wages have been largely restored under the Wilson Act. It has been well said that the McKinley Act was a wage reducer, mill closer, and panic producer, and that the whole McKinley period was one of wage reductions, strikes, and riots.

Gentlemen, all that this country needs, so far as tariff legislation is concerned, at present to conserve and secure its prosperity is that you of the Republican party should give heed to the utterance of one of your greatest leaders. The business interests of this country, threatened with a tearing up by the roots, threatened with an extortionate protection crusade, say to you to-day, abide by the great declaration of President Grant, "Let us have peace." All they need is peace from your threatened disturbances.

The people hardly realize or believe that you dare do that which you have in mind. A few weeks ago I conversed with a large manufacturer of New England, and I said: "Now, outside of politics, getting down as between men, how are the cotton and woolen mills of New England getting along and doing?" He said: "They are doing very well. There are some old concerns with antiquated machinery that are not willing to improve their plants who desire to have increased protection rather than improve their methods of production. They want higher tariffs, and are complaining; but the great majority of the woolen and cotton mills of New England are doing well and do not need any disturbance of the tariff."

Now, for one moment let me call your attention to this question of the farmer's wool. You have many of you here spoken eloquently about the benefits and the protection the farmer got on wool under the McKinley Act, and the disasters to wool under the Wilson Act. Now, on page 441 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in the proceedings of the Senate, is printed a communication by Judge Lawrence, the president of the American Wool Growers' Association, in which he comments on the McKinley Act, on what was known as the Dingley bill, recently passed through this House, and on the Wilson Act. The Dingley bill, mind you, was the bill prepared by the present House, that knows how to manage everybody's business but its own. After going on to say that you probably did not know what you were doing, he says, speaking of the Dingley bill:

> This is no protection at all. Inadequate protection is no better than free wool. Evidently the Committee on Ways and Means, for want of time and mature consideration—

You remember how that great measure—great in the amounts of increased tariff taxes proposed, but not great either in actual or expected results—you remember how it was railroaded through here. The president of the Wool Growers' Association says:

> Evidently the Committee on Ways and Means, for want of time and mature consideration, did not understand this, or their bill would have been so framed as to give some measure of protection.

So every man of you, who promised the woolgrowers in your district that you would give them "some measure of protection" came here and voted only for a bill that the president of the Woolgrowers' Association says gave them nothing. But what does he say of the McKinley Act, that measure under which you now say your cup of happiness was full? He says of the McKinley Act and its effect on wool and sheep:

> Under it prices of wools constantly declined, and the inevitable result would soon have been a failure to secure prosperity to American sheep husbandry. Even in Texas, where the cost of growing wool is as low if not less than any other State, sheep declined in numbers from 4,218,812 in 1890 to 2,859,269 in 1894.

That is the statement of the president of the American Wool Growers' Association as to the benefits given to American woolgrowers by the McKinley Act. Mr. Speaker, the people of this country will not be left without a shield against the assaults of those who now have these designs of private benefit—I was about to use another word, but will not—these designs of private benefit to be derived from the taxation of the people. Let not gentlemen deceive themselves. To-day the Philistines dance and make merry; but, my friends, Samson's locks will grow again. The great Democratic party of this country, which has been the party of the people and the true protection of the people through all its history, will rise up in its strength and will become their bulwark in the future, as in the past.

These proceedings here to-day but teach a lesson which I would to God every Democrat in this land could take to heart, as I have it in my heart, as a matter of the deepest and sincerest conviction and aspiration that the labor, the thought, the desire, the effort of every Democrat should be toward an end superior to all temporary differences, superior to all temporary questions, and that is the unity, the perpetuation, and the victory of the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen come in here and censure Thomas F. Bayard. Who is Thomas F. Bayard, and who are his censurers? Not all of these gentlemen, I feign would believe, are actuated simply by the desire of a little man to gain some temporary notoriety by an attack upon a great man. Not all of them, I trust. Some are actuated by the fanaticism of high protectionism, of which I have spoken. What does this resolution accomplish? What can it accomplish? In itself it is futile.

It is said that Mr. Bayard has committed an indiscretion or impropriety in certain language he has used. If that were true, which it is not—I will not rehearse that, because it has been discussed—but if it were true, does that justify this House in committing not only an impropriety, but attempting usurpation? There has been some light and foolish talk about the attention Mr. Bayard ought to give to such resolutions; even that he should resign. I have no apprehension that Mr. Bayard will contemplate anything of the sort; but if he did, then he would act with impropriety; he would not only act with impropriety, but unfaithfully to the Constitution of his country, because the Constitution has divided the departments of the Government, and it has given us our sphere and our jurisdiction; it has defined that of the executive and that of the judiciary. When we undertake to censure a minister of the United States merely for language used or in any way to interfere in the conduct of his office in any matter that does not require impeachment or that does not require some declaration of policy upon our part in some matter that may come into legislative action, or that does not abridge or affect the privileges of this House, then, in any other case except those that I have enumerated, when we attempt such a course we simply attempt an assault, not upon Thomas F. Bayard, or any individual, but upon the Constitution of our country, which we are sworn to support.

Mr. Speaker, there is in all peoples capable of self-government a high self-respect, a wise self-control and abstinence which leads them to abstain from a frivolous interference or hasty or intemperate interference with the affairs of branches of the Government not committed to their hands. A capacity for that self-control and abstinence is a large part of the capacity for self-government. Those people who have it are capable of self-government; those who have it not are incapable of self-government. I trust, Mr. Speaker, the introduction of such resolutions as these, so trivial in their character, so uncalled for by the occasion——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that they do not indicate a decadence of those qualities which I have mentioned which have been in all times past some of the highest attributes of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON].

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—BENOIT VS. BOATNER.

Mr. TAYLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present to the House the report of the majority of the Committee on Elections No. 2 in the contested-election case of Benoit against Boatner, and to say that I will call it up for consideration here and disposition to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HITT. Will that require discussion?

Mr. TAYLER. It will not require lengthy discussion.

Mr. HITT. The special order calls for a vote to-morrow at 2 o'clock upon the pending resolution, and there is a provision as to the time after the ordinary business of the morning.

Mr. TAYLER. I do not know whether under the arrangement made that time could be put a little later in the day.

Mr. HITT. At 2 o'clock the House will be at liberty to consider this question.

Mr. TAYLER. Two o'clock will suit just as well to take up the Boatner case.

Mr. HITT. After the vote, which is called for at 2 o'clock.

Mr. TAYLER. Precisely.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman make his report in that case now?

Mr. BAILEY. Do I understand that leave has been granted the minority to present their views?

The SPEAKER. If it is asked for, the Chair has no doubt it will be granted.

Mr. BAILEY. I was absent from the floor a moment. Has the request been made?

The SPEAKER. It has not been made.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I make it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks that leave may be granted the minority to file their views. Without objection, the suggestion will be agreed to. The Chair desires to say that the chairman of the committee said to him that he wanted to call up this case right after the reading of the Journal, in which case the Chair supposes the House could make a provision to allow a reasonable time in addition to 2 o'clock for the disposal of this case if it should turn out to be necessary, but that can be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman has agreed to a proposition to let the election case be taken up immediately after the vote on the pending resolution.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I understand there is to be no debate on the election case.

Mr. TAYLER. There will be the reading of the reports.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. About how much time will that consume?

Mr. TAYLER. Half or three-quarters of an hour, perhaps.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, and in order that this matter may be understood, the contestee is to have as much as ten minutes to make a statement. It simply gives the gentleman an opportunity to explain the case and why he assents to the case being voted on without further argument.

Mr. TAYLER. Not for the purpose of discussion, but as an explanation why the case is brought to a vote at once.

AMBASSADOR BAYARD.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the resolutions before the House present a novel and important question, and are entitled to earnest, fair, candid, and dispassionate consideration. I ask that the Clerk read the resolutions:

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Whereas Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, said in a public speech delivered in Boston, England, on August 2, 1895, as follows:

"He (the President of the United States) stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek to have their own way—and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States"; and

Whereas Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, said in a public speech delivered in Edinburgh, Scotland, on November 7, 1895, as follows:

"In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled 'protection,' which I believe has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind to familiarize it with reliance upon state aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause. * * *

"It (the said policy of protection) has unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the public conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes, whose support is thereby attracted. Thus it has done so much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen": Therefore

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, in publicly using the language above quoted, has committed an offense against diplomatic propriety, and an abuse of the privileges of his exalted position, which should make him the representative of the whole country, and not of any political party. Such utterances are wholly inconsistent with that prudent, delicate, and scrupulous reserve which he himself, while Secretary of State, enjoined upon all diplomatic agents of the United States. In one speech he affronts the great body of his countrymen who believe in the policy of protection. In the other speech he offends all his countrymen who believe that Americans are capable of self-government. Therefore, as the immediate representatives of the American people, and in their name, we condemn and censure the said utterances of Thomas F. Bayard.

Resolved further, That in the opinion of the House of Representatives public speeches by our diplomatic or consular officers abroad which display partisanship, or which condemn any political party or party policy or organization of citizens in the United States, are in dereliction of the duty of such officers, impair their usefulness as public servants, and diminish the confidence which they should always command at home and abroad.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. The ambassador admits the correctness of the language attributed to him by the committee, but offers no apology, excuse, or justification for the same. The question thus presented is grave and important, the determination of which is destined to have a far-reaching effect upon the diplomatic system of our Government, and merits the calm and deliberate judgment of this House.

I can think of few spectacles, Mr. Speaker, more humiliating to the American people than the conduct of their ambassador on these occasions.

In speaking of us as a "strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people, who seek to have their own way," he directly implies that we are unwilling to yield to the supremacy of law, are self-willed, violent, turbulent, defiant, and incapable of self-government. Such an utterance was a slander upon the American people. We justly boast of the supremacy of law and are proud that our judiciary stands as one of the bulwarks of our national liberty. But, sir, the ambassador's unfortunate language at Edinburgh was a most disrespectful reference to a political and economic principle long cherished by a large majority of the people of this country. And who was it who spoke in this way? Was it some obscure individual, some one whose utterances would attract no attention, excite no comment? By no means. It was the American representative to the highest court on earth. He had long been a distinguished lawyer and was a member of the United States Senate for more than twenty years. He knew that protection was a principle in which the great majority of the American people believed, and which they have cherished from the foundation of the Government. He knew that the greatest men of this nation had advocated it and taught it. He knew that Washington and Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, and Franklin, those mighty men who guided the infant Republic through the perils of the Revolution and wrote the Federal Constitution in the blood of English statesmen, believed in this doctrine. He knew that Jackson, the most enduring name his party ever placed upon its national banner, and the great Webster and Clay, the immortal Lincoln, and the eloquent Garfield, all believed in it, and that from the teachings of these mighty men the American people had learned to cherish this doctrine as sacred almost as the Constitution. [Applause.]

While a Senator of the United States Mr. Bayard was chosen as the leader of the Cabinet. As Secretary of State he became the head of the diplomatic service of the Republic. Trained in that school, he knew that an ambassador who represents his government at the court of another government is bound by every rule of official deportment and diplomatic conduct to always speak respectfully of his own people. As the head of our diplomatic service, over his own signature and official title, he issued to our corps of foreign representatives personal and official instructions the spirit of which he was the only one to violate.

What strange and unknown influence is it, Mr. Speaker, which causes a high official to prescribe a rule of conduct to-day and violate it to-morrow? I am not familiar with all the circumstances under which this unfortunate speech was delivered, but I know that it was in the capital of a foreign country jealous of our national policy and power; that it was in one of the great intellectual centers of Europe, in sight of one of the great universities of the world and within the shadow of the monument erected by his countrymen to the memory and genius of the immortal Scott, and near that other monument, tall, grand, and beautiful, standing on the Necropolis, facing the rising sun and the limitless sea, Scotland's contribution to the memory, the character, the life, the genius, and the achievements of the noblest benefactor of the human race and the greatest name that adorns history—Abraham Lincoln—surroundings, sir, which ought to inspire any man with love and zeal for his native land. [Applause.]

Under such circumstances every American citizen had the right to expect that if reference was made by his ambassador to his country it would be some laudatory word for what his country had accomplished for human liberty. But you read his speech in vain for such a eulogy. Liberty was his theme. He spoke of personal liberty and independence, but the party, the power, the spirit, the genius, and the love for humanity, which gave liberty and independence to a race of slaves, found no mention by him. I do not know if Mr. Bayard was in sight of the American flag when he uttered the words of the resolution; if he was, it is a wonder that the very stars upon it did not cry out against him. This nation fought the war of the Revolution, fought the war of 1812, fought all the border wars, fought the war with Mexico and planted our flag upon the fallen throne of the Montezumas; fought the first year of the great war of the rebellion under an American flag made in England. It was not until 1862, when Congress had the courage and patriotism to place a protective duty upon the material from which the flag was made, three-quarters of a century after our national existence began, that the genius and labor of the American people was able to overcome foreign competition and make the flag at home. [Applause.]

Prior to that time we were forced to buy the material of which the flag was made—forced to buy the red, the white, and the blue—to buy, sir, the very stars themselves of foreign manufacturers; and after we had brought the fragments here and made from them that beautiful and starry emblem of human liberty, which stirs the human soul wherever it is seen, we placed it at the head of the American Army, and marching that Army out to battle, drove from the field in overwhelming defeat the very men who sold us the flag. [Applause.] We could do that, and we did; but we could not make the flag, because we could not make the material from which the flag was made; and when Mr. Bayard spoke of the great system of American protection, he denounced the only system that ever gave to the American people an American flag made of American material by American labor. And after the American flags were made at home the United States purchased them from the American manufacturer at 50 per cent less than was paid the British manufacturer for the same article; and the American manufacturers were paying their workmen 50 per cent more wages than the foreign manufacturers were paying theirs.

It is a forcible and, I trust, patriotic illustration of the principle that where there is no American competition in the manufacture of an article which the American people must have we pay the price for it the foreign manufacturer demands. [Applause.]

But, sir, there is another view to be taken of this question. This Congress had hardly started on its career before this House expressed its confidence in the principles of American protection by passing a protective tariff bill—not as high a protective bill as many of us wished, and not as high as many of us hope this Congress will pass before it adjourns, but it was a bill distinctively protective; and by that act we proclaimed our faith in the principles of protection to American industries. [Applause.]

Every citizen of this Republic who voted in 1894 for a Republican Representative in this House expressed his faith in the principle of protection to American laborers and American manufacturers; and the extracts from the speech of the American ambassador set out in the second resolution before the House are an insult to every citizen of the Republic who voted in that way and to every member of this House who voted for the tariff bill which the House passed. We owe it, therefore, to our constituents and ourselves to rebuke this insult. Let us adopt this resolution and send the word into every American home where the blessings of protection are seen and enjoyed [applause] that this House reasserts its faith and belief in this beneficent doctrine by reproving our ambassador who was so unfortunate as to utter the language referred to.

But the real and far-reaching iniquity of this speech is yet to be seen. I ask the House to pause and think of the occasion on which it was delivered. Here is America, the most enlightened and prosperous country on the globe. Here Christianity, literature, science, art, education, music, poetry, painting, and philosophy have exerted their greatest power on the greatest number. Here life is best. The American people are the highest product of Christ's influence on the human race. [Applause.] There is England; her history runs to the middle centuries, and though it is marred by the bloody reign of cruel kings and queens, she is great and powerful, our only competitor in the race for national glory.

From this country to that goes an ambassador, clothed with the insignia of authority, the representative of the highest civilization and the greatest Government to the next highest civilization and the next greatest Government, and in the presence of an audience which came to greet an American official of highest rank, and in which was much of the scholarship and beauty and grace of the Old World, this vituperation of, this disregard for, the great principle of American protection was exhibited. I do not doubt but such an audience blushed for shame at such unprecedented violation of international diplomacy and policy. What, sir, must have been the effect of such a speech at such a time and place upon such an audience; and what must be its effect upon the people of free-trade England and Scotland, to have a policy that is as old as our Government and sacred to millions of our citizens designated as "the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled 'protection,'" by the highest diplomatic officer of our Republic? But, Mr. Speaker, while it is true that England and Scotland as nationalities oppose the doctrine of American protection, it is equally true that for that very reason thousands of their sons have left their homes, left family, left wife and children, left native land forever, and braved the perils of the sea, to live in this country, because here manhood and womanhood were protected; here the rights of the laborer were asserted; here toil found better compensation than in any country of the world. How must such men have felt at this assault upon our American protective policy by the American ambassador at such a time and place?

Mr. Speaker, in the name of every foreigner who has come to our shores to better his condition, to enjoy a larger and fuller manhood, to breathe a freer air, and live a nobler and higher life than he could under the dynasties of Europe, I arraign Thomas F. Bayard before the bar of American sentiment for his unpatriotic and un-American utterances. [Applause.]

Think of the effect of such a speech upon our diplomatic policy, for if such a course can be pursued by our ambassador to the Court of St. James, why can it not be pursued by our ambassador to the court of France, or Russia, or that of Germany, or Austria, or Mexico, or Japan, or China, and so on, until every ambassador and consul now representing this Republic abroad, if he so desires, can speak in some disrespectful manner of the great institutions of this country? for it must be remembered that Mr. Bayard has expressed his personal views of this great American policy. Suppose that some other American policy should be distasteful to some other American ambassador or consul, and he should attack that policy in some public utterance made in his receptive country because it did not meet his personal views, is it not apparent that the result would be the demoralization of our entire diplomatic system? If our ambassadors and consuls can be allowed to express at will their disapproval of some great national home policy and criticise it in a foreign country which is unfavorable to such a policy, how long can this country maintain that dignity which our diplomatic relations demand?

The resolutions before the House are not meaningless. They present a grave and serious question, and this Congress must have the courage to meet it as it deserves. If we fail to rebuke the ambassador who has been so unfortunate as to utter the language attributed to him, we shall learn that this course will not meet the approval of the American people and that American diplomacy will have received a shock from which it will not soon recover. [Applause.]

But the whole of Mr. Bayard's vicious attack does not appear from the language of the resolutions. I regret that the committee has not reported more of the speech. Continuing his criticism upon our policy of protection, he said (in addition to the language reported by the committee):

> Step by step, and largely owing to the confusion of civil strife, it [the policy of protection] has succeeded in obtaining control of the sovereign power of taxation, never hesitating at any alliance or the resort to any combination that promised to assist its purpose of perverting public taxation from its only true justification and function, of creating revenue for the support of the Government of the whole people, into an engine for the selfish and private profit of allied beneficiaries and combinations called "trusts." Under its dictation individual enterprise and independence have been oppressed and the energy of discovery and invention debilitated and discouraged.

Again he says:

> It is incorrect to speak of "protection" as a national policy, for that it can never be, because it can never be other than the fostering of special interests at the expense of the rest, and this overthrows the great principle of equality before the law and that resultant sense of justice and equity in the administration of sovereign powers, which is the true cause of domestic tranquillity and human contentment. The value of "protective" taxation to its beneficiaries consists in its inequality, for without discrimination in favor of some one there is no advantage to anyone, and if the tax is equally laid on all, all will be kept upon the relative level from which they started: and this simply means a high scale of living to all, high cost of production of everything, and consequent inability to compete anywhere outside the orbit of such restrictive laws.

But the enfeeblement of individual energies and the impairment of manly self-reliance are necessarily involved, and the belief in mysterious powers of the state, and a reliance upon them to take the place of individual exertion, fosters the growth of state socialism, and personal liberty ceases to be the great end of government.

I do not wish to be understood as denying Mr. Bayard the right to entertain these views. He has that right. But I deny his right in his official capacity as American ambassador to utter such views at the time and place he did. Therein lies his offense. It is an established principle of international law that an ambassador should not criticise his receptive Government. It is equally important that he should not criticise his own country while representing it abroad. [Applause.]

In all the history of diplomatic relations between the great Governments of the world no instance can be found wherein a representative of one Government, in the presence of a great and cultured audience and of an energetic press which would send his speech throughout the world, criticised a policy of his home Government which he knew had long been the cherished policy of a majority of its citizens. We look in vain for a precedent for conduct like this. This nation is the first to furnish an ambassador so bold and forgetful as to traduce upon a great occasion and in the presence of an unfriendly audience the cherished policy of his home country. He knew he was speaking to an unfriendly and un-American audience which would welcome un-American sentiment. He knew also that one might as well undertake to eliminate the Epistles of Paul or the Revelations of John from Holy Writ as to eliminate the benefits of protection from American history [applause]; yet in the presence of such an audience he struck protection his hardest and bitterest blows.

No excuse or justification can be made for such conduct, and none is sought to be made. The continued silence of our ambassador is a challenge to this House. He has expressed no regret, entered no plea of extenuation, given no explanation, offered no reason or excuse for his conduct.

In my judgment, there is but one course for the House to pursue. Let the resolutions pass, and before the sun sleeps in a western sky let the trained lightning of the eternal heavens announce in every foreign court that the American Congress will resent any insult offered the American people. [Loud applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks,

Mr. BAILEY said: I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman from Texas will remember that the time allowed for debate has been limited. If this gentleman's time is extended, he may use up the time of other gentlemen. I do not understand that it is proposed to extend the time for the vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman may have at least five minutes longer.

Mr. HITT. I should be very glad to assent to the request, but the five minutes are not mine to yield. It can only be done by postponing the time for the vote.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes, and that the hour for taking the vote be postponed for the same time, if that is agreeable to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HITT. I make no objection.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky rose.

Mr. HITT. If agreeable to my friend from Kentucky I will now take ten minutes, which I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on this resolution I do not wish to go into details or to discuss political issues, but to speak sentiments of Americanism that I hope will be approved by all who are Americans, whether Republicans or Democrats. The questions involved in this resolution are bigger than politics and commensurate with the broadest patriotism.

Wherever an American sword is drawn on foreign soil it is always drawn for America and all America. The heroes who wrought such miracles of valor on the soil of Mexico, who marched from Matamoras to Buena Vista, from Vera Cruz to Mexico, blazing their way with bonfires of victory, these heroes who won such fame for themselves and for all of us, never thought in the day of battle whether they were Whigs or Democrats, Northerners or Southerners, Easterners or Westerners; they thought only of their country and their whole country, its honor and its flag, and their only purpose was to so act as to show themselves worthy of their fatherland and able to carry its banner to victory and their cause to a glorious consummation. [Applause.]

AMERICAN SWORDS DRAWN FOR ALL AMERICA.

Yes; whenever an American draws his sword on foreign soil, he draws it for all America—for the North and the South, for the East and the West; he draws it for the nation, and for the whole nation. He goes forth as an American soldier, panoplied in the whole armor of American citizenship, and with the breastplate of American patriotism over his heart; and if ever an American soldier shall put his foot on foreign soil with any other sentiment in his heart than that of undivided devotion to his whole country, there is great danger of that soldier proving a coward or a traitor.

And so when I see or hear a civilian representative of the United States preferring his section to his whole country, or preferring his party to the whole people, or preferring his denomination to the whole body of his Christian countrymen, then I will show you a man who does not carry a big, full, round American heart in his bosom, and who when an emergency arises will be apt to prove a coward or a traitor. No such man can worthily represent our country in a foreign land. [Applause.]

So, when Mr. Bayard, without excuse or provocation, went out of his way to defame his own countrymen and to denounce a majority of our people as corruptionists in principle and conduct, he showed himself utterly unworthy of being our representative in a foreign land; and his utterances have generated the belief in many patriotic minds that our representative in England is too much of a Democrat to be an American and too much of an aristocrat to be a patriot.

AMERICAN CANNON SPEAK FOR ALL AMERICA.

When the cannon of the United States roars in a foreign land or upon a foreign sea, it speaks for all America. It is not loaded with Democratic balls or Republican powder: it is not aimed by cross-eyed sectionalism, nor is the match applied by the hand of religious sectarianism, but that cannon is loaded with American ammunition, is aimed by single-eyed American patriotism, and is fired by the hand of American valor. The thunder of its discharge is the unanimous utterance of patriotic America, and the cannon ball, as it batters down the defenses of the enemy or lays low the soldiers of the adversary, says in effect, "Take this from the hand of all America." [Applause.]

So, when a civil representative of the United States stands up to speak of his country in a foreign land he should not be loaded with the ammunition of political controversy; he should not aim his remarks to strike down or wound any citizen of his country; he should carry in his heart no feeling of hostility to any party or creed or doctrine, but his heart should be big enough and open enough to take in his whole country, all of its parties, all of its creeds, and his utterances should be so big in their Americanism, so broad in their patriotism, so magnanimous in their sentiments, that every true American, no matter what his party or his creed, would feel that his own heart had been voiced and his own thoughts spoken. [Applause.]

And when Thomas F. Bayard raised his hand and his voice against a large portion of his countrymen he showed himself false to his country and better fitted to speak in a meeting of ward heelers the ribald diatribes of free-trade demagogues than to stand forth as the representative of all America in the British Empire. [Applause.]

AMERICAN WAR SHIPS BATTLE FOR ALL AMERICANS.

When the battle ships of Decatur belched forth their iron balls upon the Algerines he did not stop to inquire whether the Americans held as prisoners by the Algerines were Methodists or Baptists, Presbyterians or Catholics. The fact that they were American citizens and Christians and were enslaved by Mohammedan pirates was all that Decatur cared to know, and his guns spoke for America, and for all America. [Applause.]

What would have been thought of Decatur had he sought to liberate none but those who agreed with him in politics or religion? Oh, Mr. Speaker, when a man authorized to speak for America speaks in a foreign land he should speak for all America, not for any party nor for any creed, nor as the advocate of any doctrine or the champion of any faction.

When Captain Ingraham run out the guns of his war ship at Smyrna and demanded that Martin Koszta be restored to his freedom as an American citizen, he did not stop to inquire whether Koszta was a native-born or naturalized American, whether he was a Protestant or a Catholic, a Whig or a Democrat; all he inquired about was whether he was an American, and when Koszta declared that he was, Captain Ingraham, noble American hero that he was, run up his war flag, cleared his decks for battle, loaded his cannon to the muzzle, and notified the Austrian commander to surrender Martin Koszta, or, by the Spirit of America, he would take him by force of battle. [Applause.]

This is that intense spirit of Americanism that should inspire the heart and characterize the utterances of every American who is honored by this country with a commission to represent it in a foreign land. The moment he remembers party he stumbles, and the moment he prefers a faction he falls. And when Mr. Bayard showed by his utterances in England that he preferred his party to his whole people, and that he had feelings of animosity toward a majority of his countrymen, then he committed what in peace we call a blunder, but what in war we call a crime. [Applause.]

OUR REPRESENTATIVE IN ENGLAND SPEAKS FOR HIS "MASTER."

Our representatives in England were formerly called "ministers," but a few years ago they came to be denominated "ambassadors." A minister represents a nation, but an ambassador represents a king, an emperor, or a kaiser. I regretted this change in the designation of our national representatives, and I fear that Mr. Bayard does not consider himself the representative of our country and its people, but simply as the personal representative of President Cleveland. And it may be this is the reason he stands forth in England to glorify his "royal master," Grover Cleveland, at the expense of the great mass of the American people. It may be this is the reason that Mr. Bayard tells the people of England that "He (the President of the United States) stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek their own way; and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States." He wants to make the people of England believe that Grover Cleveland is a king, who "governs the people of the United States," and that he, Thomas F. Bayard, stands there in England as the ambassador of King Grover I. [Laughter and applause.]

When Bayard denounced the protective American policy as a "form of state socialism" that "fosters class legislation," "creates inequality of fortune," "corrupts public life," "lowers the tone of national representation," "blunts the public conscience," and "places politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble," he showed that he thought more of the free-trade statesmen of old England than he did of such grand American statesmen as Washington, Clay, Lincoln, and Blaine, and that he preferred the plaudits of English free traders to the good will of the great body of the American people.

BAYARD STANDS UP FOR PARTY AND BELITTLES HIS COUNTRY.

And when Mr. Bayard went further and said that our policy of protection to American industries and American laborers "tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor," he made statements that not only are the reverse of the truth but sentiments the American people have just voted down by an immense majority. Instead of voicing the opinions of the American people, as he was in duty bound to do, he actually insults the great majority of the American people and sets himself up as a common scold and unlicensed critic of his own countrymen. He takes the weapon our people have given him to be used for our welfare and with it strikes us across our faces and on our backs. Selected for a friend, he turns out to be an enemy. Chosen as a republican, he seems to be a monarchist. The disguise is stripped from him by his own hand and discloses him as more of a Democrat than an American, and less of a patriot than a demagogue, as having more love for England and her policies than for America and Americans, as having in his heart sentiments that better fit him to be a subject of England's free-trade Queen than as the representative of the free, patriotic, and equal citizens of the United States of America. [Applause.]

In the best days of the Roman Republic her public men when abroad always stood up for Rome, "that from her seven hills ruled the world." They were never for Marius nor for Sylla, never for Cæsar nor for Pompey. But after the Republic was overthrown, then Rome's representatives in foreign lands represented the Emporer, and no longer cared for the Roman people. If they pleased Cæsar they were happy.

CLEVELAND A CÆSAR, AND BAYARD A TOADY.

Mr. Bayard seems to think that it is a matter of no consequence whether he represents the American people or not; that he is doing his whole duty when he represents Cæsar. Hence he glorifies Mr. Cleveland, but stigmatizes the great body of the American people. In order to write Mr. Cleveland up he writes all the balance of us down. Mr. Cleveland seems to be his idol, and he wants to be his high priest on English soil. [Laughter.]

If there be anything the average American despises more than anything else in a public man it is toadyism. Mr. Bayard is the toady of toadies, and a spirit of independent patriotism could no more dwell in such a breast than an American eagle could live in a bat roost. It is a flagrant shame that we are represented abroad by such an unworthy specimen of Americanism.

Some ask: "Will he resign if we pass this resolution of censure?" No; he will not resign. Cleveland loves toadies and toadies love masters, and Cleveland and Bayard suit each other exactly. He will not resign. No such good fortune is in store for the American people. But one of the very first things the next President of the United States will do after taking the oath of office will be to send to England some protective-tariff, patriotic, brave-spirited Republican to take the place of Thomas F. Bayard, the free-trade toady and unblushing defamer of his own countrymen. [Applause.]

THE TRUE AMERICAN REPRESENTATIVE.

A man who represents us abroad should represent our aspirations, our glories, our mighty deeds, our grand principles, and our liberal patriotism. When he goes abroad he should leave his politics behind; he should lay aside his State love; he should remember that he goes abroad to represent us all, and he should swell up to the high and grand stature of an ideal American citizenship. America should be his Jerusalem, and he should open his western windows and, looking out over the broad Atlantic, pray for the land of his birth, as Daniel of old prayed for Jerusalem.

America! America!
Land of the mighty and the free,
Thy States seem crystallized in one
As they loom up beyond the sea.
The stars shine with a single light;
But nearer viewed have seas and shores;
So, when upon thy soil I stand,
I see thy parts and hear uproars.
But when I cross the ocean wide,
And view my native land afar,
Thy parts all melted are in one,
And thou dost shine a single star.
I see no parties and no sects,
I hear no clamors and no sighs,
But one harmonious brotherhood
Seems there to dwell in paradise.

[Prolonged applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to read a few lines from a statement issued by the last speaker [Mr. GIBSON] and sent to his constituents in east Tennessee, as I am informed; but I will not ask leave to print in toto. He says in this statement:

The number of pension calls made by me on the Commissioner of Pensions since my term began is 1,400.

Figuring that out according to my arithmetic, there would be an average of about 14 calls a day during the one hundred days of this session. He has done remarkably well. [Laughter.] Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this is a wonderful circular. Here is another extract from it:

Rally, once again, boys!

In other words, send GIBSON back to Congress and the country will be safe. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Tennessee further says in this circular:

Some few Democrats are charging me with being "egotistic."

[Laughter.]

It is a very remarkable circular. I never saw one like it before. I hope everybody will read it, especially in the gentleman's district. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not know who these Democrats are who designate the gentleman as "egotistic," and for one I do not charge the gentleman from Tennessee with being "egotistic." [Laughter.] But I think I know something about campaigning, and I do not hesitate to say that if any candidate in the North should get up a circular like this thus early in the campaign and should send it to all his constituents under the privilege of the frank, I am inclined to believe that there are just a few of those constituents who would believe that the gentleman was just a little "egotistic." [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York decline to yield?

Mr. SULZER. I decline to yield for the moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. GIBSON. The man that will make a false charge against me is a coward.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee must take his seat. He is out of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the gentleman's remark, and I am sorry I did not, but I suggest that the next time he procure a trumpet. However, I was going to say that from my knowledge of human nature and from the short experience I have had with the people of the world, I firmly believe that on election day the gentleman from Tennessee who has sought to criticise the manhood and cast aspersions on the honor and the reputation of Thomas F. Bayard will find a great many constituents in his district who will believe that he is just a little "egotistic." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Tennessee says he did not send out this circular to his constituents, and that he did not frank it, I desire to withdraw my remark about that, but I am reliably informed by a member of the House it is a fact that he had done so.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to know who your informant is.

Mr. SULZER. Do you deny that you have sent this circular out under a frank?

Mr. GIBSON. I deny it utterly. It is an infamous lie. Your informant is the originator of a vile slander, and if you repeat it you are no better than he is.

Mr. SULZER. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have said anything to offend the gentleman from Tennessee, If I have said anything that offends him, or that does him injustice, I will courteously and manfully apologize and take it back.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SULZER. I decline to yield just now, Mr. Speaker. I believe that gratitude is the fairest flower that sheds its perfume in the human heart, and I want to say that when a man deliberately gets up on the floor of this House and attacks a gentleman across the sea who represents this great country at the Court of St. James, a man who is not here to defend himself, I think it is only fair and proper to call attention to some of his own weaknesses and shortcomings. No fault should be found, at all events. It is only Democratic gratitude. I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that if Thomas F. Bayard stood on this floor to-day there would be very few Republicans that would dare to say a word against him. [Derisive cries on the Republican side.] Laugh; but those that laugh last laugh best. It is all well enough to be brave and talk in a loud voice and wildly gesticulate when the man you are calumniating is not present; but I say to you, with all due respect to my distinguished friend from Tennessee and other eloquent gentlemen on that side, that you can calumniate Thomas F. Bayard and he is not calumniated; you can slander him and he is not slandered; you can vilify him and he is not vilified. He is a Democrat, and were he as chaste as ice and as pure as driven snow he could not escape Republican calumny.

I believe the Republican party has made a mistake in trying to use the good name and fame of Thomas F. Bayard for political purposes. The pending resolutions are introduced here not for the mere purpose of censuring Mr. Bayard, but for the purpose of making an issue for the Republican party in the next campaign—not the true issue, not the issue about which the people want to know, not the question where you [the Speaker] and all the other candidates of the Republican party for the Presidency stand, and that is on the currency question. That is the all-important question to-day. It will be the great question in the next campaign. It can not be ignored, it can not be disguised, and it can not be shifted and put out of the way for some lesser question. You must meet it in this campaign. Ignore it, repudiate it, and you are lost. Do not deceive yourselves about it. If you do, let me tell you that you can not deceive the people. There is some satisfaction in that consolation.

Where does the Republican party stand to-day on this question? Where do its candidates stand? Echo answers, Where? McKinley straddles the currency issue; ALLISON straddles the currency issue; Morton has not said a word on the currency issue, and there are others. I do not know of a single Republican candidate for the Presidency who has yet dared to come out boldly, manfully, and courageously and say, "I stand for honest money; I stand upon this platform for a sound, honest, and inviolate currency. Here I will take my stand and fail not." The Republican party thus far in this Congress and in this campaign does not meet the sound-money question or the silver issue, but it is attempting to evade it and again bring up the old question of protection and make that question the paramount and the vital issue in the coming campaign.

If you want to do that we are perfectly willing and perfectly satisfied to meet you again on the protection issue in 1896. We met you on it in 1892. The people decided it then and they will decide it again, and in my judgment the same way. And whenever you try to make the people of this country believe that the principle of protection as written by the manufacturers of this country in the McKinley bill, word for word, line for line, and paragraph upon paragraph—the principle of protection that robs the many to enrich the few; the kind of protection that discriminates against the masses in favor of the classes; the sort of protection that makes the rich richer and the poor poorer; the partisan, prejudiced, political protection that seeks to divide this country by a line of financial demarcation more pronounced and more dangerous than Mason and Dixon's line—you will find that the people will be against you and against your party next fall just as they were four years ago, and with as large and as decisive a majority.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Have you not first got to find the candidate who will accept your nomination?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON (to Mr. SULZER). Tell him you said nothing about his candidate—Mr. QUAY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee must not interrupt the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thank the Chair. But the Chair did not call the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stopped the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from New York is addressing himself to the resolutions, and should be listened to. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I have often thought during the short time I have been here that if the distinguished gentleman who sits in the chair were listened to more there would perhaps be more business done. [Laughter.]

I do not stand here to defend Mr. Bayard. He needs no defense. He will live in American history long after his detractors and defamers are dead and forgotten. The speech of Mr. Bayard, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] criticised a little while ago, will live long after the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] is gathered to his fathers, and, like them of such distinguished lineage, forgotten. It will live long after the gentleman from Tennessee has ceased to send his placards to his constituents, with his beautiful photograph on them, with the old flag of the Union on the left side and the old flag of the Union on the right side, and above them, "Rally, boys; rally once again!" In other words, "Send GIBSON back to Congress and the country will be safe." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, what a spectacle is here presented to the people of this country! We have been in session for over three months. What have we done? Have we done anything that the people elected this Congress to do? Have we remedied a single evil that afflicts the body politic to-day? Have we passed a single bill granting any relief to the people of this country? Have we done a single thing to be proud of that we can point to with feelings of pride? No; not at all. When this Congress began its session the policy of doing nothing began, and from that day to this the Republican majority here have absolutely and assiduously lived up to that policy, and, in my judgment, they do not intend to do anything for the balance of the session. Instead of wasting three days to censure poor Bayard, while occupying only thirty-five minutes to offer relief to the heroic Cubans, and only two hours and a half to offer sympathy to the poor Armenians——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Just a few words more, Mr. Speaker. If we are not going to do anything, if we are not going to grant any relief to the people, would it not be well to at once pass the necessary appropriation bills and speedily go home? It would be to the advantage of the Republican candidates for President, and also in the interest of the tax-paying people of the United States. But I am afraid, if you go on much longer doing these silly, ridiculous, nonsensical, preposterous things like this Bayard business and the other things that you have been doing since the session began, the people in the next campaign will rise up in Mr. BARRETT's district and will say, "What has the Republican party done?" And Mr. BARRETT with his usual eloquence will vociferously exclaim, "We censured poor Bayard!"

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Just one moment more, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no power to extend the gentleman's time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time be extended.

Mr. HITT. That can only be done by deferring the time for the vote.

Several MEMBERS. Defer it.

Mr. SULZER. I do not ask more than a couple of minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no authority to give the gentleman any more time.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask unanimous consent that the time for taking the vote be postponed for five minutes, in order to enable the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] to continue his speech for that length of time. It is not hurting us, and it is pleasing him. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks that the time for voting be postponed for five minutes, to enable the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] to occupy five minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. And the constituents, those poor, deluded constituents in Brother GIBSON's district, will rise up and say, "GIBSON, what has the Republican party done in the Fifty-fourth Congress?" And GIBSON will hold up his hands and say, "We censured poor Bayard." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The people of the North, the people of the South, the people of the East, and the people of the West will rise up and say to the Republican statesmen and the Republican stump orators in the campaign, "What has the Republican party in the Fifty-fourth Congress done for us?" And every Republican stump orator will answer back in those stentorian and eloquent words, "We have censured poor Bayard." [Applause and laughter.] And throughout the country the voice of the stump orator will be heard echoing and reechoing, reverberating and reverberating, from one end of the land to the other, the sad and startling refrain, "We have censured poor Bayard!"

Oh, my friends, what a great party the Republican party is to-day. What a great party the G. O. P. presents to-day, when its only issue is protection and "We have censured poor Bayard."

I am afraid that you have made Mr. Bayard a greater man in the estimation of the American people by your attacks upon him and by your denunciations of him than you imagined. If the issue this fall is to be "We have censured poor Bayard," remember that once before a similar issue was made in this country, and the diplomat who was censured became the President of the United States by a majority of all the people. I say to you that when you pass this resolution you humiliate the American people in the eyes of the people of every foreign country. You impair the usefulness of Mr. Bayard and you bring disgrace upon our institutions and upon our country.

If, as you say, you think he has done anything wrong as an American citizen at the court of a foreign power, in a representative capacity, the spirit of human kindness should animate your hearts and you should not accentuate his indiscretion or his fault, but rather endeavor to cover it up by saying nothing at all about it.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that these resolutions will not pass. They are undignified, they are un-American, they are unprecedented. They are undignified because they are silly, trivial, and ridiculous; they are un-American because they are humiliating to the people of this country, and they are unprecedented because there has never been a time when anything like this has been attempted in Congress before; and I hope the day will never come when it will be again attempted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a personal explanation.

Mr. HITT. This, of course, will not come out of the time allowed for the debate.

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the time between now and 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GIBSON. I only want about two minutes.

Mr. HITT. That can only be done by extending the time for taking the vote.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the gentleman rises for a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say two things, and two things only. First, in reference to the charge that I have franked to my people the circular referred to by the gentleman from New York. In the first place, I will say, that circular is yet in the hands of the printer, so far as I know. It has not gone to the public at all. It has not even been delivered to me, except a few samples. Somebody has stolen the copy the gentleman has, and the law books say that if there were no receivers there would be no thieves. [Laughter and applause.] Another maxim of the law books is that the receiver is as bad as the thief. I have not sent out a copy of it, and had no thought of franking it. If the gentleman judges me by his own code of morality, I have no doubt he would frank such a circular. But I have a higher code of morality than the gentleman seems to carry under his vest. [Laughter.]

Another thing, the gentleman from New York exhibited my picture to the House, and now I wish to exhibit this picture of him to the House, and ask to have it made a part of my remarks. It is a picture in words, and is headed, "Timely advice to Mr. Seidlitz Powder." [Laughter.] No, not exactly that, but "Kindly advice to Mr. SULZER."

This is from a Washington letter to the New York World:

> Mr. SULZER, our own Mr. SULZER, was much watched and noticed. As all the world knows, he has been speaker of our assembly and has shown all kinds of talent. He is the man who spoke of Croker as "that silent, farseeing statesman." If Mr. SULZER has principle or gets any he ought to become something of a man. It is a fact beyond question that he has the best face, in some respects, among all the Congressmen in this House. It is a strong face, an old-fashioned face. It looks something like the face of Henry Clay. It is a very self-conscious one at present.
> Mr. SULZER must let us with kindness warn him against the danger of too great self-concentration. He thinks even about his coat. He undid all but the lowest button of it as he walked out on the floor to be sworn, and tried to walk like a tired statesman. But he really wants to be great. When REED—already great in national matters—began to speak, SULZER leaned forward in his chair and listened to him with flushed face and very bright eyes, gripping the arm of his chair tightly at the same time. It is said that SULZER looks upon REED as his prey in this Congress, and means to show him that a speaker has come on from New York to teach him some new things. SULZER should take smaller game for a while, but perhaps he will grow up to REED.

[Great laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, he has shown my picture to this House; I show his picture to this House. "Look on this picture, and then on that." [Laughter.]

Another word. He says that when I go to Tennessee, in answer to their question, "What have you done?" I will say to them, "I have abused Bayard." Now, when he goes back to New York and the people of New York say, "Mr. Seidlitz Powder, what did you do while in the Congress of the United States?" he will say, "I abused GIBSON." [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Tennessee has read about me in a clipping from the New York World is what another man wrote about me. I did not write that, and if there are men on the newspaper press who sometimes abuse me and maliciously malign me and say unkind things about me and make unkind comparisons with other great men about me [laughter], that is not my fault. I can not help that. That is some other person's fault. But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] wrote everything in this circular himself, and about himself, and in praise of himself, and against the Democrats, and then signed his own name to it, put his own picture on it, put on the American flag, told what a great man he was, told how many good bills he had introduced, how many good resolutions he had offered, told how many Departments he had visited, how many speeches he had made, how well they were received in the House, how they were applauded, how he always got the Speaker's eye, how he never had any trouble, how he was the friend of the old soldier, the old soldier's wife, the old soldier's children; and he wound up by telling his constituents, "Do not fail to attend your county convention, and be sure to take your neighbors with you. Do not forget the day and hour—the words 'day and hour' in italics [laughter]—set for your convention. I am putting my trust in you and your neighbors. If you get more than one of these letters give it to your neighbor."

I did not write what he read about me from the New York World, but he can not get upon the floor of this House and deny that he wrote all in this circular about himself.

Mr. GIBSON. What of it? It is all right.

Mr. SULZER. Is it? I am glad you like it. I find no fault with it if you do not. I do, however, find some fault with the World correspondent who wrote the article you read about me. He hit me on several weak points [laughter], and as he had known me for years, knew all about me, knew my record, I thought it was unkind of him to come down here on the first day of the session and write me up and tell all about me, and give me away, as it were. [Laughter.] I thought that was just a little unkind; but if you like what you wrote about yourself I find no fault with it, my dear Brother GIBSON, and if I have——

Mr. GIBSON. I wish you would have it printed in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. I will do it for you. There is nothing mean about me. Mr. Speaker, I send this circular to the Clerk and ask permission to print it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. I offer it as a part of my remarks, because if the gentleman is not going to frank it, I want to give him a chance to frank it with as much morality of feeling and with as much compunction of conscience for himself as he thinks I possess. I never claim any more morality or any more virtue or any more honesty for myself than I am willing at all times to concede to the rest of the good people of the world.

Mr. Speaker, if I have said anything unkind, or if the gentleman has taken any offense at what I have said, I am very sorry. I did not intend any offense, and I hope I have given none; but I will say this, that I saw that this debate in regard to Mr. Bayard was degenerating into a farce, a roaring farce. I thought I would play my little part in it. If I have done it successfully without offending the distinguished gentleman who presides here or any of the members I am entirely content and satisfied. When I was a boy, and ever since, when there was a circus in town, it has been my unvarying and determined effort and desire to go if I could. I always tried to get to the circus if I could, but always as a spectator. I am glad that I got to this great circus in the House of Representatives in regard to Mr. Bayard. I am glad that I have been able to play a part in it, not the part of the clown, I hope, but the part, if I may say it, of the ringmaster, and that I have had the opportunity to snap the political whip at some egotistical and foolish Republicans who think they are a great deal better and a great deal wiser, more knowing, and a great deal holier than this poor man Bayard whom they have attacked, not wisely, but too well. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair desires to say that if any document is to be printed which has not been read, it must be by consent of the House.

Mr. HITT. I object to printing in the RECORD the paper which has been referred to by the gentleman from New York, unless it be by order of the House.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HITT. I object also to the personality offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON].

Several MEMBERS. He read that.

Mr. HITT. That which he read as a part of his remarks of course goes into his remarks.

REPRINT OF A DOCUMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of House Document No. 247, which is exhausted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. May I ask what that document is?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the report on life-insurance companies.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York for the reprint of this document?

There was no objection.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—BENOIT VS. BOATNER.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator will suspend a moment until I can deliver a few remarks on the Du Pont case, which I will do before 2 o'clock. It will not take me to exceed thirty minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The conference report will be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. SHERMAN. The consideration of the conference report will be resumed immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] calls up for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon the resolution reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the Hon. Henry A. Du Pont, a citizen of the State of Delaware, claims to be entitled to a seat in the United States Senate, by virtue of a vote of a joint convention of the general assembly of that State had on the 9th day of May, 1895, resulting as follows:

	Votes.
For Henry A. Du Pont	15
For Ed. Ridgley	10
For J. Edward Addicks	4
For Ebe W. Tunnell	1
Making a total of	30

The majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections say in their report that there were present—

In such joint assembly, and each casting a vote, 30 persons, each claiming to be a member of the legislature of the State of Delaware and entitled to vote for United States Senator.

Also that—

It is conceded by Mr. Du Pont, and by your committee, that if this contention is true—that is, if each of the 30 persons so present in such joint assembly, and each of whom cast a vote for Senator, was a duly qualified member of the legislature of the State of Delaware, and under no disability as such, which would deprive him of his right to a seat in such assembly, and to cast a vote for Senator, then Mr. Du Pont was not elected Senator and is not entitled to a seat in the Senate.

And that—

It is admitted upon the part of Mr. Du Pont, and such is the fact, that of the 30 persons so present and claiming the right to vote, as aforesaid, only 29 of them were so qualified. It is contended, however, that one of the 30, namely, William T. Watson, claiming to be a senator from the county of Kent, and claiming to be the speaker of the senate, and claiming the right as such senator to be present and participate in the proceedings of such joint assembly and to cast his vote for Senator, was not entitled, under the constitution of the State of Delaware and the laws of the land, to be present in such joint assembly, had no right to be counted therein in making up the number present, and had no right to cast his vote in such assembly for any person for Senator. * * *

The whole question involved, then, in this case is as to the right of Watson to be present in such joint assembly and to be counted therein in making up the number present, so as to require the votes of 16 members to make an election.

And further—

It will be seen, therefore, the whole question of the right of Mr. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate, as claimed, turns upon the single question: Had William T. Watson, then holding and exercising the office of governor of the State of Delaware, a right under the constitution of the State and the laws of the land to exercise the office of State senator, and as such to sit in the joint assembly on May 9, 1895, and to be counted therein in making up the number constituting such joint assembly, and vote therein for a United States Senator? The majority of your committee, therefore, are clearly of the opinion that he had not.

No denial is made of the fact that William T. Watson was a legally elected and qualified senator from the county of Kent, and that he had been duly elected to the constitutional office of speaker of the senate. Delaware, unlike most of the States of the Union, does not recognize and never has recognized the office of lieutenant-governor, and devolves the duties usually attaching to that office on the speaker of the senate.

By the constitution of the State it is provided—

That upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the duties of the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

April 8, 1895, the Hon. Joshua H. Marvil, the de jure and de facto governor, died, and on the next day the Hon. William T. Watson, a senator from the county of Kent and speaker of the senate, took the oath and began exercising the duties of governor, and continued to do so thereafter. May 9, 1895, he entered the senate and, as a member of the joint convention of the two houses of the legislature, convened for the election of a United States Senator, cast his vote. I have been unable to find that his vote was challenged until near the close of the session, or that any question was raised as to his right to participate in the deliberations of the joint convention and vote for any eligible citizen he might elect until after the last ballot had been taken.

Mr. Watson states in an affidavit filed by him, which appears in the report of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that on his appearance in the joint convention—

William T. Records, speaker pro tempore, vacated the chair, and he, this affiant, took the same and presided over the senate until the hour for the two houses to assemble in joint meeting arrived, and then announced the same and proceeded, at the head of the senators, into the hall of the house of representatives, where he presided over the joint assembly from the beginning to the end thereof, and voted upon all questions which arose during the session, no objection having been made to his so presiding or voting until at or near the time the last ballot was taken, when Senator Alrichs read a written protest against his right to so vote and preside. * * *

Senator Alrichs says:

That after the last ballot had been taken in said convention of the joint assembly, after the houses separated, I, on behalf of myself and the 14 other senators voting for the said Henry A. Du Pont, arose and presented a written protest.

It appears that whatever protest was made was an afterthought and was made for the purpose of paving the way to a contest before the United States Senate.

The chief contention of Mr. Du Pont and the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is that there is an inherent inconsistency or incompatibility between the offices of governor and speaker of the senate, and that when Mr. Watson took the oath and began discharging or "exercising the duties of governor," he thereby ceased to be a senator from the county of Kent and speaker of the senate, and became de jure and de facto the governor of the State, and the offices which he had theretofore filled became ipso facto vacant, and that at the time of the joint convention of the general assembly there were but 29 legal voters present, and Mr. Du Pont having received 15 of that number, he was legally elected United States Senator by 1 majority. This, I believe, is a fair, as it is a concise, statement of the case as presented by Mr. Du Pont, by his counsel, and by the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to say a word, I will say I am not aware, as one member of the committee, of having presented the case in that form, and I know of no other member of the majority of the committee who has asserted as a dogmatic proposition that Watson not only became de jure and de facto governor of the State, as he did, but that his seat in the senate and his office as president of the senate became absolutely vacant. The Senator knows very well that that is not the presentation of the majority report.

Mr. ALLEN. That is the logical consequence of the argument made by the majority of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very good; it is entirely open to the Senator, with his great logical powers, to say that that is his conclusion from the report, but he did not so state it. He asserts that that is the report, when it is not the form or the substance of the report.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, my feeble logical powers, and they are very feeble indeed, lead me to the belief that that is the legitimate deduction and conclusion of the majority of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to the Senator saying that, but that was not what he said. His presentation, as it will appear, for it is written, is that he asserts that to be a fair statement of the report itself.

Mr. ALLEN. I think it is.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is where the Senator and the majority of the committee differ. I only object because I do not like to acquiesce in so broad a statement as the Senator makes without protesting that it is unfounded.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from New Hampshire can always protest; that is to be expected.

I assume that the common-law rule that no man can exercise the duties of two offices which are inconsistent or incompatible with each other is well established; but this rule, like all rules, has its exceptions, and in my judgment one of these exceptions is found in the case here presented for our consideration.

It should be remembered that at the time Delaware adopted her first constitution, August 27, 1776, she was an independent and sovereign State and owed no allegiance to any other government, except that precarious allegiance that all the colonies owed to Great Britain, and which had been severed in fact by the Revolutionary war.

Substantially the only question which confronts us in this case is, in my judgment, this: Did Delaware, as an independent sovereign State, have the power to declare by her fundamental law that notwithstanding there might be an inconsistency or incompatibility in the duties of the offices of speaker of the senate and governor of the State, one of her citizens chosen for one of these offices should, in case of a vacancy in the other by death or from any cause enumerated in the constitution, discharge the duties thereof until such time as the people themselves, in their primary capacity, should elect a successor to fill the vacancy?

I do not think it requires much argument or an extended discussion to prove that an absolute, supreme, unrestricted, sovereign State, such as Delaware was at the time, possessed that power. There is nothing in the history of English jurisprudence which can by implication be said to enter into the construction of the fundamental law of the State of Delaware that would prohibit her from devolving the duties of speaker of the senate and governor of the State upon the same individual, to be exercised by him at one and the same time, notwithstanding an inconsistency or incompatibility between those offices.

It should be borne in mind also that Delaware was a small State, sparsely settled, having a population not to exceed 40,000, blacks and whites, at the time. Her people were poor and she sought naturally the establishment of a government that could be efficiently administered and at the same time one that would not burden the people by the payment of unnecessary salaries and by a large official retinue.

If it shall be conceded that this power resided in the State of Delaware by virtue of her sovereignty, the next question to be determined, in my judgment, is: Did she, by her fundamental law, devolve the duties of the office of governor, in case of a vacancy by death or from any other cause enumerated in her constitution, on the speaker of the senate, and when the speaker of the senate began the discharge of the duties of governor, did he cease to be a senator and speaker of the senate, and thereby create vacancies in those offices, or did he discharge the duties of the office of governor by virtue of his office of speaker of the senate, and thereby retain the right to return to the senate and participate in its deliberations at such time as he might think proper and until it finally adjourned?

Delaware, by her first constitution, declared that the legislative branch of the Government should be composed of two distinct bodies that should meet once or oftener in every year, and that should be called "the general assembly of Delaware." One branch was known as "the house of assembly" and the other as "the council." The right of suffrage was recognized as residing in the people, and section 7 of the original constitution, in speaking of the president or chief magistrate of the State, as he was then called, provides:

> And on his death, inability, or absence from the State, the speaker of the legislative council for the time being shall be vice-president, and in case of his death, inability, or absence from the State, the speaker of the house of assembly shall have the powers of a president until a new nomination is made by the general assembly.

The second constitution was formed in June, 1792. It followed closely on the lines of the first, and provides by section 5, Article II, as follows:

> Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers; and also each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor, may choose a speaker pro tempore.

Section 13 of Article V provides that—

> When vacancies happen in either house writs of election shall be issued by the speakers, respectively, or, in cases of necessity, in such other manner as shall be provided for by law; and the persons thereupon chosen shall hold their seats as long as those in whose stead they are elected might have done if such vacancies had not happened.

The supreme executive power was vested in the governor, whose office had been changed from chief executive or president, and he was required to be chosen on the first Tuesday in October by the citizens of the State having a right to vote for representatives in the counties where they resided, respectively, at the places where they were to vote for representatives.

Section 14 of Article III provides that—

> On the death or resignation of the governor, or his removal from office on impeachment or for inability, the speaker of the senate at the time shall exercise the office of governor until a new governor shall be duly qualified, and on the death or resignation of the speaker of the senate the speaker of the house of representatives at the time shall exercise the office until it be regularly vested in a new governor.

The schedule attached to this constitution provided—

> That the president—

Referring to the chief magistrate under the first constitution—> or in case of his death, inability, or absence from the State, the speaker of the legislative council at that time, and in case of his death, inability, or absence from the State, the speaker of the house of assembly at that time, shall respectively, with the privy council, exercise the executive authority of the State until the third Tuesday in January next. If the death, inability, or absence of the president shall happen after the first Tuesday of next October and before the first Tuesday in next January, then the executive authority shall devolve upon the person who was speaker of the council at the next preceding session of the general assembly, and in case of his death, inability, or absence, upon the person who was speaker of the house of assembly at the said next preceding session.

The third constitution was formed by a convention which met November 8, 1831, and by it the legislative branch of the State was continued in a general assembly, consisting of a senate and house of representatives, and it is provided by section 3, Article II, that—

> If the office of representative or the office of senator becomes vacant before the regular expiration of the term thereof, a representative or a senator shall be elected to fill such vacancy, and shall hold the office for the residue of said term.

Section 5 provides:

> Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers; and also each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor, may choose a speaker pro tempore.

Section 12, following the thought expressed in the two previous constitutions, provides that—

> No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he shall have been elected, be appointed to any civil office under this State which shall have been created or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during such time.

Section 3, Article V, provides:

> No member of Congress, nor person holding any office under the United States or this State, shall exercise the office of governor.

Section 14 provides:

> Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If the person elected governor shall die or become disqualified before the commencement of his term of office, or shall refuse to take the same, the person holding the office shall continue to exercise it until a governor shall be elected and duly qualified. If upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor there be no other person who can exercise said office within the provisions of the constitution, the secretary of state shall exercise the same until the next meeting of the general assembly, who shall immediately proceed to elect, by joint ballot of both houses, a person to exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

These are all of the provisions of the constitution of Delaware bearing directly upon this case. The rules for the construction of constitutions are plain, and they are, with few exceptions, those applied in the construction of statutes, treaties, contracts, and wills. The object of construction is to arrive at the true meaning of the author of the instrument, whether that be a sovereign State, a legislative assembly, or an individual, and when the intention is discovered it becomes a bounden duty to follow it, whatever the consequences that flow from it may be.

Of course, in the construction of a constitution we should have a due regard to the result; that is, such a construction should not be placed upon it as will lead to an absurd conclusion where it is capable of one that will lead to a rational and beneficial purpose. It must be so construed as to enforce and not to nullify it. It must be construed with liberality, but not with such liberality as will wrest it from its plain scope and purpose, or as will destroy it. If its language is plain and unequivocal, it must be construed as the language employed was understood at the time it was framed, and we are required to look at the people who framed it, their history and surroundings at the time it was made. If the language is plain and the purpose is clear, it must be carried into execution. If the language is obscure, we must seek not only in the language, but in the atmosphere surrounding its enactment or creation, for the purpose of those who created it. Construction may be technically said to deal with the application of the language used in an instrument, while interpretation takes within its grasp not only the language, but the history of the times when the instrument was formed, the habits and purposes of the people as then understood, and from these sources, by construction and interpretation, their true intention must be ascertained. These are all of the rules for construction necessary to be considered at this time.

Applying these rules, we are to determine what the intention of the people of Delaware was in the formation and adoption of their several constitutions. By whom and how are the duties of the office of governor to be exercised or discharged when a vacancy is created by death, resignation, inability, or by any other unforeseen event?

By the language of the constitution it is plain that the duties of governor are devolved upon the speaker of the senate in case of a vacancy, in the first instance, and in a secondary instance on the speaker of the house of assembly. These duties come to the speaker by virtue of his office of speaker. If he had not been elected to the senate and speaker of the senate he could not have exercised the duties of the office of governor until such time as he might be elected by the people to fill the vacancy. He is required to discharge these duties ex officio, that is, by virtue of his office of speaker of the senate. These duties are, so to speak, by force of the vacancy, superadded to the duties of the office of speaker, and he does not lose the office of senator and speaker by virtue of being required under the constitution to discharge or exercise the duties of the office of governor in the event of a vacancy, notwithstanding the constitution provides for a speaker pro tempore when he is required to absent himself from the senate to discharge the duties of governor.

I think it must be presumed that the people of Delaware were capable of using language in their constitution adequate to express their purpose, and they have distinctly said—

That upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

If it had been their purpose to create a vacancy in the office of senator and therefore in the office of speaker of the senate by elevating the latter to the office of governor in the event of a vacancy, they would have said in clear and unmistakable language that in the event of a vacancy in the office of governor by death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall be governor, and they would not have said—

That he shall exercise the office of governor until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified.

The language of the constitution clearly distinguishes between the office of governor filled by a person elected by a popular vote and the speaker of the senate, who, temporarily, in the event of a vacancy in the former, is required to exercise or discharge its duties.

Let us suppose that this constitution, instead of reading as it does—"That the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified"—had read that "The speaker of the senate shall discharge the duties of the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified." According to our use of language at this time, the latter expression would have been clearer and more distinct, and yet I think the word "discharge" has no greater force or significance than the word "exercise," which is the language of the Delaware constitution and which means, in my judgment, that in case of a vacancy by death, or from any of the causes enumerated therein, in the office of governor, the speaker shall exercise, by virtue of his office of speaker, the duties of the office of governor until the vacancy shall be filled at an election by the people.

Now, if this interpretation of the Delaware constitution is correct, Mr. Watson was always a senator from the county of Kent and was the de jure speaker of the senate, although the duties of the latter office were exercised by a speaker pro tempore at the time he was exercising or discharging the duties of governor, and he had a clear right when a United States Senator was to be chosen by a joint convention of the legislature of the Commonwealth, to occupy a seat in the general assembly and cast his vote for any citizen eligible to that office. This conclusion is strengthened in my mind by the fact that in several instances in the history of Delaware speakers of the senate who were called upon to discharge or exercise the duties of governor by reason of a vacancy did return and resume their duties as legislators, and it must be presumed that they had a right to discharge the duties devolved upon them by virtue of that office.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask him whether his attention has been called to the fact that in no one of those cases where the governor came back and acted as senator after the expiration of his gubernatorial term did he act as president of the senate?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes; my attention has been called to that, but I attach no significance to it. He was there by virtue of his office and to discharge its duties.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator stated that Governor Watson had the right to come in at any time and act as senator and also as president of the senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not doubt it at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. He proceeded to cite the cases where after a governor's term had expired he came back and acted as senator, not adverting to the fact that in no case did a governor resume the office of president of the senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I attach no significance to that whatever. If the speaker of the senate returned to the senate and resumed his seat in that body, that is sufficient, in my judgment, to show a self-interpretation of the constitution of Delaware by its own people. That as a matter of fact he may not have participated in the deliberations of the assembly or of the senate, in my judgment, is of no weight whatever.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the fact that he came back after his term as governor expired and resumed his seat in the senate is to be taken as a precedent or as a recognition by the people of Delaware that he had a right to come back, why, by the same reasoning, is not the fact that he never did come back while he exercised the office of governor to be construed into a precedent and usage and recognition upon the part of the people of Delaware that the two functions could not be exercised at the same time?

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President. When the senate of Delaware permitted the speakers to return and resume their seats in the senate as members of that organization that was not an interpretation of the constitution of Delaware, but an official interpretation of the relation that the speaker sustained to the legislative branch of the government, and the fact that he may not have participated in its deliberations after that event can not be said to be an interpretation that he was not ex officio a member of the organization.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I wish to ask one question right there. Would the Senator from Nebraska hold that the fact that he did come back and resume his seat after he had ceased to exercise the office of governor was a recognition upon the part of the senate of Delaware or the people of Delaware that he had a right to come back while he exercised the office of governor?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not see that it militates against that proposition at all. I can not understand where it does.

Mr. GRAY. I will just say, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, that it shows, and shows conclusively, that in the opinion of the senate, acquiesced in by the people of Delaware, there was no vacancy in the office of senator created by the exercise of the office of governor by the speaker.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. But will the Senator from Delaware, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, hold that it had any bearing at all upon the other question, as to whether the functions of senator were suspended so long as he exercised the functions of the executive?

Mr. GRAY. In the one case there is a recognition by the senate of Delaware that after the exercise of the office of governor the speaker who has exercised it may exercise the office of senator which he held when he assumed the exercise of the office of governor, and therefore there can be no vacancy; whereas the mere nonuser of his privileges or rights as a senator while he is exercising the office of governor is the individual act of the governor and may be explained by other reasons than that he considered there was any vacancy in the office.

Mr. CHANDLER. After all, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, the weakness of the argument seems to me to be evident when the Senator——

Mr. ALLEN. I do not believe I caught the first statement of the Senator. What do I understand him to have said about the argument?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator's argument—I am hardly conscious that I ventured to apply the term "weakness" to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought I heard the Senator speak of the "strength" of my argument.

Mr. CHANDLER. The weakness of the Senator's argument, I said. I will withdraw the word and say the want of strength in the argument is apparent when the Senator undertakes to show that because there are precedents where he comes back after he ceases to be governor, therefore there are precedents that he may come back before he is governor, which is the whole of the case.

Mr. GRAY. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no doubt of that whatever. I will resume my argument.

I believe that this conclusion is strengthened by the further fact that there was no protest on the part of any person against the right of Mr. Watson to cast his vote until after the last ballot had been taken, and that the contention of the claimant in this case is now made practically for the first time in the history of the case.

The practical interpretation of those charged with the execution of constitutional power in the past history of the State can not be ignored. An interpretation by a department of the Government of its own duties, while not conclusive upon another department, always possesses great weight, and should be given due consideration.

There are subordinate questions that might be considered at this time, but perhaps after all they are not of any particular significance, and one undertaking to discuss them at length might be justly charged with making a vain display of legal knowledge.

The right of a State to be represented in the Congress of the United States can not be denied; but it is a right which must be exercised in conformity with the clear requirements of constitutional and statutory safeguards. A State has power, within certain prescribed limitations, to adopt the manner of choosing its representatives in this Chamber. The General Government has a right to prescribe, within certain limitations, the manner in which the office of United States Senator shall be filled by a State. The right of a State to be represented in the United States Senate, therefore, is not a right that may be exercised arbitrarily and in clear violation of its own fundamental law, but it is a right which must be exercised in conformity to law, and the applicant will have no standing here until he shall show that he has been legally chosen by a majority of the duly elected members of the general assembly of the State in conformity to the requirements of law; and when this is shown his right and the right of the State which he claims to represent become perfect and can not be denied.

If the State of Delaware failed to choose a United States Senator in conformity to law to represent her at the expiration of the term of the Hon. Anthony Higgins, it was her fault and not the fault of the General Government, and she would have no right to ask us to admit an applicant who has not been chosen by a legal majority of her representatives. To admit him under such circumstances would be to break down one of the main safeguards of our constitutional government, and impair, if not eventually destroy, the rights of the State.

I fully agree with the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that evidence is not competent and can not be properly received to contradict the journal of the joint convention or either branch of the legislature, and that competent evidence may be received to support the journal in such respects as it may be deficient or wherein it may be silent, but this question, in my view, is entirely immaterial. I attach no importance to the fact that Mr. Watson failed during the month he was "exercising the office of governor" to appear in the senate and discharge the duties of a senator and speaker of the senate, nor to the fact that he did appear but a few moments before casting his vote in the joint convention, for the election of a United States Senator.

If, as I contend, the death of Governor Marvil did not make the speaker of the senate governor, and therefore did not affect the offices of senator and speaker of the senate, but simply added exceptional and extraordinary duties to the office of speaker, it would be a matter of no consequence to us that Mr. Watson appeared in the joint convention of the legislative assembly but a few moments before participating in the vote for a United States Senator.

The fact that he failed to discharge the duties of senator and speaker of the senate might be construed in a very doubtful case, by one sadly in search of an argument to support his position, as a self-interpretation of his duties under the constitution; but there seems to have been no doubt in his mind as to the office he actually held, and at best this presumption would be of so inconclusive and uncertain a character that it could have no weight in determining his real rights and duties. While engaged in discharging ex officio the duties of the office of governor the speaker might or not, as he saw fit, discharge the duties of senator and speaker. In any event and under any circumstances he would not be answerable to us for having failed to do so, nor can we properly say that his failure in this respect created a vacancy in the office of senator and speaker of the senate. He would no doubt be answerable to his constituents for a failure to perform his duties, and possibly he might have been required by the senate to attend its sessions when he could do so without detriment to the public service in discharging the superadded duties of governor created by the death of Governor Marvil, or be subjected to the penalty of contumacious conduct for a failure to do so, if his conduct was willful and contumacious; but whatever view we take of this point in the case, it does not appear that Mr. Watson did not exercise or discharge the duties of governor by virtue of his office of speaker of the senate.

It is further claimed by the majority of the committee that section 4, Article III, of the present constitution of Delaware is conclusive against the right of Mr. Watson to discharge or exercise the duties of governor without thereby creating a vacancy in the office of speaker of the senate. The language of the constitution is as follows:

> No member of Congress or person holding office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of governor.

I do not think there is any conflict between this and the other provisions of the constitution which I have quoted. I think that we must construe these provisions together, and by looking at the context of the constitution determine the purpose of its framers and not seek for this purpose in isolated provisions.

Ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio, is the rule. Every part of the constitution must be brought into action in order to collect from the whole one uniform and consistent sense, if that may be done, or, in other words, the construction must be made upon the entire instrument and not merely upon misconnected parts of it. The whole context must be considered to collect the intention of the people, although the immediate object of the inquiry be the meaning of an isolated clause. In short, the law will judge of an instrument, aside from the diverse parts or clauses, by looking at the whole, and will give to each part its proper office, so as to ascertain and carry out the intention of the makers and enforce all of its provisions.

Thus construed there is entire harmony between these constitutional provisions, but construed as the majority of the committee have construed them there would be direct and irreconcilable conflict, and in case of the death of the governor the State would be left without anyone to discharge the duties of the executive office, for it is not contended, nor can it be successfully urged, that the speaker of the senate could be required to "exercise the office of governor" if he should decline to do so. In such an event there would be no one to discharge or exercise the duties of governor, and the executive branch of the State would fail until the vacancy was filled by a popular election.

Suppose that Speaker Watson, on the death of Governor Marvil, had refused to "exercise the office of governor," would it be contended that there is any power in the State to force him to do so? I do not think it can be so contended. I think he is permitted to discharge the duties of this office by virtue of his office of speaker and that we must conclude that this provision of the constitution recognizes the exception I have named, and that it must be held to be an exception to the general rule laid down in section 3, Article V.

Section 4, Article III, and section 3, Article V, of the Constitution properly construed would read thus:

> "No member of Congress nor person holding office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of governor," except "that upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by death, removal, resignation, or inability the speaker of the Senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified."

It is also well, in this connection, to bear in mind another rule for the construction of constitutions. It is this: General provisions of a constitution, like those of a statute, upon a subject must give way to specific provisions on the same subject where there is a seeming conflict between the language of the two. This rule has no exception in English jurisprudence. The constitution of Delaware is specific in devolving on the speaker of the senate the "exercise of the office of governor until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified." This rule is directly and clearly applicable to the construction of these provisions of the constitution, and as thus construed there is no conflict between them.

Mr. President, in the proper determination of this case we must take into consideration the Federal Constitution and statutes. Section 4, Article I, of the Constitution provides:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It was settled in Ex parte Siebold, 100 United States Supreme Court Reports, 371 et seq., that the United States and the States have concurrent jurisdiction, within certain limitations, to regulate the manner in which the Congressional delegation of the several States shall be chosen. It was argued in that case that the State must possess exclusive right to do so or that a conflict would arise between the two governments. The court, in replying to this argument, said:

> No clashing can possibly arise. There is not the slightest difficulty in a harmonious combination into one system of regulations made by the two sovereignties, any more than there is in the case of prior and subsequent enactments of the same legislature.

Section 15, chapter 1, Title II, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides, in substance:

> * * * Each house shall openly * * * name one person * * * and the person so voted for who receives a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house shall be entered on the journal of that house by the clerk or secretary thereof.

And that—

> At 12 o'clock meridian on the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid, the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly * * * and if the same person has received a majority of all the votes in each house, he shall be declared duly elected Senator. But if the same person has not received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house has failed to take proceedings as required by this section, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva-voce vote of each member present, a person for Senator, and a person who receives a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected. If no person receives such majority on the first day, the joint assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session of the legislature, and shall take at least one vote until a Senator is elected.

It is quite clear that the person who claims to be elected a Senator must receive a majority of all the votes of the general assembly, and that a majority of all the members elected to both houses must be present and vote. If he fails to receive this majority, or if a majority of the members elected to both houses are not present and do not vote, there will not be a legal election.

Section 18 of the Revised Statutes requires the executive of the State—

> To certify his election under the seal of the State to the President of the Senate of the United States.

And section 19 requires—

> That his certificate shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

I think it can not be denied that Congress has the undoubted power to legislate on this subject. It has undoubted power to say that the person who seeks admission to this Chamber as a Senator shall secure his election by a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, and that a majority of all the members elected to both houses of the general assembly shall be present and participate in the vote. Congress also has power to prescribe the evidence of title to a seat here, and having done so, I am unable to see how Mr. Du Pont can claim a seat in this Chamber without the evidence being in the form of a certificate issued by the chief executive of the State.

It may be asked, what is to be done in case the governor or acting governor should refuse to sign the certificate of election? The remedy, in my judgment, in such a case is clear. This duty is ministerial, which a court of competent jurisdiction may enforce by mandamus or other proper writ. It is not one of those duties which the court, as a coordinate branch of the government, can not control. It is the discharge of a mere perfunctory ministerial duty imposed by statute, and not by the constitution, and is a duty which can clearly be enforced.

It may be said that a case may arise where the forms of the law have been clearly observed, and the candidate having a majority of the votes of the joint convention of the legislative assembly, the governor will refuse to certify his election as provided by statute, and the court of highest jurisdiction of the State will refuse to compel the governor by mandamus to issue the necessary certificate of election. That such a case could arise there can be no doubt; that it will arise where patriotic citizens are endeavoring to secure honest representation is not to be supposed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not know that I correctly understood the Senator from Nebraska. Did I understand him to claim that it was necessary, in order to entitle a person claiming a seat in the Senate of the United States to be admitted, that he should have the certificate from the governor of the State prescribed by the act of Congress?

Mr. ALLEN. Not under all circumstances. There are exceptions, where it would not be required.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. What would be the exceptions?

Mr. ALLEN. Under the statutes, as they exist at this time——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the Senator——

Mr. ALLEN. Allow me to answer the question.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. All right.

Mr. ALLEN. Under the statutes, as they now exist, he must have that certificate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Very well.

Mr. ALLEN. Wait a moment. I have no doubt, if the applicant was duly elected and had appealed to a court of competent jurisdiction of his own State to enforce the issuance of a certificate and that had been refused, that Congress, by virtue of its powers to determine the election and qualification of its own membership, would have the power to admit.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then does the Senator from Nebraska hold, as the law now stands, if a person claiming to be elected as Senator from any State comes here without a certificate from the governor, and without having applied to the court for a mandamus to compel the issuance of a certificate, that then he is not entitled to a seat, no matter whether it is made to appear that he had a majority of the votes of the legislature or not?

Mr. ALLEN. That is exactly what the Senator from Nebraska holds.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me a moment further?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In the first place, I want to state to the Senator from Nebraska that——

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator is not going to make an argument in the midst of my speech.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The very able Senators who have argued this case against Mr. Du Pont admitted in their printed arguments that a certificate was not necessary.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not help that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That it was not necessary in this case. No member of the Senate on the Committee on Privileges and Elections who has opposed the seating of Mr. Du Pont made any such claim. In addition to that, there are Senators now holding seats on this floor—and more than one—who came here without having the certificate of the governor and without having applied to the courts for a mandamus to compel the issuance of a certificate.

Mr. ALLEN. All of which is wrong.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. So that the Senator from Nebraska stands, as I believe, absolutely alone in the Senate on any such proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. I think possibly this is the twentieth time in my experience as a Senator that I have been pointed out as the single individual who had the temerity to entertain an opinion contrary to a long and illustrious array of statesmen, living and dead. [Laughter.] That has no terror for me. I am not discharging my duties upon the opinion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], nor of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], nor am I discharging my duties upon the opinion of my learned friend from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who discussed this question, nor from any bad precedents that the Senate may have heretofore set.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think it is quite complimentary to the Senator. It simply shows that he is wiser than all the rest of us put together.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes. That is the conclusion that the Senator reaches. I am to be browbeaten and driven from my position; I am to be driven from the conclusions that I have reached by as carefully analyzing this case as I could by being held up as the wisest man in the Senate. Mr. President, I do not know but privately I should like to accept that conclusion. I should not do it publicly. [Laughter.] But I have read precedent after precedent which has been laid down in this Chamber since I have been here for which I have no more respect than I would have for a highwayman, independent of that respect I am required to have in the orderly conduct of the business of this Chamber. I bow to the acts, but I have no respect whatever for the execution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not rise to taunt the Senator, as he seems to think the Senator from Oregon was disposed to do. I do not think he was.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Not at all.

Mr. ALLEN. Permit me just there. Does the Senator doubt that the Senator from Oregon was not sincere when he said I was the wisest man in the Chamber?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no doubt he thought so. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. But he may have been mistaken, as the Senator from Nebraska may be.

This, however, is the point that I think the Senator is not insensible to, and that is the great calamity that would befall this Senate if his doctrine were correct. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], who sits behind the Senator from Nebraska, has never had any gubernatorial certificate.

Mr. ALLEN. He ought to go back to Florida, then.

Mr. CHANDLER. That Senator came here with nothing in the way of a certificate but the record of the Florida legislature. He was admitted on the prima facie right; no one ever suggested that he ought to have the certificate of the governor; and yet, if the Senator from Nebraska be correct, all these eloquent arguments on various subjects which the Senator from Florida has presented to the Senate have been absolutely all these years illegal and unconstitutional.

Mr. ALLEN. No; he is a Senator de facto.

Mr. PASCO. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to make a suggestion——

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] has the floor.

Mr. PASCO. My colleague [Mr. CALL] came here with the journal of the State legislature, which showed that he had received a majority of all the votes cast——

Mr. ALLEN. I must protest against——

Mr. PASCO. While Mr. Du Pont comes here with the journal of the legislature of the State of Delaware, which shows that he received only 15 votes, when that same journal shows that 30 votes were actually cast. This is the difference between the two cases.

Mr. HOAR. But one of the 30 votes which was cast was illegal, and therefore no vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly. The whole case is whether there was one void vote. Everybody understands that. The issue now is on this new doctrine of the Senator from Nebraska, which I hope may prevail, if it is a sound doctrine. I am open to conviction even by the Senator from Nebraska, that under no circumstances ought a Senator to be admitted here who does not either have a gubernatorial certificate or has applied for a mandamus to get it.

Mr. ALLEN. I certainly do not know what my distinguished and always amiable friend from New Hampshire means when he says he is willing to be convinced "even by the Senator from Nebraska," unless he means that I am the last man in the Chamber who ought to convince him or who could convince him.

Mr. President, these interruptions and these hypothetical cases have no terror for me, nor do I feel particularly humiliated by the charge the honorable Senator from Oregon makes against me, that I set up my judgment contrary to him and contrary to the judgment of other Senators in this Chamber in the interpretation of my duty. It has been a rule of my life to follow my own judgment in business affairs and in the interpretation of political and legal questions. I have been doing that at the bar now for pretty nearly twenty-seven years. I have reached almost the fiftieth milepost in my life, and I am too old now, after having been born and reared in the wild and woolly West, where we have our own way to a great extent, to subordinate my judgment, however humble and feeble it may be, to the extremely scholarly and profound judgment of the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from New Hampshire. I must retain my own judgment, whatever the consequences may be. I now proceed with my argument.
